> "This is not a matter of suggesting that we may not, in the event, find any evidence of WMD programmes. On the contrary, as you told the media on 28 April, we are confident that we will. But we must keep drumming home three messages:
> – we already have substantial evidence: both from before the fighting and what we have discovered since. There is 173 pages of evidence in Blix's 7 March report. Examples since include the discoveries of large stockpiles of protective suits and atropine: Coalition forces were well known not to possess chemical weapons, so what reason would Iraq have had for such stockpiles other than to protect its forces against its own chemical weapons?
> – this will not be a quick process. Saddam has had twelve years to hide the evidence and it is unreasonable to expect us to uncover it in a few weeks. We should be stressing that the process of discovery and validation cannot be rushed: we must be extremely thorough to minimise the risk of false alarms …
> – evidence can take many forms. It may well not be in the form of finished materiel (stockpiles of munitions, barrels of nerve agent etc); it is equally if not more likely to come in the form of testimony from scientists and other Iraqi personnel, and documentation. That sort of evidence is no less valid."

161. Mr Straw noted MOD concern that the last point "might be interpreted as moving the goalposts". It needed "to be deployed with care", but it was "not new". It was "why we placed such emphasis on the UN inspectors conducting secure interviews". In Mr Straw's view, it carried "more weight than the claim raised in some US newspapers that the Iraqis may have destroyed their WMD in the days immediately prior to the war. For that to carry any credibility at all it would have to be backed with very convincing evidence of such destruction."

162. Mr Straw recommended that the UK should, more realistically for the medium rather than the short term, continue to try "to change US minds" about credible independent validation of WMD discoveries by UNMOVIC or the IAEA. Dr Blix would "retire from the scene in June" and the task had:

"… now changed, to one essentially of observation and reporting. Coalition forces will do the detective work. But the fact is that the inspectors still carry the most weight with the audiences we need to convince, in the Security Council or the media. It would be odd if the Coalition was now to refuse to co-operate with the weapons inspectors after we made this a centrepiece of our case against Saddam."

163. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair:

"You should be aware. We are pushing the WMD dossier [issue] hard: but J[ack] S[traw]'s points are well taken."[80]

164. On 1 May, Mr Watkins sent No.10 briefing for Mr Blair's meeting with Secretary Rumsfeld at Chequers the following day.[81] Mr Watkins suggested that Mr Blair remind Secretary Rumsfeld of the stronger political and presentational pressures in the UK to find verifiable evidence of Iraqi WMD programmes. The US saw no short-term role for UNMOVIC and there was little appetite in the longer term. Mr Watkins proposed that Mr Blair say that: "suitably reconstituted – UN inspectors would confer maximum international credibility to WMD finds."

165. Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, commented to Mr Blair: "No way that Rumsfeld will agree this."[82]

166. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon met Secretary Rumsfeld at Chequers on 2 May.[83] There is no indication in the record of the meeting that WMD was discussed.

167. Secretary Rumsfeld and Mr Hoon met again at Heathrow Airport before Secretary Rumsfeld returned to the US.[84]

168. Mr Hoon said that the UK had not seen significant output from the debriefing of high-value individuals and scientists. There could be information emerging that was of operational use and should be shared with commanders on the ground. Secretary Rumsfeld agreed that this was an area that could be improved.

169. Mr Straw raised verification with Mr Richard Armitage, US Deputy Secretary of State, on 6 May.[85] The key question was: "did the US want UNMOVIC back in?" The issue could not be sidestepped indefinitely. Mr Armitage said that he was not keen.

170. In discussion at the AHMGIR on 8 May, Mr Hoon stated that, given the role WMD had played in the justification for action against Saddam Hussein, it would be important to link any finds back to the pre-conflict evidence.[86]

171. Other points made were that:

- Military action was justified by the continued failure of the Iraqi Government to meet its obligations set out in UN resolutions.
- If the UK Government faced criticism if further WMD were not found, the response should be that Saddam Hussein could have avoided war by, for example, delivering scientists.
- If the Security Council had held together, there might not have been a need for war.

172. Mr Straw concluded that it would be some time before WMD investigation would produce clear results.

173. Mr Straw told Sir David Manning that the absence of any reference to UNMOVIC inspectors in the text of the draft omnibus resolution being discussed on Iraq (see Section 9.1) meant "we were very exposed on the question of why UNMOVIC was not on the bus".[87]

174. On 8 May 2003, the Intelligence and Security Committee of Parliament (ISC) announced a review into the intelligence and assessments that informed the decision to invade Iraq and whether the intelligence was accurately reflected in Government publications.

175. In its Annual Report for 2002/03, presented to Mr Blair on 8 May 2003, the ISC stated: "It is impossible at the present moment to make any definitive statements about the role of intelligence and the situation in Iraq." The ISC had been briefed on the issue, but intended "to examine in more detail the intelligence and assessments available and their use".[88]

176. Ms Ann Taylor, the Chair of the Committee, wrote to Mr Scarlett on 8 May requesting "JIC Assessments relating to Iraq and its WMD, dating back to August 1990 and supporting intelligence".[89]

177. In its report, published in September 2003 and addressed later in this Section, the Committee stated that it had "examined all the JIC Assessments produced since the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait 1990". The Committee had also "looked at the supporting intelligence in critical areas to ensure that the assessments reflected the intelligence correctly".[90]

178. The discovery on 24 April of a trailer thought to be a possible mobile BW facility attracted considerable media interest in the UK and US.

179. On 9 May, Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that, despite the obstacles, the initial prospects for finding evidence of Saddam Hussein's WMD programmes were "reasonably promising".

180. The discovery of a suspect trailer on 24 April is addressed in the Box 'The investigation of possible mobile production facilities for biological agent'.

181. At the JIC meeting on 30 April, Sir Richard Dearlove "suggested that there would need to be very careful handling of the emerging information on WMD in Iraq". The JIC "might find it useful to have a special meeting to discuss this in due course".[91]

182. On 9 May, SIS4 sent Sir David Manning a briefing note for Mr Blair on "the current status of efforts in Iraq to produce evidence of Saddam's WMD programmes".[92]

183. The covering letter reiterated the obstacles confronting those efforts, including the poor security situation, the apparent disconnect between US organisations in Iraq, the limited circle of knowledge about WMD locations and deployments, and the sheer volume of potential sensitive sites. It was, however, a critical priority to find convincing evidence of past WMD programmes before the deployment of the ISG.

184. The letter described the suspect BW trailer as "an encouraging find" that would be reinforced through exploitation of other related leads in co-operation with other Coalition officials, but one that did, however, "illustrate the difficulties of co-ordinating press lines

… with the US". The letter recommended that Sir David Manning raise the issue with his US interlocutors during his imminent visit to Washington.

185. The briefing note attached to the letter confirmed that SIS would be sending more staff to Iraq to help the US effort on the ground, including debriefing centres. The likely timescales for successful exploitation of sites was not to be underestimated:

> "UNMOVIC allowed an average of two hours per facility, and found virtually nothing. It had taken over two weeks to exploit and verify a single find, the mobile laboratory. There were hundreds of known sites to exploit …"

186. The note also addressed the suspect trailer and provided an update on investigations into CW munitions and production which had yet to produce concrete evidence.

187. Sir David Manning passed the briefing note to Mr Blair, describing it as "An update on the problems and the (reasonably promising) prospects."[93]

The investigation of possible mobile production facilities for biological agent

On 3 May, Lieutenant General Andrew Ridgway, Chief of Defence Intelligence (CDI) informed Mr Hoon's Private Office that the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) assessed that a "trailer recovered north of Mosul on 24 April could be used as a component of a transportable BW facility".[94]

Lt Gen Ridgway wrote that:

- "The trailer has a vessel with a capacity of over 100 litres of agent. It is assessed that […]"
- "The discovery of the trailer is highly significant … It is a gun, but not a smoking gun."
- Some details had already appeared in the US media, but "their full significance has yet to emerge".

Mr Hoon was invited to agree that:

- the exploitation of the trailer was urgent and should be co-ordinated between the US and UK;
- the US should be asked to agree to Dr Blix being briefed and to consider the evidence being examined by an independent third party; and
- the discovery and likely role of the trailer should not be publicised until the US and UK had agreed a common position.

[94] Minute Ridgway to PS/SofS [MOD], 3 May 2003, 'Iraq: Probable Transportable BW Production Trailer'.

A paper prepared by the MOD on 3 May, for the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR) on 8 May, stated that the "most promising find so far is of a HGV [heavy goods vehicle] trailer" near Irbil where an "initial assessment" closely matched "earlier descriptions (from intelligence) of a vehicle that supported mobile BW agent production".[95]

The discovery of a "BW factory" was discussed in Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush on 7 May.[96]

The British Embassy Washington reported overnight on 7/8 May that the US had used a general briefing on Iraqi WMD by Mr Cambone to address growing press speculation about the discovery of the suspected mobile BW laboratory.[97]

Mr Cambone had emphasised the scale and complexity of the task facing the Coalition in uncovering and destroying Iraq's WMD, and explained that the resources deployed would be "substantially enhanced" with the arrival of the ISG.

Mr Cambone said that the mobile laboratory was "very similar" to that which had been described in Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council on 5 February 2003, and that, while some of the equipment on the trailer could have been used for purposes other than BW production, "US and UK technical experts have concluded that the unit does not appear to perform any function beyond what the defector said it was for, which was the production of biological agents".

Asked whether the trailer represented the smoking gun, Mr Cambone had stated that he was sure that, as time went by, Iraq's WMD programmes would be found to have been as extensive as described to the Security Council by Secretary Powell in February 2003.

The Embassy added that it had raised the need for independent third-party verification of the find with the National Security Council (NSC) earlier in the day. Although that suggestion had been rejected on the grounds that it was highly unlikely that samples worth verifying would be found in a trailer that had been scrubbed clean, the principle of third-party verification, once samples had been found, was recognised as "a good one".

The SIS letter of 9 May described the suspect BW trailer as "an encouraging find" that would be reinforced through exploitation of other related leads in co-operation with other Coalition officials.[98]

The briefing note attached to the letter stated that the suspect BW trailer "remained the most significant find to date" and had received some media attention. There were differing views on the function of the trailer, however, it was believed to be part of a transportable production system (TPS). SIS would be contributing to the Coalition efforts to investigate the trailer's provenance, with the aim of obtaining "a high-level view of how it related to other parts of the BW programme". There was speculation about whether anthrax was the original intended product. Further debriefing and computer exploitation were ongoing.

On 13 May, Mr Scarlett informed Mr Powell that a "second possible mobile BW trailer" had been found in Northern Iraq on 9 May; and that imagery indicated "a third suspicious trailer in the Mosul area".[99] Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "It is not yet clear whether we will be able to prove that these trailers were used for BW agent production … But our assessment is that the first trailer at least (and probably the second) were capable of producing micro-organisms as part of a biological process … It is not impossible that they are capable of producing a crude (liquid) form of agent …"
> "A great deal of thought has been given to other possible applications for these trailers. So far none has been identified …"

Mr Scarlett added that "our experts" had ruled out the possibility that the first trailer might have been part of a mobile pesticide unit.

Mr Scarlett concluded:

> "These are significant finds. There is a serious chance (I should not put it more strongly) that the trailers form part of the covert production facilities for which we have been looking. Whatever their function … [they] should have been declared under … [resolution] 1441. At the right moment, and once we have reached the firmest judgement possible … it will be necessary to explain their significance …"

Mr Blair commented:

> "This is good + we should keep a careful note of all we are finding. How are the interviews going?"[100]

Mr Scarlett also provided a more detailed note produced by the DIS and a minute addressing claims made on NBC News, which could not be substantiated and appeared to be based on the views of Dr David Kay. Dr Kay was described as "formerly nuclear Chief Weapons Inspector for IAEA".

On 15 May, an official in the FCO Non-Proliferation Department (NPD) advised Mr Tim Dowse, Head of NPD, that Dr David Kelly, MOD Special Adviser Counter-proliferation and Arms Control, had advised that UNMOVIC experts were leaning towards the view that the mobile laboratory was not a bio-weapons lab.[101] The FCO official was concerned about the implications of Dr Blix casting doubt on the UK's analysis.

SIS stated on 16 May that the most important piece of evidence found so far was "the various BW trailers, which we are now firmly of the view are part of the transportable production system (TPS) for BW agent".[102]

On 1 June, Mr Scarlett informed Sir David Manning that a US inter-agency team with one UK representative continued to assess that the BW trailers "almost certainly" formed "part of the mobile BW production facilities identified in [pre-invasion] intelligence".[103] The experts could not think of "any other credible explanation". That was also "the firm view" which had been reported on the US Defense Intelligence Agency website.

Mr Scarlett added that a preliminary draft of the team's report had stated that the trailers, as presently configured, could not be used as a biological production system. That report had been withdrawn. Mr Scarlett commented: "It really does seem that it has no status. Confusing nonetheless."

Mr Scarlett concluded that there would be a further assessment of Iraq's BW capabilities, but a formal assessment could and should be issued only when "we feel confident that we have enough data".

Subsequent assessments of the purpose of the trailers are set out later in this Section.

188. On 15 May, an official in NPD advised Mr Dowse that:

- Iraq's two most senior BW scientists were denying knowledge of recent Iraqi WMD programmes.
- The head of Iraq's National Monitoring Directorate was claiming that all SCUD missiles had been destroyed between 1991 and 1993.
- There was "considerable frustration" about the absence of UK involvement in the US interviews of scientists.[104]

189. On 16 May, SIS informed the FCO that information emerging from interviews with individuals prepared to discuss WMD confirmed some of the original judgements about Iraq's programmes.

190. SIS advised that it was not in the Government's interest to allow media reports that there was no evidence to justify pre-conflict claims to become received wisdom.

191. On 16 May, Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary sent Mr McDonald an update on progress and ideas for changing public perceptions of Iraq's WMD programmes.[105]

192. The letter stated that the "poor security situation, apparent disconnect between parts of the US system (and thus with UK agencies)" and problems flying in and out of Baghdad were slowing down the effort, but SIS officers in Iraq were "fully switched on to the task".

[105] Letter PS/C to McDonald, 16 May 2003, 'Iraqi WMD'.

193. On the search for evidence, the letter stated:

> "People who are prepared to discuss WMD are gradually emerging to provide information. Most have only small pieces of the jigsaw, but these do confirm some of the original judgements: continued CW production until mid-late 2002; replacement of the large, static BW programme with a covert, transportable capacity; a massive effort in the months before the conflict to break up and conceal much of the WMD (which may thus have been inaccessible when the conflict began); the start of work to develop extended range missiles, beyond UN-sanctioned limits; and the highly restricted circle of those really in the know. Further interviewing of senior detainees is likely to deliver more insights …"

194. SIS assessed that the most important piece of evidence found so far was "the various BW trailers, which we are now firmly of the view are part of the transportable production system (TPS) for BW agent". New information was also emerging on Iraq's CW and missile programmes.

195. The letter stated that, despite the emergence of new information, the UK and international media continued to report that there was no evidence to justify the claims made by the UK and the US before the war. It was not in the interests of the Government or SIS to allow that to become received wisdom. SIS was working on a media strategy with the FCO, the MOD and others to address those points.

196. SIS also reported that BBC Television's Panorama planned to make a programme on Iraqi WMD for broadcast later that year. SIS suggested that the Government provide assistance to the programme-maker while taking care not to hijack the programme. The onus would still be on the programme-maker to seek independent expert advice. SIS advised that there was a greater risk in the programme being made without the Government's help, and that the programme-maker "might take at face value the denials of senior detainees and be without the technical knowledge and guidance we can offer".

197. A copy of the SIS letter was shown to Mr Blair by Sir David Manning, with the comment: "Evidence beginning to build. Suggestions here too for media – that need to be reviewed with Alastair [Campbell]".[106]

198. Mr Blair replied to Sir David Manning: "A[lastair] C[ampbell] to speak to me about this."[107] Mr Blair described as "vital" the letter's assessment of evidence emerging to support pre-invasion judgements.

199. Sir David Manning sent Mr Blair's comment to Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Office "To note".[108]

200. Mr McDonald replied to the letter from Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Office about progress in uncovering hard evidence of prohibited Iraqi weapons programmes on 2 June.[109] He agreed:

> "… that we have pro-actively to confront some of the negative media about the lack of Iraqi WMD, and work to ensure that some of the evidence that is coming to light finds its way into the public domain. Or, as you say, the media will remain camped on the position of No evidence, No justification. In the absence of independent validation of Coalition WMD finds, the media are playing a crucial role in setting public opinion. Having an effective media strategy, agreed interdepartmentally, will help address this …"

201. Mr McDonald added:

> "The idea of working with the BBC Panorama programme … seems an excellent way to take the strategy forward in the short term. Providing background briefing and unobtrusively helping point the programme makers in the right direction […] should help to bring to light some of the hard evidence that is being uncovered. It will be important to ensure that Panorama maintains its overall independence … However, we should not regard this as an exclusive … [W]e should work with a range of journalists to ensure that the message comes across clearly and coherently."

202. Resolution 1483 was adopted on 22 May 2003.[110] Its provisions relating to Iraq's continued obligation to disarm, the US and UK activities in that regard and the future of UNMOVIC and the IAEA's mandates, are set out in the Box 'Resolution 1483: WMD provisions'. The wider purpose and provisions of the resolution are addressed in Section 9.1.

Resolution 1483: WMD provisions

In resolution 1483, the Security Council:

- reaffirmed "the importance of the disarmament of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction and of eventual confirmation of the disarmament of Iraq";
- determined that "the situation in Iraq, although improved, continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security".

In operative paragraph 11 of the resolution, the Security Council:

- reaffirmed "that Iraq must meet its disarmament obligations";
- encouraged the UK and US "to keep the Council informed of their activities in this regard"; and
- underlined "the intention of the Council to revisit the mandates" of UNMOVIC and the IAEA "as set forth in resolution 687 (1991) … 1284 (1999) and 1441 (2002)".

[110] UN Security Council Resolution 1483 (2003).

203. Speaking after the adoption of the resolution, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that the resolution "did not seek to resolve every issue"; and that the functions of UNMOVIC and the IAEA "as they relate to the complete disarmament of Iraq under previous resolutions" would need to be taken up "in due course".[111]

204. Sir Jeremy added that the UK:

> "… continues to see a role for both bodies in the eventual confirmation of disarmament and perhaps, if the Council agrees, in the longer term monitoring and verification."

205. On 23 May, Mr Howard sent Mr Hoon's Private Office an update on plans for the ISG and a draft letter to No.10.[112]

206. Mr Howard reported that there was "considerable media interest" in the efforts to find WMD and there had been "numerous PQs [Parliamentary Questions] on this and the functioning of the ISG".

207. Mr Howard added that there was:

> "… growing pressure for the Government to provide an assessment of how the WMD findings match the statements made in their September 2002 Dossier and No.10 have made accommodating statements on this: the US are understood to be undertaking their own 'post-mortem' exercise in this area. There have been problems that US briefings … are not properly cleared with us …"

208. Mr Howard stated that there was a need for urgent work to develop a coherent PR strategy for the ISG work and that he would provide further advice.

209. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 27 May reporting that work on SSE continued and would be enhanced by the ISG, but the timelines for establishing the ISG were "still fluid".[113]

210. Mr Watkins explained:

> "At present, Coalition Forces are working from a list of over 500 sites potentially linked to the development, production and storage of WMD, overwhelming[ly] concentrated in the US area of operations. As at 22 May, Coalition forces had initiated investigations into 122 of these sites, plus a further 55 sites identified since the conflict began. The most promising finds so far relate to mobile facilities. The Cabinet Office is receiving daily updates from the DIS ROCKINGHAM cell on all SSE activities."

[113] Letter Watkins to Manning, 27 May 2003, 'Iraq WMD: Update'.

211. Mr Watkins reported that the US was planning to expand and better co-ordinate the existing Coalition effort by bringing together current WMD and other post-conflict activities under the ISG. The draft mission for the ISG was to:

> "Organise, direct and apply capabilities and expertise in Iraq to discover, take custody of, exploit, disseminate and disable, eliminate information and material on individuals, records, NBC samples, weapons systems, materials, facilities, networks, and operations relative to:
> - Terrorism
> - Iraqi intelligence
> - WMD (Main Effort)
> - Individuals associated with the Iraqi regime/leadership with WMD
> - Individuals detained by the Iraqi regime
> - War crimes and crimes against humanity."

212. Mr Watkins reported that the UK would be providing the Deputy Commander, Brigadier John Deverell, who would "be running all ISG operations, with Maj Gen Dayton addressing external and higher level ISG issues". The UK would:

> "… also assign to the ISG the UK WMD related units already in theatre or about to arrive, including:
> The DIS Battlefield Intelligence Recovery Team
> The Joint Forces Interrogation Team
> 7630 (HUMINT) Sqn RauxAF [Royal Auxiliary Air Force]
> A Document Exploitation Team.
> "We are also investigating the most effective use of the joint NBC Regiment and other assets in theatre … DIS liaison staff in Washington will be reinforced to support ISG work, with a view to providing a UK presence in the ISG Fusion Cell in Washington. The DIS is also providing individual reinforcements to ISG in theatre.
> "We are also actively recruiting a cadre of UK ex-UNSCOM and ex-UNMOVIC inspectors, and others …"

213. Mr Watkins wrote that the UK needed to keep up the pressure on the US to ensure WMD detection received the attention it deserved. There also needed to be more work on public handling. There had been problems with US briefings in theatre and in Washington not being properly cleared with the UK. The UK had taken steps to ensure co-ordination was as good as possible. There was also a more general need for Whitehall to develop a "coherent and proactive PR strategy" for the ISG's work.

214. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair: "US has been very slow to get the Iraq Survey Group up + running – one reason for the PR difficulties – along with Rumsfeld."[114]

215. The ISG was launched on 30 May.[115]

216. On 4 June, officials advised that the ISG was expected to achieve an initial operating capability about 10 days later.[116]

217. Under an arrangement negotiated between the DoD and the CIA, the ISG was initially placed under US military command.

218. The UK planned to provide 100-120 personnel, including some former UNSCOM inspectors.[117]

219. In a background note for Mr Blair on the difference between the ISG and XTF-75, Mr Nicholas Cannon, Mr Blair's Assistant Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, described XTF-75 as "a slightly mechanical exercise, carried out by the military, and based on a fixed body of information".[118] The ISG was intended to be "a more flexible, intelligence-driven organisation", which would generate its own intelligence, including through interrogations, and have its own analysis capacity. The ISG would include former UNMOVIC inspectors, would target individuals as well as sites, and would have 1,300-1,400 personnel compared with 750-800 in XTF-75.

220. General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff, issued an addition to the 18 March Execute Directive for Op TELIC on 18 June. The Directive instructed Lt Gen Reith to provide air transport for the movement of small teams of ISG personnel between Iraq and Qatar as "a high priority".[119] The arrangement was to be kept under monthly review.

221. A revised Directive incorporating additional guidance, issued on 30 July, is described in the Box 'Revised Directive on UK military co-operation with the ISG' later in this Section.

222. The ISG became "fully operational" in early August.[120]

Pressure to set up an independent inquiry on pre-conflict intelligence

223. In late May, UK and US media comment on the implications of the failure to find WMD intensified.

224. On 29 May, the BBC broadcast allegations by the journalist Mr Andrew Gilligan that the September 2002 intelligence dossier had been "sexed up".

225. On 27 May, after delivering a speech on Iraq to the US Council on Foreign Relations, Secretary Rumsfeld was asked why Iraqi forces had not used chemical weapons during the invasion.[121] He speculated that one reason might have been that it had been decided to destroy the weapons before the conflict. More information would emerge as people were interrogated and there were still hundreds of suspect sites that had not been investigated. Secretary Rumsfeld concluded: "It will take time".

226. An interview with Mr Paul Wolfowitz, US Deputy Secretary of Defense, published in Vanity Fair magazine in late May, was widely reported to have suggested that the US had settled on WMD as the justification for the invasion of Iraq for "bureaucratic reasons" and as the only issue that all parts of the Administration could agree on given the disputes over whether there was a link between the Iraq regime and terrorists.[122]

227. On 31 May, the DoD challenged Vanity Fair's account of Mr Wolfowitz's comments.[123] It explained that the full transcript showed that Mr Wolfowitz had gone on to say that WMD had always been one of "three fundamental concerns", including support for terrorism and Saddam Hussein's criminal treatment of the Iraqi people.[124]

228. On 29 May, the Today programme on BBC Radio 4 broadcast allegations by the journalist Mr Andrew Gilligan that No.10 had called for the September 2002 intelligence dossier to be "sexed up".[125]

229. Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, wrote in his diaries on 30 May that the "WMD firestorm was getting worse" and that Mr Blair was "a bit jumpy" about the September dossier.[126] Mr Campbell wrote that he had spoken to Mr Miller and Mr Scarlett. Mr Scarlett had said that he was:

> "… emphatic in saying to people that it was not true that we pressured them … But he stopped short of agreeing to do a letter about it. He was very much up for helping us but only so far."

230. On 1 June, The Mail on Sunday published an article in which Mr Gilligan wrote that his source attributed the "exaggeration" in the September dossier to Mr Campbell.[127]

231. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that he had discussed the article with Mr Scarlett on 1 June, who was "minded to set out everything in a note to Ministers which they could draw on".[128]

232. On 2 June, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "… WMD still raging … T[ony] B[lair] was still in 'it's ridiculous' mode … The main problem of course was that there were no WMD discoveries beyond the two [mobile] labs, and no matter how much we said there were other priorities now, the public were being told as a matter of fact we had done wrong."

233. Mr Rycroft sent Mr Blair a series of background papers on 3 June.[129] The papers comprised:

- an FCO note on plans for third-party verification;[130]
- a telegram on US attitudes from the British Embassy Washington;[131]
- a short No.10 note attaching a factual MOD description of the role and composition of the ISG;[132]
- the transcript of a request by the Labour MP Mr Graham Allen for Parliament to set a deadline of 110 days for the Coalition to find WMD in Iraq, matching the 110 days given to Dr Blix before the conflict, and for there to be an independent inquiry if no internationally verified discovery had been made by then;[133] and
- a paper by the FCO on the terms of reference, proceedings and conclusions of the Franks Inquiry after the Falklands War, which published its report in January 1983.[134]

234. In its advice on UK plans for third-party verification, the FCO stated that the media would "provide some independent witnesses for finds in Iraq" but, "without independent validation", the Coalition might "well be accused of planting evidence".[135] UN validation, ideally by UNMOVIC inspectors, would carry the most weight where it really mattered to the UK, in the Security Council and with UK media. Ideally, the UK would like to give UNMOVIC inspectors access to any relevant finds. At the least, the Coalition should undertake to provide a full report of its investigation to the UN, including any test results.

235. The FCO added that the US remained "neuralgic" on UNMOVIC. Officials were seeking to engage with the US to revitalise and reform UNMOVIC when Dr Blix's contract expired on 25 June. US officials had not yet replied to a UK paper on restructuring UNMOVIC passed to them on 20 May. The US had, however, agreed that IAEA experts could check the security of a store of radioactive material.

236. The FCO was examining other options for independent validation, including using a laboratory in the Netherlands to test CBW samples, but the Dutch wanted UN cover for doing so.

237. Mr Rycroft commented to Mr Blair that UNMOVIC would be the most credible option for verification, but the US would "not permit that, at least not without a new leadership/mandate/organisation".[136]

238. The British Embassy Washington reported that comments from US media and prominent Senators were largely sympathetic to the US Government.[137] Most had argued that it was too early to draw conclusions, but some were calling for an independent inquiry into US intelligence on Iraqi WMD.

239. The Embassy also reported that the Chairmen of the Senate Armed Services and Intelligence Committees had agreed to conduct a joint inquiry into the pre-conflict use of intelligence by the US Administration. In addition, the White House was "crafting a line" on whether there should be an independent inquiry. The Embassy had "strongly encouraged" that it should be discussed in advance with the UK.

240. Mr Rycroft reported to Mr Blair that the two US Committees were "part of the normal Congressional oversight of the Administration".[138] The first hearing would be later in June.

241. Mr Rycroft also told Mr Blair that:

> "… according to the press, the CIA will provide shortly to Congress the 'underlying intelligence which was the basis' for [Secretary] Powell's UN presentation [on 5 February 2003]. This is in response to a request from the House [of Representatives] Intelligence Committee. Congressional Committees do not normally have access to raw intelligence, but they have done occasionally in the past: […]"

242. Mr Campbell recorded in his diaries that he had spoken to Mr Powell on 3 June and:

"… agreed a way forward was for the ISC to trail an inquiry before T[ony] B[lair] formally announced it and John S[carlett] to make clear nothing improper took place."[139]

243. Mr Campbell also sent Mr Blair a note advising that Parliamentary debates on Iraq on 4 June were :

"… about both the substance of the issue and the manner in which you deal with it. The overall aim must be to give explanation and context, calm the frenzy, and regain support for our basic position …"[140]

244. In relation to the substance, Mr Campbell wrote:

"… the current frenzy flows from the fact that apart from the two mobile labs nothing new has been found … so tomorrow is in part about saying as much as you can about the process towards discovery … The fact there are other more pressing issues – security, humanitarian, basic services – is relevant …

"What reasonable MPs will want is a signal that you understand the nature of the concern. We've had a week essentially of saying people are being ridiculous … but it won't go away … [A]s WMD was the stated reason for war, people want to know the full story, and that you set out the process as to how they're going to get it."

245. Mr Campbell added:

"The second issue relates to the intelligence services, and in particular the false charge that we wrongly used intelligence material, or asked the Agencies to do something they should not have, or that they were not happy with … [T]he media, particularly the BBC, are trying to create a 'no smoke without fire' atmosphere."

246. Mr Campbell wrote that the views of Mr Scarlett and others "that nothing improper took place – should be made public forcefully". He recommended Mr Blair:

"… say that, in the light of the controversy, you asked the JIC to set out for you a detailed analysis of the dossier from inception to publication, and as result not only you, but more importantly the JIC, are 100 percent clear that nothing wrong took place."

247. The dossier had been:

> "… drafted and redrafted by the JIC … in consultation with Allies. It was presented to No.10 as a JIC document and remains so. Obviously there were discussions with No.10, not least because you were writing a foreword and you were going to be presenting it to Parliament. But these discussions related primarily to your frontpiece printing, briefing materials, preparation of Q&A, in other words the normal stuff of presentation."

248. Mr Campbell stated that that part of the response would give Mr Blair:

"– acceptance of genuine concern
– process, with a sense of timescale, months not days – confidence they'll be found because of historical reality and the labs
– JIC assurance nothing wrong took place
– confirmation of the ISC inquiry
– statement of confidence in Agencies – reasons for no need for other inquiry."

249. The House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) announced on 3 June that it would hold an inquiry into "The Decision to go to War in Iraq".[141] The FAC stated:

> "The inquiry will consider whether the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, within the Government as a whole, presented accurate and complete information to Parliament in the period leading up to military action in Iraq, particularly in relation to Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. The Committee will hear oral evidence from several witnesses in June and will report to the House in July."

250. On 4 June, Mr Scarlett sent Mr Blair a written explanation of the process behind the compilation of the September dossier.[142] The letter, described in greater detail in Section 4.2, concluded:

> "At no stage in the drafting process … was there an attempt, from No.10 or elsewhere, to overrule the judgements of the JIC or my judgement as the person in charge."

251. Mr Blair discussed the position he would take at Prime Minister's Questions (PMQs) in a meeting on 4 June with Sir David Omand (Cabinet Office Permanent Secretary and Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator), Mr Scarlett, Sir Richard Dearlove and No.10 officials.[143]

House of Commons debates on Iraq, 4 June 2003

252. The House of Commons held two debates on Iraq on 4 June.

253. During the second debate, the House of Commons rejected an Opposition motion calling for an independent inquiry into the use of intelligence.

254. Iraq was also raised during PMQs and in response to Mr Blair's statement about the G8 summit in Evian, France, from 1 to 3 June.

255. During the exchanges on Iraq on 4 June, MPs raised repeatedly:

- the failure to find WMD in Iraq;
- statements made by the Government before the conflict about the intelligence on Iraq's capabilities and intent; and
- the need for an independent, judge-led, inquiry.

256. Mr Blair told the House of Commons that:

- It was "accepted" by the international community and the Security Council that Saddam Hussein had possessed WMD and had been "a threat to the world".
- He welcomed the ISC inquiry into the role of intelligence in Iraq.
- There had been no attempt at any time to override "the intelligence judgements" of the JIC.
- The ISG had "just gone into Iraq" and "should be allowed to get on with its job".
- He had "no doubt" that the ISG would find "the clearest evidence" of Saddam Hussein's WMD.
- The alternative thesis, that Saddam Hussein had decided to get rid of the WMD, was difficult to accept.

257. In the first House of Commons debate on Iraq on 4 June, Ms Joan Ruddock (Labour) and Dr Jenny Tonge (Liberal Democrat) called for the urgent return of UN inspectors. Dr Tonge expressed concern about the danger of WMD, if it existed, being found and used.[144]

258. During PMQs Mr Blair was asked a series of questions about Iraq.[145]

[145] House of Commons, Official Report, 4 June 2003, columns 146-156.

259. In response to a question from Ms Oona King (Labour) about the "strong presumption" of the UN inspectors that Saddam Hussein had not destroyed biological and chemical agents and his view of the allegations that the threat had been exaggerated, Mr Blair replied:

> "… that it was accepted by the entire international community, and not least by the UN Security Council, that Saddam Hussein did indeed have weapons of mass destruction and was a threat to the world … [T]he Iraq Survey Group … is literally now just beginning its work, because the priority after the conflict was to rebuild Iraq and to make sure that the humanitarian concerns of the Iraqi people were achieved."

260. Mr Blair added:

> "Perhaps I can now take this opportunity to inform the House that the Intelligence and Security Committee … contacted the Government in early May to conduct an inquiry into the role of intelligence in Iraq. I welcome this and I can assure the House that the Government will co-operate fully with it."

261. Asked by Mr Iain Duncan Smith, the Leader of the Opposition, about remarks made by Dr John Reid, the Leader of the House, during an interview on the BBC's Today programme, that "rogue elements within the intelligence services are undermining the Government and their numbers are growing", Mr Blair replied:

> "It is obvious from what the Today programme has said – if that source is to be believed – that of course there was somebody from within the intelligence community who spoke to the media. But I want to say that the security services and intelligence services do a superb job …"

262. Asked how senior he thought the people making the allegations were and how many of them there were, Mr Blair told Mr Duncan Smith that the source was anonymous, but he:

> "… did not believe that the person who is talking is a member of the Joint Intelligence Committee and … I have spoken and conferred with the Chairman of the … Committee – that there was no attempt, at any time, by any official, or Minister, or member of No.10 Downing Street staff, to override the intelligence judgements of the Joint Intelligence Committee. That includes the judgement about the so-called 45 minutes [see Section 4.2]. It was a judgement made by the Joint Intelligence Committee and by that committee alone."

263. Referring again to the allegations made by Dr Reid, and allegations from others that Mr Blair had "misled Parliament and the country", Mr Duncan Smith asked Mr Blair to publish "the dossier given to him by the JIC before the one that he published in September".

264. Mr Blair replied:

> "In relation to all those issues, the Intelligence and Security Committee is at full liberty to go through all the Joint Intelligence Committee assessments and produce a report on them. Because of the importance of the issue, it is only right that a report is published so that people can make a judgement on it. However the claims that have been made are simply false …"

265. Mr Duncan Smith stated that Mr Blair would allow the ISC to see "only the intelligence reports that he wanted it to see" and that, as the Committee was being "asked to investigate the Prime Minister's role and that of his closest advisers … surely the only way to clear up the problem is to have an independent inquiry".

266. Mr Blair replied that Mr Duncan Smith:

> "… was not making an allegation about the intelligence being wrong. On the contrary, he was rebutting the allegation that the intelligence was wrong … it is not true that I will withhold from it [the ISC] the Joint Intelligence Committee assessments. In addition, the Committee can, in accordance with its normal practice, interview those people in the security services who drew up the JIC reports. That is surely a fair way to proceed. I will then publish the report."

267. In response to further questioning from Mr Duncan Smith, Mr Blair stated:

> "I have already said that we will produce all the evidence for the Intelligence and Security Committee. I really think that is the sensible and right way to proceed. It can then come to a considered judgement and I will publish the report."

268. Mr Blair also rebutted the allegation that the source for "the 45 minute claim was an Iraqi defector of dubious reliability", stating that "he was an established and reliable source".

269. Addressing a question from Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, about why people should allow more time and show patience in the search for WMD, Mr Blair replied:

> "… The reason I ask people to be patient is that the group has just gone into Iraq: it should be allowed to get on with its job, investigate the sites, interview the witnesses and then report back to us."

270. Mr Kennedy also asked for "a fully independent judicial review of what has just gone on".

271. Mr Elfyn Llwyd (Plaid Cymru) also called for "a full public inquiry".

272. During his subsequent statement about the G8 summit in Evian, France, from 1 to 3 June, Mr Blair was asked repeatedly about the search for WMD and to consider an independent inquiry.[146]

273. In response to Mr Duncan Smith, Mr Blair stated:

> "… the Iraq Survey Group is the body that will be able to … interview the scientists and visit the sites. There are literally thousands of sites … information is coming up the entire time, but it is only now … that a dedicated team of people, which includes former UN inspectors … will be able to go in and do the job properly … I have no doubt that they will find the clearest evidence of Saddam's weapons of mass destruction.
> "The alternative thesis is that, having for years obstructed the UN, having had 12 years of sanctions, having kicked out the inspectors in 1998, and having invited an invasion by defying the UN, Saddam decided to get rid of the weapons of mass destruction anyway. That is an odd thesis to accept."

274. Referring to the press reporting of remarks made by Secretary Rumsfeld and Mr Wolfowitz, Mr Blair added that the full transcripts of the interviews showed they were "arguing that it will be difficult to say exactly what has happened to the weapons until we collect the evidence"; and that it had always been the UK Government's case that there had been "a systematic campaign of concealment once Saddam knew the inspectors were going back in".

275. In response to points raised by Mr Ken Clarke (Conservative), including on the wider consequences if it turned out that the Government's assertion that military force was needed to disarm Iraq turned out not to be true, Mr Blair replied:

> "… the basis on which we went to conflict was that in resolution 1441, Iraq was given a final chance to comply … and the conclusion that we drew six months later was that it was not doing so. The problem in the UN Security Council is that we could not get agreement even to the fact that, if it [Iraq] carried on not complying fully and unconditionally … we could take action. That was obviously an unacceptable situation.
> "… I stand entirely by the dossier that we issued and the intelligence contained in it … When we get a proper and fully documented account of what it [the ISG] has found, we will present it … [It] would be sensible to suspend our judgement until that time, but I stand fully by what our intelligence agencies put out …"

276. Asked by Ms Barbara Follett (Labour) about the role of the UN, Mr Blair stated that "for obvious reasons there will have to be some independent verification" at the end of the process; and that was being discussed by Mr Straw with his counterparts.

[146] House of Commons, Official Report, 4 June 2003, columns 157-176.

277. Asked by Mr Brian H Donohoe (Labour) if he would allow the Foreign Affairs Committee to have the same access to the evidence and witnesses as the ISC, Mr Blair stated that "it would not be sensible to have two inquiries competing".

278. Asked by Mr Denzil Davies (Labour) whether the "failure of the Coalition to look for" weapons of mass destruction "as a matter of the highest priority in the immediate aftermath of the war could well have provided the opportunity for many of the weapons – if they are there – to find their way into the hands of the various terrorist groups that are operating in and around the Middle East", Mr Blair replied that that was a crucial issue but he did not think it was wrong:

> "… for the Coalition to have said that our first priority at the end of the conflict … had to be reconstruction and the humanitarian position of the Iraqi people. Indeed we would have been criticised roundly if we had not done so."

279. Mr Blair's statement about the G8 summit was followed by a second debate on Iraq.[147]

280. The Liberal Democrat motion tabled for the debate stated:

> "That this House recalls the Prime Minister's assertion that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction capable of being used at 45 minutes' notice; further recalls the Government's contention that these weapons posed an imminent danger to the United Kingdom and its forces; notes that to date no such weapons have been found; and calls for an independent inquiry into the handling of the intelligence received, its assessment and the decisions made by Ministers based upon it."

281. In his speech opening the debate, Mr Menzies Campbell, Liberal Democrat Foreign Affairs Spokesperson, set out in detail his interpretation of the case which had been made by the Government before the conflict; questioned whether military action was "truly a last resort" and if action to bring an end to the regime of Saddam Hussein was proportionate; and set out the rationale for an independent Inquiry which would be answerable to the public, "not just to the Prime Minister or the House".

282. The Government tabled an amendment to the Liberal Democrat motion stating that the ISC was "the appropriate body to carry out any Inquiry into intelligence relating to Iraq" and asking the House to note the terms of resolution 1483 "in relation to Iraq's disarmament obligations", which had been adopted while Parliament was in recess.

283. In his speech in support of the amendment, which addressed a wide range of issues, not just WMD, Mr Straw stated that the Government had not, so far as he was aware, used some of the words in the Liberal Democrat motion. It had not referred to Iraq's weapons posing an "imminent danger"; it had:

> "… talked about a threat to international peace and security, as had the United Nations."

[147] House of Commons, Official Report, 4 June 2003, columns 180-232.

284. Mr Straw also stated that the September 2002 dossier had said "that Iraq's military planning allowed for some of the weapons of mass destruction to be readied within 45 minutes of an order to use them".

285. Subsequently, Mr Straw said that the Foreword was:

> "… subject to discussion and agreement from the head of the JIC to ensure, plainly that what was in the Foreword was entirely consistent with what was in the body of the document."

286. Asked by Mr Michael Portillo (Conservative) whether "any intelligence officers" had remonstrated with Mr Blair or any other Minister that the 45 minutes point should not have been included in the Foreword to the dossier, because it was based only on a single source, Mr Straw replied "no".

287. Pressed by Mr Robin Cook (Labour) to acknowledge that the policy of containment had been successful and that the statement was wrong because no weapons ready for use within 45 minutes had been found in Iraq, Mr Straw replied:

> "I do not accept that, because we have not yet been able to find physical evidence of the possession of such weapons, these weapons did not therefore exist. That flies in the face of all the other evidence …"

288. Mr Straw stated that the 45 minutes point was not "a key factor in the decision to go to war", and "The basis for action was not an intelligence dossier that had been put before the House six months before".

289. In response to an intervention from Mr Kennedy pointing out what Mr Blair had said in his speech to the House on 24 September about Iraq's WMD programmes, Mr Straw stated that the international community had judged that Iraq posed a threat to international peace and security and it was:

> "… impossible to explain Saddam's behaviour unless he had weapons of mass destruction.
> "Dr Blix is just about to publish a further report … The chief weapon inspector said that Baghdad had supplied his team with increasingly detailed information but that: even at the end, Iraq failed to allay suspicions that it had something to hide, and its trend of withholding pertinent information meant that the suspicions mounted and mounted.
> "That was true for Dr Blix and it was also true for the Security Council … It is impossible to read those reports [from the inspectors to the Security Council] and to set them against the evidence of Saddam's behaviour without coming to the conclusion that, in Dr Blix's words, there was a strong presumption for the holding of those weapons."

290. In the concluding section of his speech, Mr Straw asked the critics of the Government:

> "… whether they seriously believed that when Saddam Hussein chose confrontation rather than co-operation, he possessed no weapons of mass destruction following our decision on 18 March? Do they seriously argue that Saddam had disposed of all his poisons and toxins and missiles, and then deliberately chosen not to prove their destruction but to go down a path that led to his downfall? …
> "Even if we make the most extreme allowances … how can we possibly believe that he cheated and deceived the international community year after year, until we had no option but military action, and yet that he possessed no weapons of mass destruction?
> "… Is it not more likely that Saddam, knowing the game was up and realising that we meant what we said, went to extraordinary lengths to dismantle, conceal and disperse the weapons and any evidence of their existence? … Saddam had spent years perfecting the art of concealment and carried that out so completely that it will take some time to search hundreds of sites, interview thousands of scientists and locate and evaluate what remains of the documentary and physical evidence."

291. In his speech, Mr Michael Ancram, the Shadow Foreign Secretary, referred to five questions posed by Mr Duncan Smith in a letter to Mr Blair the previous day.

292. The questions posed by Mr Ancram can be summarised as:

- Whether the dossier's original conclusion had been deleted and a new preamble, reportedly written by the Prime Minister, inserted?
- If the 45 minutes point was not significant, why did the information appear three times in the dossier; why had Mr Blair referred to it in his speech on 24 September 2002; and was it usual to use single-source intelligence?
- A request for a "categorical assurance that there was no disagreement between Downing Street and the intelligence Services on the handling of intelligence information".
- What was the new, but so far unpublished, information referred to by Mr Blair in an interview on 1 June?

293. Mr Ancram stated that the Opposition proposed:

> "… a resolution in both Houses of Parliament under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921. That is the most powerful form of inquiry and is appropriate for an issue of this gravity. The tribunal would be chaired by a senior judge …"

294. Mr Ancram also made clear that such an inquiry was required to address the way intelligence had been used. It was "not about the justification for action in Iraq; nor … about the conduct of that action".

295. The Liberal Democrat motion was defeated by 301 votes to 203 and the Government amendment was agreed without a further vote.

296. Demands for an independent judge-led inquiry persisted through the summer.

297. Responding to a question from Mr Kennedy at PMQs on 18 June about whether the Government had been told by SIS that Iraq did not possess WMD "capable of posing a direct threat to British security", Mr Blair stated:

> "The intelligence that we put out in the dossier last September described absolutely accurately the position of the Government … that Saddam was indeed a threat to his region and the wider world. I always made it clear that the issue was not whether he was about to launch an immediate strike on Britain: the issue was whether he posed a threat to his region and to the wider world."[148]

298. Asked by Mr Kennedy whether he thought the issue could be "adequately investigated by a Foreign Affairs Committee to which he refuses to give evidence and a Joint Intelligence Committee which he controls", and whether there could not be "a proper independent judicial inquiry", Mr Blair stated that the ISC was "entirely capable of investigating all the facts and getting to the truth".

299. The House of Commons' second debate on setting up an independent inquiry took place on 15 July and is described later in this Section.

Dr Blix's final report to the Security Council

300. Dr Blix submitted UNMOVIC's 13th quarterly report to the Security Council on 30 May.[149]

301. In presenting the report to the Council on 5 June, Dr Blix highlighted a number of points, including:

- The Commission had not at any time "found evidence of the continuation or resumption of programmes of weapons of mass destruction or significant quantities of proscribed items", whether from pre-1991 or later.
- That did "not necessarily mean that such items could not exist. They might". Long lists of items remained "unaccounted for", but it was "not justified to jump to the conclusion that something exists just because it is unaccounted for".
- The list of unaccounted for items had "not been shortened by inspections or Iraqi declarations, explanations or documentation"; and it was Iraq's task to convince the inspectors that the items did not exist. Without that, the international community could not "have confidence that past programmes or any remaining part of them have been terminated". An "effective presence of international inspectors" would, however, "serve as a deterrent against efforts aimed at reactivating or developing new programmes".

- Iraq had "made considerable efforts to provide explanations, to begin inquiries and to undertake exploration and excavations" during the month and a half before UNMOVIC's withdrawal.
- "… [T]hose efforts did not bring the answers needed … We did not have time to interview the large number of persons who were said by Iraq to have participated in the unilateral destruction of biological and chemical weapons in 1991. Such interviews might have helped towards the resolution of some outstanding issues, although one must be aware that the totalitarian regime in Iraq continued to cast a shadow on the credibility of all interviews."
- The programme to destroy the Al Samoud 2 missiles had not been completed, and "there was no time to assess whether the Al Fatah missile stayed within the range allowed".
- The report showed that the weapons destroyed before the inspectors left in 1998 "were, in almost all cases declared by Iraq, and that the destruction occurred before 1993 in the case of missiles, and before 1994 in the case of chemical weapons".
- The existence and scope of the biological weapons programme was uncovered by UNSCOM in 1995, "despite Iraq's denials and concealment efforts"; "only a few remnants" of the programme were subsequently found. "A great deal – Iraq asserts all – was unilaterally destroyed in 1991."
- The lack of significant finds over many years "could be because the items were unilaterally destroyed by the Iraqi authorities or else they were effectively concealed by them". In the "new environment in which there is full access and co-operation, and in which knowledgeable witnesses should no longer be inhibited from revealing what they know, it should be possible to establish the truth".
- The inspectors had looked for sites where mobile facilities could be operated and Iraq had presented some information about the mobile systems they possessed which did not match "the description which has recently been made available to us, as well as the media, by the United States". UNMOVIC could not "make a proper evaluation of the depicted vehicles on the basis of the published material alone".
- UNMOVIC remained "ready to resume work in Iraq as an independent verifier or to conduct long-term monitoring, should the Council so decide".

302. Reporting on the subsequent discussion in informal consultations, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that most members of the Council saw a future role for UNMOVIC and asked to be kept updated on Coalition activities.[150]

The JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD and the WMD Task Force

303. In June, the Government set up two bodies to improve oversight and co-ordination of the UK approach to Iraqi WMD:

- the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD, responsible to the JIC for "strategic co-ordination of all intelligence implications related to Iraq's WMD programmes", including Parliamentary and media issues; and
- the WMD Task Force, with a focus on the ISG and information flows between London, Washington and Iraq.

304. On 3 June, after a discussion with Sir David Manning and Sir David Omand, Mr Scarlett informed Sir David Manning that he proposed to establish a "Working Group" on Iraq/WMD which would act as a sub-committee of the JIC.[151]

305. Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "The current public debate about WMD in Iraq raises a series of basic questions about intelligence, its collection, assessment and role in policy making and public presentation. It therefore touches upon the vital interests of the intelligence community. The management of our community response, indeed the response of the Government, to these questions will be complicated and likely to remain a requirement for some time. We need to consider whether we have the right structures in place to co-ordinate this to the best effect."

306. The Group would need to meet regularly to address:

- "Exploitation in Iraq and elsewhere …";
- "Arrangements for assessing the results …";
- "Public policy issues", including "Parliamentary aspects" and "support for the Government response to the ISC Inquiry";
- "Public presentation", including "proactive and reactive responses to media coverage";
- "Co-ordination with US Agencies and authorities."

307. The Group would not be large, but should include representatives from the FCO, the MOD, DIS, SIS, Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) and OD Sec. Membership should be at a senior level.

[151] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 3 June 2003, 'Iraq/WMD: JIC Co-ordination'.

308. Mr Scarlett stated that the new Group would operate at the "strategic, co-ordination level". It would need to avoid overlap with other groups, in particular the Executive Group (also known as the Evidence and Elimination Task Force and, later, the Iraq WMD Task Force), led by Mr Howard, which oversaw UK interests in the ISG.

309. The draft Terms of Reference, circulated separately by Mr Scarlett, stated:

> "The Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD will be responsible to the Joint Intelligence Committee for:
> - The strategic co-ordination of all intelligence implications related to Iraq's WMD programmes, including:
> - the [intelligence] community's response to those issues;
> - the [intelligence] community's advice to Government;
> - Parliamentary issues;
> - media issues;
> - relations with other groups and allies."[152]

310. At its first meeting on 5 June, the Sub-Committee agreed the following Terms of Reference:

> "The Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD will be responsible to the Joint Intelligence Committee for:
> - The strategic co-ordination, and where necessary management, of all information and intelligence implications related to Iraq's WMD programmes, including:
> - the [intelligence] community's response to these issues;
> - the [intelligence] community's advice to Government;
> - Parliamentary issues, including the co-ordination of the Government's response to the Intelligence and Security Committee inquiry and the intelligence aspects of the Foreign Affairs Committee inquiry;
> - media issues;
> - relations with other groups and allies.
> "The Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee will chair the Group …"[153]

311. The meeting agreed that membership of the Committee should be expanded to include the Home Office, but the No.10 Press Office should not have formal representation. It also noted the importance of ensuring consistency of message and discussed the arrangements for units in the Cabinet Office and the FCO to co-ordinate the responses to, respectively, the ISC and FAC.

312. On 6 June, Mr Howard informed members of the Evidence and Elimination Task Force that, as a result of the "intense media and parliamentary interest in Iraqi WMD and related UK dossiers", there would be "a shift of gear" in the intensity of Task Force activity and its role.[154]

313. The Task Force "Mark 2" would focus on supporting the ISG's WMD work and continuing to improve information flows between London, Washington and theatre, while the new JIC Group focused on the inquiries to be conducted by the FAC and ISC. Reflecting the establishment of the ISG, the Task Force would become more intelligence-led, providing "guidance, ideas and information to the ISG for exploitation". Task Force membership would need to reflect those changes. The UK would be increasing its capabilities on the ground to feed in to the ISG's work.

314. Mr Howard circulated Terms of Reference for the Task Force on 18 June.[155] Its five functions were:

- To contribute to US/UK/AUS strategic guidance on the conduct of the search for Iraqi WMD through the Iraq Survey Group and other agencies.
- To monitor, report and consider public handling of significant WMD related discoveries.
- To co-ordinate the UK contribution to the ISG and other bodies associated with the search for Iraqi WMD.
- To consider longer term issues associated with Iraqi WMD including destruction and counter-proliferation.
- To provide advice and reports as required to Ministers and other senior management in MOD and elsewhere in Whitehall as appropriate."

315. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry:

> "The actual day-to-day conduct of business with the ISG was conducted by something called the Executive Group [the WMD Task Force], which was overseen by the Deputy Chief of Defence Intelligence [DCDI, Mr Howard]. So it was … more on the DIS/MOD side, and that was where the direction of the British contribution to the ISG and personnel was directed from.
> "But the JIC sort of overall, I as Chairman of the JIC, and I, in particular, as Chairman of the JIC sub-group on Iraq WMD … had that as part of our specific remit, that we needed to oversee the relationship with the ISG. So I was either in direct contact myself with David Kay [the first Head of the ISG], for the rest of 2003, and then

Charles Duelfer [Dr Kay's successor] into 2004 … or I was obviously hearing about them because I was receiving reports from DCDI, who either himself went to Baghdad or was conducting the contacts. So there was very regular contact."[156]

UK concerns about the ISG's slow start

316. During June, Ministers and senior officials pressed the US to ensure a rapid start to the ISG's work.

317. Mr Blair raised with President Bush the urgent need to find and promise immunity to personnel who had worked on Iraq's WMD programmes.

318. Shortly afterwards, President Bush transferred responsibility for the ISG from Secretary Rumsfeld to Mr Tenet.

319. Mr Blair met President Bush over breakfast at the G8 Summit in Evian on 2 June.[157] Mr Blair said there was "an urgent problem" over WMD. The scientists and technicians who would tell the truth about the WMD programme needed to be found. That meant being ready to promise immunity, otherwise they would be too frightened to talk. Mr Blair said he would look into whether there was a UK judge or lawyer who might be appointed as Official Prosecutor with authority to agree plea bargains.

320. Following his visit to Iraq, Mr Blair chaired a meeting on 3 June, attended by Mr Hoon, Baroness Amos (the International Development Secretary), Sir Michael Jay (FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), in Mr Straw's absence) and No.10 officials, which discussed a range of issues (see Section 10.1).[158]

321. After the meeting, Mr Cannon commissioned a number of papers to be ready before a further meeting on 6 June, including advice on "a judge/lawyer/interrogator to negotiate incentive/immunity packages for Iraqi WMD scientists and officials".

322. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 4 June about the need, given the continuing media focus on WMD, for short- and medium-term strategies for public handling of the search for WMD.[159]

323. Mr Watkins stated that the "most convincing evidence" of an illicit Iraqi WMD programme remained "the alleged mobile BW trailers currently under investigation" at Baghdad Airport. The draft of "a preliminary inter-agency report" suggested that "one of the trailers was not capable of producing BW agent". That was, however, "likely to be subject to considerable revision", and there was "a strong likelihood that the eventual conclusions will be very close to our own". There was "a lot of work to be done" on the issues, including a further visit by UK experts.

324. Without a major find of WMD-related material which could "justifiably be described as a smoking gun", the "hunt for evidence" was "likely to take some months". Finding "a body of evidence" that persuaded "everybody that the war was proportionate to the threat" was "unlikely". But it needed "to be enough to convince mainstream public, media and parliamentary opinion that a programme existed and had been concealed".

325. Mr Hoon thought the Government should:

- be prepared to publicise significant discoveries only once they had been fully validated and after careful co-ordination with the US;
- periodically make public a consolidated and validated picture of developments, with the first before the summer break, provided there was "enough material to justify it"; and
- be in a position to respond to emerging stories, with better co-ordination of US and UK public positions.

326. The "public position could be reinforced" if it were possible in due course to "involve the UN [in] the verification process". The ISG would host at least one embedded journalist. Mr Hoon had offered a UK communications adviser in response to a US request for assistance with ISG communications.

327. Mr Watkins wrote that a "more radical approach … could be to play down WMD … and focus on other areas"; but Mr Hoon doubted that would work. In his view, "the WMD issue would not go away, particular[ly] in the UK. Any attempt to brush it aside or downgrade its importance" was "likely to backfire".

328. Asked if he had any comments, Mr Scarlett wrote: "Not really. This is sensible but the pace has hottened up. My JIC sub-committee will watch (and drive) specific issues v. closely."[160]

329. Following a meeting of the AHMGIR on 5 June, which considered the papers commissioned by Mr Cannon on 3 June, Mr Straw provided a paper on possible incentives for Iraqi WMD personnel for Mr Blair to send to President Bush.[161]

330. The paper stated that UNSCOM had produced a list of "around 6,500 Iraqis who had been involved in … prohibited weapons programmes", but "the true figure could be considerably higher". Coalition Forces had captured a few high-ranking individuals, but there had been "no contact with the great mass of personnel", which "should be a high priority" for the ISG.

[161] Letter Straw to Blair, 5 June 2003, 'Iraq: winning the peace' attaching Paper [unattributed], [undated], 'Iraqi WMD Personnel'.

331. The paper recommended a combination of carrots and sticks. Proposed incentives were:

- immunity from prosecution;
- personal security;
- financial security; and
- job security.

332. The Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) de-Ba'athification programme (see Section 11) and the dissolution of Saddam Hussein's security apparatus was "a strong perverse incentive for anyone affected … not to co-operate with the Coalition".

333. The paper stated that the threat of prosecution in the Iraqi courts for concealing evidence might be sufficient to encourage personnel to come forward.

334. The paper highlighted the need for:

- a public information campaign explaining how people should get in touch;
- facilities in Iraq to receive, filter and interview personnel; and
- an ISG ability to respond quickly to credible information. Looting and arson could already have destroyed valuable evidence.

335. On 5 June, at Sir David Manning's request, Sir Richard Dearlove sent No.10 an outline for Mr Blair on "what SIS will do additionally over the next six to eight weeks to uncover evidence of Iraqi WMD".[162]

336. Sir Richard hoped that, by the end of July, the ISG would be fully functional and able to take activity forward with intelligence support from SIS. If necessary, SIS should be able to sustain its own effort once the ISG was operational. In the meantime, Sir Richard intended:

> "… to put more SIS staff (or staff borrowed from other Agencies) on the ground and to boost the WMD-related effort in concert with the MOD. Our aim is primarily to identify Iraqi scientists who will attest in public to what is in the intelligence record. As regard logistics (ground penetrating radar, transport etc) I believe MOD can offer us all we need."

337. Sir Richard explained that, over the next six to eight weeks, SIS aimed to pursue to a conclusion all CBW and missile leads involving more junior scientists and officers. In pursuing those individuals, it would be important to agree a common position on adequate incentive and immunities with the US. Mr Bowen was pursuing the issue, but it would probably be necessary "to cut through the US bureaucracy to achieve a rapid satisfactory outcome".

[162] Letter C to Manning, 5 June 2003, 'WMD in Iraq'.

338. Sir Richard added that SIS had been "closely involved in the protracted saga of the [BW] trailers". The extended debate over the trailers' function "served to underline the importance of controlling publicity and of co-ordination both with the US and within the US system". He hoped that would become easier to manage once the ISG was up and running.

339. In conclusion, Sir Richard said that, over the next week, SIS would be refining requirements for the "surge effort" described in his letter.

340. During his conversation with President Bush on 6 June, Mr Blair stressed the importance of offering inducements to Iraqis involved in WMD programmes.[163] He said that he was relaxed about the ISG and confident it would get results.

341. At its meeting on 6 June, the Evidence and Elimination Task Force was informed that, in relation to the recruitment of inspectors, Dr David Kelly, MOD Special Adviser Counter-proliferation and Arms Control, was conducting "a recce to theatre", which would "inform a further briefing of prospective UK ISG inspectors on 13 June".[164]

342. The Task Force was also informed:

- "All BW samples" had, "so far, been negative or inconclusive". The official report on samples from the bio-trailer was "inconclusive".
- The Vice Chief of the Defence Staff had "formed a 'Tiger Team' to look into WMD lessons learned".

343. Reporting the main points to have emerged from the meeting, Mr Dowse wrote:

- "… [d]espite all previous assurances, the US have done no further investigation of the first two bio-lab trailers and – incredibly – have lost the third … it was left unguarded and disappeared".
- The DoD was suggesting "adopting as 'hypotheses' that Iraq either destroyed all its WMD before the war, or hid it in Syria (and Sudan) – and then focusing intelligence collection efforts on finding evidence to prove this. This looked dangerous …"
- The ISG had "no clear lines of command … or of reporting back to Washington".
- There was "clear competition between US agencies".[165]

344. Mr Blair discussed the ISG with Mr Straw and Mr Hoon on 9 June.[166] They agreed that it needed to become operational as quickly as possible with clear command and control arrangements.

[166] Letter Manning to McDonald, 9 June 2003, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

345. In his conversation with Dr Rice on 9 June, Sir David Manning reported Mr Blair's view.[167] He assured Dr Rice that the UK would give its best resources to the intelligence component of the ISG, but the UK needed access to all the relevant information.

346. Sir David reported that Dr Rice had assured him that she had been asked to take action after Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush on 2 June, and that responsibility for WMD had been transferred from Secretary Rumsfeld to Mr Tenet, who was to ensure that the ISG concentrated on two priorities: the search for WMD and the search for Saddam Hussein and his sons. Mr Tenet intended to recruit Dr David Kay, a former inspector, to help shape the WMD effort.

347. Sir David also reported that he had told Dr Rice that action on incentives and immunities was "extremely urgent". The absence of interviews had been a "major weakness" in UNMOVIC's approach.

348. Sir David commented that Mr Blair's concerns had clearly registered with President Bush and that Sir Richard Dearlove would be in touch with Mr Tenet "shortly".

349. Mr Cannon informed Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Office that, in response to the US "shake-up" of oversight of the ISG, Sir David Manning thought that the "most appropriate channel" to follow up Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush would be for Sir Richard to write to Mr Tenet setting out the UK's views.[168] Mr Scarlett agreed.

350. As the basis for a letter, Mr Cannon provided a draft, which had been cleared with Mr Scarlett, together with a copy of the FCO paper on incentives to encourage Iraqi WMD personnel to come forward.

351. The draft identified six "key priority areas" for the success of the ISG:

- a clear command structure, with clear priorities and an effective flow of information;
- an intelligence-led campaign with resources put to best use; the UK had "some skills in this area" and was "keen to contribute";
- complete sharing of intelligence generated by the ISG "without restrictions of access at any level"; the UK was "keen to play its full part";
- inducements and immunity; there was "some experience in this area which … could be helpful";
- "a sense of drive and urgency"; and
- logistic support.

[168] Letter Cannon to PS/C, 10 June 2003, 'Iraq Survey Group' attaching Paper [unattributed], [undated], 'Iraq Survey Group'.

352. The draft concluded:

> "We agree that we need to take this investigation forward patiently and prudently, without letting the media and the anti-intervention lobby rattle us. But we have to move fast to secure the physical evidence of WMD and more importantly the people, the scientists and administrators with the knowledge of the programmes, before they have time to get together and work out a co-ordinated strategy for dealing with us … [and] before they start taking their proliferation skills somewhere else."

353. Following a discussion with Mr Tenet on 11 June, Sir Richard Dearlove sent him the two papers provided by Mr Cannon.[169] Sir Richard explained that SIS had made arrangements to reinforce and reorganise in Iraq to bridge the gap until the ISG was fully operational. He also asked Mr Tenet for details of the new command and control arrangements for the ISG so that decisions could be made on adjustments needed in the UK.

354. Mr Tenet announced Dr Kay's appointment as "Special Advisor for Strategy regarding Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction Programs" (commonly known as the Head of the ISG) on 11 June 2003.[170]

355. In his memoir, Mr Tenet wrote:

> "Military personnel would have to do the lion's share of the actual searching and provide almost all of the physical security for those engaging in the mission. To get around that hurdle, we carefully negotiated a memorandum of understanding with DOD, spelling out how a senior advisor appointed by me would work with, but not command, what was called the Iraq Survey Group (ISG), which would stay technically under the command of a two-star general reporting to the Secretary of Defense."[171]

356. Mr Tenet also wrote:

> "Our instructions to Kay were simple. Find the truth. We promised him the resources he needed and an absence of interference from the home front. I am confident that we delivered both."

357. Mr Tenet added, "We protected Kay's independence fiercely."

358. Senior US, UK and Australian military officers and civilians involved with the ISG took part in weekly video conferences linking Baghdad with capital cities.[172] Participants included Secretary Rumsfeld's Office, CENTCOM, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the DIA, the US intelligence office in Baghdad, and UK and Australian intelligence.

359. On 12 June, Mr Straw told Cabinet that the ISG was starting work. Incentives and immunities to encourage Iraqi co-operation were being sorted out.[173]

360. There is no record in the minutes that Mr Straw explained the UK's role or responsibilities to Cabinet.[174]

361. Sir Richard Dearlove sent Sir David Manning a copy of the letter to Mr Tenet on 16 June.[175]

362. In a covering letter to Sir David Manning, Sir Richard suggested:

> "With CIA in the ISG driving seat on WMD, SIS will need to take a more prominent role in the co-ordination of the UK effort, as we are best placed to liaise with CIA here, in Washington and on the ground in Iraq."

363. Depending on what Mr Tenet told Sir Richard about command, control and communications arrangements for the ISG, it might be necessary to "re-jig" the Whitehall arrangements on WMD to reflect a more prominent SIS role. Any changes would need to avoid detracting from the "key contribution of DIS/MOD, who are providing the major UK input of resources and expertise, here and in the field".

364. Sir Richard suggested setting "some review deadlines", with a first review at the end of July to assess the impact of the joint SIS/DIS "surge effort" and the interface between that effort and the start of the ISG. He suggested a date around the end of September for a first formal review of the ISG.

365. Sir Richard commented:

> "Although the UK will be the junior partner in the ISG, and we may need to manage expectations on both sides of the Atlantic about what it can achieve, I hope that we will be able to influence its focus and pace of activity."

366. Sir David Manning endorsed Sir Richard Dearlove's proposals and asked Sir Richard to discuss the streamlining of Whitehall machinery with Mr Scarlett.[176] Sir David envisaged the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD remaining the focal point for the overall Whitehall effort, "but it will clearly need to work very closely with the SIS/CIA liaison machinery".

367. SIS3 reported, after visiting Iraq in June, that logistical obstacles were likely to delay ISG operation until mid-July.[177] He had observed some confusion on the ground as a consequence of recent leadership changes and some "institutional rivalries and disconnects", confirming SIS3 in the view that the UK should reinforce its independent

SIS/DIS effort and "seek to harness ISG capabilities to joint operational objectives once the ISG was up and running". The "surge effort" should last until the end of July, when SIS would take stock.

368. SIS3 reported that co-ordination between UK agencies and units and between UK bodies and their US counterparts was impressive. The task now was to develop a coherent and comprehensive strategy and methodology that also encompassed CENTCOM and the ISG.

369. Mr Blair informed Cabinet on 19 June that the ISG had started systematic work on uncovering Iraqi programmes for WMD.[178] No further discussion of the issue was recorded.

370. Mr Howard sent Mr Bowen a progress report on 20 June.[179] It was now clear that Mr Tenet would exercise strategic oversight of the ISG's work on WMD and would be represented in Iraq by Dr Kay. Maj Gen Dayton had been tasked to support Dr Kay. The ISG would continue to work within the military chain of command to ensure it received the necessary security, logistics and life support. There was evidence that CENTCOM was now giving the ISG the support it needed.

371. Mr Howard reported that, during calls on SIS and the DIS on 19 June, Dr Kay had stressed the importance he attached to the ISG being an intelligence-led operation and the need for an accelerated timetable.

372. Mr Howard also enclosed the first ISG situation report from Brig Deverell, Maj Gen Dayton's Deputy, who reported that the main components of the ISG were now functional and that the first operations would take place later in the week.[180]

373. Baroness Symons, Minister of State for the Middle East, explained the ISG's lines of accountability to London and Washington in the House of Lords on 16 October:

> "… the Iraq Survey Group (ISG) is not part of the Coalition Provisional Authority. It is part of the United States-led military forces in Iraq and is therefore accountable to the United States Administration. British personnel seconded to the Survey Group are under the tactical control of the United States' commander. They are under the operational command of and accountable to the United Kingdom Chief of Joint Operations and thus to Her Majesty's Government. On reporting, the findings of the Group are available to the Coalition partners, including our own Intelligence and Security Committee, which will have access to the full text of the ISG interim report."[181]

374. Major General Tim Tyler, British Deputy Commander of the ISG from early January to late March 2004, told the Inquiry that Maj Gen Dayton explained this arrangement by describing himself as the "taxi driver" for Special Advisors Dr Kay and Mr Duelfer, who "paid the fare".[182]

375. Maj Gen Tyler described how the separate chains of military and intelligence oversight worked from a British perspective:

> "As senior UK rep, I had two lines of reporting, formal ones … I reported directly back to the ROCKINGHAM cell for the intelligence aspects … and then to PJHQ on all military aspects."

376. Maj Gen Tyler added: "From my point of view it was straightforward and therefore did work."

377. Mr Howard told the Inquiry that, although he had been concerned that the ISG would end up with a split command, the arrangement had worked quite well:

> "Keith Dayton got on, ran the ISG, did the tasking, sent people out, made sure they were properly protected and, as it were, managed the administration, and David really concentrated on the analytical effort and targeting the analysis, saying this is where we need to concentrate our efforts, and I think that actually worked reasonably well.
> "I thought that the industrial handling of documents and other sources by the ISG was very good. I think there were problems, nevertheless, of record-keeping, and problems of actually really bringing a vast amount of material into a single cohesive report.
> "So it was a mixed picture, but the general approach, I think, was right."[183]

378. Mr Blair discussed WMD with President Bush on 26 June.[184] He informed President Bush that he hoped to set out publicly what the UK knew about WMD and the Iraqi regime's human rights abuses in the next few weeks. The UK would co-ordinate with the US in doing so.

379. In a video conference with President Bush and others on 3 July, Mr Blair stated that there was a need to redouble the search for WMD.[185] Ambassador L Paul Bremer, CPA Administrator, reported that the work of the ISG had improved over the last week; and that the ISG had shifted from examination of declared sites and the interrogation of uncommunicative top regime figures to targeting lower level scientists and officials.

JIC Assessment, 27 June 2003: 'Iraq WMD: The Emerging Picture'

380. On 27 June, the JIC assessed that:

- it was "too early in the investigative process to make any firm judgements" about Iraq's WMD; and
- so far, it had seen nothing to cause it to change either its "pre-conflict judgements on Iraq's WMD programmes and capabilities, or the intelligence on which these judgements were based".

381. At the request of the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD, on 27 June the JIC produced 'Iraqi WMD: The Emerging Picture', a summary of its current understanding of the situation, based on the limited intelligence available since the start of hostilities.[186]

382. During the JIC discussion of the draft on 25 June, the main points made were:

- There was "a great deal of interest in this paper and it would be important to get the language right". The ISG's work on the ground had only just begun and the situation was still developing. It was "too early to make firm judgements about Iraq's WMD. Nothing had so far been found to disprove earlier JIC judgements."
- The draft "should be structured to refer to previous JIC judgements and describe new evidence, but it should state that it could only provide a snapshot of work in progress". The inclusion of Key Judgements was "not warranted".[187]

383. In the Assessment's summary, the JIC stated:

> "It is too early in the investigative process to make any firm judgements about the location, status and extent of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD). A more focused approach to conducting the search process is only now being put into place. Implementation will have to allow for the difficulties of operating in post-conflict Iraq.
> "A number of lines of investigation … continue to be pursued. Limited new information has emerged since the conflict on Iraq's chemical and biological capabilities. […] So far we have seen nothing which would cause us to change either our pre-conflict judgements on Iraq's WMD programmes and capabilities, or the intelligence on which these judgements were based."[188]

384. Points made in the Assessment included:

Chemical weapons

- Since the last JIC Assessment of 9 September 2002, "intelligence from a number of sources has continued to indicate that Iraq possessed chemical munitions (particularly artillery and battlefield rockets) and was prepared to use them".

- "Since the conflict began, intelligence has provided further indications that agent production was continuing in 2002 …"
- "In initial interviews senior detainees are maintaining that Iraq's chemical weapons programme ended in 1991 and that no weapons were retained."

Biological weapons

- "Very little new intelligence relating to biological weapons alone has been received … Detainees assessed to be involved continue so far to insist that the programme stopped in 1991."
- "Confirmation of the exact purpose" of the suspect trailers would require further work. The trailers were "consistent with, although not optimally designed for, hydrogen production". Analytical results had "revealed organic chemicals … inconsistent with the hydrogen process alone. Even if hydrogen production is confirmed, technical analysis of the trailers has not undermined the assessment that they are capable of being used, with only minor modifications, for the production of micro-organisms."

Nuclear weapons

- "Since the start of the conflict limited information relating to a nuclear weapons programme has been uncovered in Iraq. One recent report implies that some activity which could be associated with a centrifuge programme was undertaken between 1999-2002 …"
- Mr Mahdi al-Ubaidi, the former head of the gas centrifuge programme, had "stated that documentation was concealed from the IAEA" and centrifuge components had been found buried at his residence. He "claimed that the nuclear weapons programme was not reconstituted after 1991" but "there was an intention to do so once UN sanctions were lifted".

Ballistic missiles

- There had been "no new information" about Al Hussein missiles.
- Mr al-Huwaish, former head of the Military Industrial Commission (MIC) and a senior member of the National Monitoring Directorate, had claimed the Al Husseins were "unilaterally destroyed in 1992".
- Post-conflict interviews and some supporting documentation confirmed previous judgements that Saddam Hussein "had ordered the development of missiles with ranges far in excess of the permitted 150km range". There were "discrepancies" about when the programme had started and the planned range, but all the interviewees appeared "to agree that the programme was still at the design stage".

- The missile designs described were "different to some of those previously highlighted in intelligence, because they are claimed to be based on Volga engine technology rather than SCUD".

Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAV)

- The former Director of the Centre responsible for the UAV programme had confirmed that an Iraqi UAV flew 500km in June 2002. He continued to state that they were not designed for the delivery of chemical or biological agent.

Proliferation

- "We remain concerned about the proliferation of material, equipment and technical knowledge from Iraq to third parties … We have not been able to substantiate intelligence and media reporting of missiles and other related material being sent to Syria or other countries."

385. Addressing why there had been no finds of chemical and biological munitions or stocks of agent, or Al Hussein missiles or parts, the Assessment stated:

"A number of high value detainees claim that these munitions and systems do not exist. However, there are serious doubts are [sic] their openness and co-operation. The weight of intelligence prior to the conflict, and the fact that the investigative process is at a very early stage, lead us to maintain our previous judgements.

"A number of other explanations have been proposed about the fate of Iraq's WMD munitions and systems, some of which are supported by intelligence:

- munitions were deployed but have not yet been found, because they were either destroyed or hidden on the battlefield;
- they were destroyed to ensure they were not discovered by UNMOVIC inspections – […] This would be more extreme than the concealment measures considered by the JIC in its paper of 11 October 2002 on inspections. There has also been a suggestion that some munitions were destroyed just prior to the conflict but intelligence on this has yet to be verified;
- Iraq's concealment operation was so comprehensive that it did not allow for rapid reconstitution of an effective CBW or Al Hussein missile capability – […] The gap between UN weapons inspectors leaving and the start of the conflict was only three days.
- the political decision-making process in Iraq was paralysed by the Coalition attack …"

386. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that the Assessment "sort of logged the picture at that moment, which was more or less when the ISG was seriously getting going".[189] He added:

> "So in the end of June Assessment it was just stated that no munitions of stocks or agent had been found for CW … That was set against the fact that even during the conflict there had been continuing intelligence about tactical deployment of CW. This was early on, after the end of the conflict, and it was still seen as very early days.
> "For BW it was slightly different at that point because it's important to say that in late April, early May, trailers were found in Iraq …
> "So in the BW context, it wasn't a case that nothing had been found, because it was thought that possibly something pretty serious had been found, and of course it played into a major line of reporting which was still being taken seriously at that time …
> "So initially … it was said in bold terms, straight away, up front to customers what was not being found and what might be being found, and at that stage, emphasis was placed on it was too early to review judgments or change judgments because it was very early days in the search.
> "It's quite difficult to tell from the reporting notes going backwards and forwards at what point, if you like, the psychological mood changed, because clearly almost from the beginning when nothing was found, the possibility that nothing would be found was there …"

FAC Report, 7 July 2003: 'The Decision to go to War in Iraq'

387. On 7 July, the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) published its report into the decision to go to war in Iraq.[190]

388. Among its conclusions, the FAC stated that:

- It was "too soon to tell whether the Government's assertions on Iraq's chemical and biological weapons will be borne out".
- The accuracy of most of the Government's claims about Iraq's nuclear weapons programme could only be assessed once the ISG had access to the relevant scientists and documentation.
- The 45 minutes claim "did not warrant the prominence given to it in the [September 2002] dossier because it was based on evidence from a single, uncorroborated source".

[190] Ninth Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, Session 2002-2003, The Decision to go to War in Iraq, HC 813-1.

- The effect of the February 2003 dossier had been "almost wholly counter-productive", undermining the credibility of the Government's case for war and the documents that were part of it.
- Ministers had not misled Parliament.

389. The postscript to the FAC report recorded the continuing absence of conclusive evidence that Iraq possessed WMD:

> "Months after the cessation of the military phase of operations in Iraq, no conclusive evidence has come to light that the regime did indeed possess weapons of mass destruction. The question arises, why were these weapons not used, assuming they existed at all? This is at once one of the most difficult and one of the most important questions the Government has to answer."

390. The FCO sent its initial response to the FAC report in November.[191] It deferred its response to the FAC's conclusions on the 45 minutes claim and the September dossier until after the conclusion of the Hutton Inquiry.[192] Both responses are addressed later in this Section.

Mr Blair's evidence to the Liaison Committee, 8 July 2003

391. During his evidence on Iraq to the Liaison Committee of the House of Commons on 8 July, Mr Blair was repeatedly asked about the Government's position on Iraq's WMD.[193]

392. In his responses, Mr Blair made a number of points, including:

- The House of Commons had not been misled and he stood by the case which had been made for military action "totally".
- There was "no doubt whatever that Saddam Hussein was developing weapons of mass destruction", and that, when the UN inspectors "finally had to leave" in December 1998, "they made it quite clear that in their view 'unaccounted for' meant that he had not revealed them".
- He had "no doubt at all" that the ISG would find "evidence of weapons of mass destruction programmes".
- The policy of containment "was not working". Saddam Hussein's strategy "was to conceal the programmes, to keep the basic expertise in place and then, the moment the threat was lifted to go back to reinvigorating the programmes again".

- The September dossier had stated that Saddam Hussein would engage in a programme of concealment and he (Mr Blair) believed, from the information now available, that was "precisely what he did".
- He reiterated the validity of the intelligence in relation to the statement that Iraq had chemical and biological weapons that could be activated within 45 minutes.
- He suggested that the alternative hypothesis to the one he had set out was that Saddam Hussein had decided to get rid of the weapons but had not told anyone; he did not think that was "a very serious hypothesis".
- He regretted that the dossier that had been produced in February had not correctly attributed the information which had been drawn from published sources; but that information was correct. The first and third parts of the dossier were based on intelligence information.
- The information in the September dossier on Iraqi attempts to procure uranium from Niger was not based on the "so-called 'forged' documents" seen by the IAEA, but on separate intelligence.
- The ISG should be allowed time to do its work. It would be addressing the issues "in a systematic way", which Dr Blix "was unable to do". "[C]hasing round trying to find the stuff" was "always going to be incredibly difficult". The only way to "get to the truth" was "by interviewing the people involved".

House of Commons debate on Iraq, 15 July 2003

393. On 15 July, the House of Commons rejected a second Opposition motion calling for an independent judge-led inquiry into pre-conflict intelligence.

394. In the House of Commons on 15 July, Mr Menzies Campbell asked Mr Straw:

> "… does not the absence of chemical and biological weapons, the embarrassing and apparently escalating dispute between Washington and London over Niger, the failure to find SCUD missiles and the controversy over the February dossier make an irresistible case for an inquiry independent of Parliament and led by a senior judge?"[194]

395. Mr Straw replied that "the combination of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Intelligence and Security Committee is appropriate".[195]

396. An Opposition motion tabled in the House of Commons on 16 July by Mr Ancram stated:

> "That this House welcomes the Ninth Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee … but notes some reservations by Committee members that it not only had insufficient time but insufficient access to crucial documents to come to comprehensive and definitive conclusions on some of the issues; further notes the recent concerns raised over intelligence material; and calls on the Government to set up a judicial inquiry finally to establish the facts of the matter."[196]

397. In the debate that followed, Mr Ancram stated:

"The Prime Minister and the Government have an overriding duty to be scrupulous and consistent in the way that they provide intelligence material to Parliament. Over these last months that has clearly not been the case. Two key areas exist … the status of the evidence on weapons of mass destruction, and … the way in which the Government have handled and made public the material.

"For example, there was a claim about uranium from Niger going to Iraq. The claim was stated as a fact in the September dossier but was subsequently shown to have been partially based on forged documents. There was no explanation of who forged them and why. There is no mention of CIA concerns in the Government's response. We now have a belated explanation that there were other sources of intelligence that apparently cannot be disclosed. Even more unusually we are told such sources cannot be shared with the United States.

"Some will ask whether the dodgy dossier really matters. The fact that the Prime Minister misrepresented its provenance goes to the heart of the trust that Parliament can put in what he tells it is, or is not, intelligence …

"The erosion of public confidence is gathering pace and beginning to damage the national interest …

"There is an urgent unanswerable case for the Government to set up an independent judicial inquiry …"[197]

398. Mr Straw tabled the Government's amendment.[198] He stated that an independent judicial inquiry, whether set up under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921 or not, "can be frustrating for the public because of the duration and the costs involved". It was also quite wrong to assume that such inquiries "automatically bring such issues to a close".

399. Mr Straw concluded:

"A vote for the Opposition's motion would be a vote of no confidence in the Intelligence and Security Committee … It would also be a vote of no confidence in the ability of this Parliament to have effective oversight of agencies and Ministers on intelligence matters."[199]

400. The Opposition motion was defeated by 299 votes to 200. The Government amendment, agreed without a further vote, stated:

"That this House … believes that the Intelligence and Security Committee … is the appropriate body to consider the intelligence relating to Iraq; and notes that this Committee has already begun its inquiry."[200]

401. In response to a written question from Ms Lynne Jones (Labour) on 18 July, Mr Bill Rammell, FCO Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, stated that the assessment that Iraq had attempted to procure uranium from Africa was based on information from the intelligence service of another Government. The UK Government could not pass it to anyone else without the express consent of the originator.[201]

Uranium and Niger

In the September 2002 dossier on WMD (Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government), the Government stated that "there is intelligence that Iraq has sought the supply of significant quantities of uranium from Africa".[202]

In his January 2003 State of the Union address, President Bush stated: "The British Government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa."[203]

On 7 March 2003, Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, Director General of the IAEA, informed the UN Security Council that the documents pointing to an agreement between Niger and Iraq for the sale of uranium between 1999 and 2001 were "not authentic" and that those specific allegations were "unfounded".[204]

In its report The Decision to go to War in Iraq, published in July 2003, the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) stated that the assertion in the September 2002 dossier should have been qualified to "reflect the uncertainty" surrounding the evidence upon which it was based.[205]

In its response to the FAC in November 2003, the FCO stated that: "the claim in the September dossier rested on separate evidence to that judged fraudulent by the IAEA", and that this intelligence was still under review and had not been shared with the CIA.[206]

In July 2004, the Butler Report supported the FCO's claim, concluding that the report appeared "well-founded": the "intelligence was credible" that Iraq had sought to purchase uranium ore from Niger in 1999.[207]

The Iraq Survey Group found no evidence that Iraq sought uranium from abroad after 1991. It found only one offer of uranium to Baghdad after 1991, and that had been turned down because of sanctions.[208]

JIC Current Intelligence Group Assessment, 16 July 2003: 'Iraq: Prohibited Ballistic Missile Designs'

402. At the request of the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD, a Current Intelligence Group (CIG) assessed the information on prohibited missile designs provided by senior figures in the missile programme.[209]

403. The Key Judgements were:

"I. Information that Iraq was pursuing a number of designs for prohibited ballistic missiles between 2000 and 2002 is, despite some discrepancies, credible.

"II. The missiles were designed to reach ranges between 500-600km and 900-1,000km. Initial examination indicates that the designs produced and the four to five year timeframe envisaged to reach full production appear technically credible.

"III. Senior figures in the ballistic missile programme were actively engaged in concealing this design work from UNMOVIC, both physically and in interviews with inspectors. The aim was to preserve the designs for future use.

"IV. Some of the individuals are not being entirely forthcoming on sensitive issues, such as chemical and biological warhead designs, possibl[y] out of fear of the consequences for them."

404. The Assessment stated that two consistent themes had emerged from the interviews that had been conducted so far:

- Iraq worked on a number of missile designs between late 2000 and early 2002 … but no missile hardware was produced;
- Orders were received in mid 2002 to conceal all signs of such design work from UN weapons inspectors and these orders were carried out."

[209] CIG Assessment, 16 July 2003, 'Iraq: Prohibited Ballistic Missile Designs'.

405. The Assessment contained statements relating to the development of missile systems including:

- Iraq was using multiple Volga engines (the Al Samoud missile had only one engine). The missile designs were judged to be "credible"; Iraq had "previous experience with multiple engine systems". The twin engine missile "would have had a range approaching that of the Al Hussein (650km)", but "a much smaller payload".
- Work had not been undertaken after early 2002.
- There was "currently no evidence to link the 380 illicitly procured Volga engines to these designs, although the number purchased was probably in excess of that required for the Al Samoud programmes".
- Intelligence pre-conflict had indicated possible work on a long-range derivative of the SCUD missile, with a range of around 1,200km, but all those interviewed had stated that they were unaware of any continuing work on a SCUD-based system.
- There had been design work on developing the short-range Al Fatah (Ababil 100) missile.

406. The Assessment concluded that it was not clear why development of the designs for prohibited missile systems had been halted. There was a clear intent to preserve the designs for future use and UNMOVIC inspectors had been deceived during interviews. Areas for further investigation included:

- "the issue of chemical and biological warheads";
- "the purpose of missile infrastructure such as the Al Rafah test stand"; and
- "the extent of foreign technical and material assistance".

407. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that after this Assessment:

> "… there wasn't a further formal JIC Assessment until the end of the following year, 23 December 2004, when there was a formal review of JIC judgements in 2002, which took account of the ISG final report which had been issued in October 2004.
> "But in case anybody thinks that therefore the JIC wasn't looking at it at that time, it certainly was, but it was doing it through the process of reporting from, contact with, monitoring of, participation in, through British representatives, the work of the ISG on the ground. There were regular reports coming in and then being disseminated to No.10 and to JIC members, and that is how the work of the ISG was tracked."[210]

[210] Private hearing, 5 May 2010, page 59.

The ISG builds momentum

408. On 16 July, Mr Howard reported that the ISG was now focusing its effort on debriefings and document exploitation, but that it was still "very much at the beginning" of its task.

409. Mr Howard visited the ISG in Baghdad and Qatar in the second week of July.[211] He reported to Mr Scarlett that:

> "A lot of emphasis is being placed on human intelligence and interviews and debriefings both of high value detainees and low ranking individuals. Another main area of effort, which is beginning to produce some results, is document and other media exploitation. Major centres for this have been set up both in Baghdad and in Qatar which bring together subject matter experts, linguists and, in the case of Baghdad, some powerful IT tools to sift what is a vast quantity of material for interesting information and leads.
> "… But, it is still true to say that we are very much at the beginning of the task and the ISG has only really reached its current state of effectiveness in the last fortnight."

410. Mr Howard provided a copy of the ISG's four "Operating Hypotheses":

- Iraq had an active WMD development program separate and apart from WMD production
- Iraq hid CW/BW weapons and agents, delivery systems, and WMD program information within Iraq away from sites known to the Coalition, or outside Iraq
- Iraq destroyed existing stockpiles (but likely retained a mobilization or production capability that could produce CW/BW agents and delivery systems)
- If Iraq destroyed its stockpile (or most of it), it would have taken place at remote locations or areas with no previous link to the WMD program."

411. Mr Howard advised that, with the exception of evidence of Iraqi attempts to extend the range of anti-ship cruise missiles to 180km, there needed to be "a good deal more exploitation and investigation before a rounded picture in any of the key areas can be pulled together".

412. Mr Howard reported that Dr Kay wanted to avoid "drip-feeding" material to London or Washington for fear of leaks and of raising expectations unjustifiably. Dr Kay was also very wary of making anything public in the near future, but was "pretty bullish" that he would have "a reasonably convincing BW package for use in public by early to mid September". He would understand if the UK wanted to publicise the missile programme before then, but believed it would have more impact combined with something on BW or CW in September. Mr Howard agreed.

413. Mr Howard described the main risks and obstacles facing the ISG:

- the security situation (addressed in more detail in the Box, 'Deteriorating Security and the ISG', later in this Section);
- an "insufficiently flexible detention policy", which was being exploited by former regime figures to discourage people from co-operating; and
- the "lack of an immunity component to the incentives package".

414. Mr Scarlett reported Mr Howard's conclusions to Sir David Manning together with an outline of the draft JIC Assessment of Iraq's prohibited missile systems.[212]

415. Mr Scarlett advised Sir David that evidence on Iraq's missile, nuclear and BW programmes gathered so far demonstrated "a clear policy of concealment", including "physical and oral deception".

416. Mr Scarlett's minute was seen by Mr Blair.[213]

417. Asked how the absence of evidence of WMD in Iraq was presented to Mr Blair, Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry:

> "The advice from the Cabinet Office and from the Assessments Staff and the JIC was straight down the middle. He [Mr Blair] was told what was being found and what was not being found, and he was given the best advice about the significance of what was being found and not being found … [T]here was nothing in the advice that went from me or from the JIC … [to indicate] that anyone was raising expectations that weren't justified."[214]

418. In Washington on 17 July, Mr Blair told the media that he believed "with every fibre of instinct and conviction" that he was right about the threat from Iraqi WMD, but that it was important to wait for the ISG to complete its work.

419. On 17 July, Mr Blair visited Washington to deliver a speech to a joint meeting of Congress, which had awarded him the Congressional Gold Medal. He also met the Congressional leadership and, separately, President Bush (see Section 9.2).[215]

420. Before the visit, the British Embassy Washington reported that the debate on Iraqi WMD in the US remained "febrile".[216] In the face of an offensive on the issue by the Democratic Party and in the media, mutual distrust between the White House and the CIA was palpable. All the Democrat presidential candidates were raising questions about US intelligence, while other leading Democrats stepped up calls for a full Congressional investigation or an independent inquiry. Congressional Republicans were holding the line that the search for WMD should be given time and the House and Senate Intelligence Committees allowed to work through huge quantities of intelligence provided by Mr Tenet before any decision was taken.

421. In his speech to Congress on 17 July, Mr Blair warned of the risk that "terrorism and states developing weapons of mass destruction come together".[217] He stated:

> "If we are wrong, we will have destroyed a threat that at its least is responsible for inhuman carnage and suffering.
> "That is something I am confident history will forgive.
> "But if our critics are wrong, if we are right, as I believe with every fibre of instinct and conviction I have that we are, and we do not act, then we will have hesitated in the face of this menace when we should have given leadership.
> "That is something history will not forgive."

422. At a joint press conference with Mr Blair, President Bush was asked whether he agreed with the suggestion in Mr Blair's speech that he might be proved wrong about the threat from Iraqi WMD. President Bush offered three explanations for the absence of a breakthrough in the search for WMD: the "chaos" in Iraq; the effort Saddam Hussein had put into concealment; and the fact that high-level officials were only just starting to co-operate.[218]

423. President Bush predicted that:

> "… we will bring the weapons, and, of course, we will bring the information forward on the weapons when we find them.
> "And that'll … end all this speculation.
> "And we based our decisions on good, sound intelligence, and … our people are going to find out the truth. And the truth will say that this intelligence was good intelligence; there's no doubt in my mind."

424. Mr Blair added:

> "… if I could just correct you on one thing, I certainly did not say that I would be proved wrong. On the contrary, I said with every fibre of instinct and conviction I believe that we are right.

"The history of Saddam Hussein and weapons of mass destruction is a 12 year history, and is a history of him using the weapons and developing the weapons and concealing the weapons and not complying with the United Nations inspectors who were trying to shut down his programmes.

"And I simply say – which is why I totally agree with the President – it's important we wait for the Iraq Survey Group to complete their work. Because the proposition that actually he was not developing such weapons and such programmes, having finally effectively got rid of them in December '98, he then took all the problems and sanctions and action upon himself, voluntarily destroyed them but just didn't tell anyone.

"I don't think that's very likely as a proposition. I really don't."

425. On 18 July, the body of Dr Kelly was discovered near his Oxfordshire home.[219]

426. The decision to set up an investigation into Dr Kelly's death headed by Lord Hutton is summarised in the Box below.

The death of Dr David Kelly and the Hutton Inquiry

Following the controversy surrounding the allegations by the BBC journalist Mr Andrew Gilligan that the September 2002 intelligence dossier had been "sexed up", Dr David Kelly, MOD Special Adviser Counter-proliferation and Arms Control, was invited to give evidence to the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee on 15 July 2003 and the Intelligence and Security Committee of Parliament on 16 July.

On 18 July 2003, Dr Kelly's body was found near his Oxfordshire home.[220]

Later on 18 July, Lord Hutton was asked by Lord Falconer, the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, "urgently to conduct an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death of Dr Kelly".[221]

Lord Hutton concluded that his Terms of Reference should include investigation of the two allegations that had drawn Dr Kelly into the controversy surrounding Mr Gilligan's broadcasts on the Today programme:

> "… (1) that the Government probably knew, before it decided to put it in the dossier of 24 September 2002, that the statement was wrong that the Iraqi military were able to deploy weapons of mass destruction within 45 minutes of a decision to do so and (2) that 10 Downing Street ordered the dossier to be sexed up".[222]

Lord Hutton concluded that the wider issue of the reliability of the intelligence contained in the dossier did not fall within his Terms of Reference.

The Hutton Inquiry began its hearings on 11 August.[223]

The Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David Kelly C.M.G. was published on 28 January 2004. The Report's findings are addressed later in this Section.

427. On 24 July, officials advised Ministers that Dr Kay had brought new impetus to the ISG, which was now operating in a "systematic fashion".

428. At the meeting of the AHMGIR on 24 July, the MOD reported that the ISG was now operating in a "systematic fashion" and that Dr Kay had given new impetus to its work.[224] The approach was to "understand WMD programmes as whole, with particular focus on BW and the special Security Organisation". Ministers agreed that the UK should continue to engage closely with the ISG and that the UK should be "fully consulted before any major conclusions were presented publicly".

Revised Directive on UK military co-operation with the ISG

On 30 July, General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff, issued a revised Directive for Op TELIC, superseding the version issued on 18 March and the supplementary material on the ISG issued on 18 June.[225]

The revised Directive included a revised strategic military objective that, for the first time, incorporated the search for WMD:

> "To support the Coalition effort, within allocated resources, to stabilise Iraq, find/secure WMD, alleviate humanitarian needs, and help create the conditions for the achievement of the strategic end state."

The Directive included instructions on co-operation with the ISG:

> "The shift towards a pro-active WMD finding, evidence handling and elimination (of soft and hard components) continues and will be led by the ISG. WMD will not be located only at SSEs [locations of Sensitive Site Exploitation], we will encounter it ad hoc, and we will have to extend search activities beyond SSEs. WMD 'soft' components and particularly scientists and military experts are very important to the evidence and elimination programme and HUMINT [human intelligence] is an area where the UK contribution is highly valued … You should note that ISG incorporates many other strands in its mission than just WMD. Your mainstream CBRN [chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear] recce assets, principally from the J[oin]t NBC Reg[imen]t will be supplemented then replaced by specialist search teams. You are > to provide support, as appropriate, to the ISG as it develops, but this must not be detrimental to the overall FP [force protection] posture adopted."

> Those instructions remained largely unchanged when the Directive was revised in December 2003.[226]

429. Mr Scarlett told Mr Straw's Private Office on 24 July about a US request for the current UK assessment of the possible BW trailers to be provided to the Senate Intelligence Committee.[227] The assessment would not be made public.

430. Mr Scarlett attached a one-page draft assessment for Mr Straw's approval, cleared with DIS and SIS, which stated:

> "With the information currently available we are not able to judge that these trailers are the transportable BW production system (TPS) described in intelligence.
> "The assessment of an independent UK analyst is that these trailers have the potential, with a minor modification (addition of flexible tube), to carry out biological production …
> "Confirmation of the exact purpose of the trailers will require further documentary exploitation, chemical/biological analysis and reporting from personalities associated with the mobile programmes in Iraq …
> "Any final decision on the purpose of the trailers would currently be premature."

431. On 29 July, Mr Scarlett informed Mr Straw's Private Office that a difference of analysis about the trailers had arisen within the US intelligence community.[228] Mr Scarlett reported that he had told the CIA the UK would not submit its own assessment for presentation to the Senate, pending a review of the revised position taken by another part of the US intelligence community.

432. During their conversation on Iraq on 31July, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed Dr Kay's progress.[229] Most resources were allocated to Iraq's BW programme. They discussed the need for more individuals working on nuclear matters. Addressing the very large quantity of documents held was being given a lower priority.

Preparation of the ISG Interim Report

433. During August, UK and US officials began to discuss the content of Dr Kay's ISG Interim Report, scheduled for the second half of September.

434. UK officials assessed that the report "certainly would not" persuade sceptics, but might be enough to persuade others that progress was being made.

435. At the end of August, the British Embassy Washington reported that the US Government was bracing itself for a disappointing report.

436. Mr Scarlett succeeded Sir Richard Dearlove as Chief of SIS on 1 August.

437. Dr Kay and Maj Gen Dayton visited London on 5 August.[230]

438. On 6 August, Mr Howard sent Mr Scarlett thoughts on handling Dr Kay's first progress report, scheduled for mid to late September. It was essential that any public report was "firmly based on an honest and thorough assessment of the intelligence picture so far" and that the UK's classified assessment "matches that of the Americans exactly". Mr Howard suggested that public perceptions were "heavily skewed" by media interest in Dr Kelly and the Hutton Inquiry, and that there was likely to remain "a deep vein of scepticism" about what might be found.

439. Mr Howard added:

> "… a progress report which focuses mainly on evidence of programmes and intent and is short on actual hardware is likely to provoke a mixed reaction. It certainly will not persuade the sceptics. But it may be enough to persuade the mainstream that progress is being made."

440. Mr Scarlett updated No.10 on 8 August.[231] He reported that Dr Kay was convinced that the ISG was making progress, but cautioned that Dr Kay had a "tendency to overstate potential leads". ISG efforts were focused on BW, but there was also progress in other areas. Developments included:

- BW: the ISG was developing a clearer picture of the role of the Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS). It had concluded that the UN would not have been able to discover the full extent of Iraq's BW programme because of "the comprehensive nature of Iraq's concealment and deception policy". The 97 vials recovered from the home of a BW scientist had tested positive for traces of live type B clostridium botulinum, the cause of botulism in humans. Iraq had never declared possession of the type B strain.

[231] Minute Scarlett to Cannon, 8 August 2003, 'Iraq WMD'.

- Missile programme: evidence of proscribed liquid and solid propellant development projects that had not progressed beyond the design phase, with no evidence of production.
- CW: "some encouraging leads particularly on VX".
- Nuclear: the ISG had discovered that in 2002 the Iraqi Atomic Energy Commission had obtained a balancing machine identified as the most important item for a centrifuge programme. This indicated that Iraq's nuclear programme might have taken "a small but significant step forward" while sanctions were in place.

441. Mr Scarlett explained that the ISG expected to issue a classified progress report to the UK, US and Australian Governments in mid-September. It was "unlikely" the report would:

> "… present conclusive proof of Iraqi possession of WMD, although General Dayton said it should provide ample evidence that Iraq was in material breach of UNSCR 1441 because of the level of deception and concealment of Iraqi WMD (eg the missile plans and the BW vials)".

442. In a Note to No.10 officials on 16 August, Mr Blair listed three foreign policy priorities, including "Iraq/Afghanistan".[232] On Iraq and WMD he wrote:

> "As a discrete part of our strategy, the issue of WMD and Iraq as a threat must be dealt with. But this can be done. We have Hutton; we have an ISG report in September; we will be, hopefully, in a better position inside Iraq. But NS [Sir Nigel Sheinwald, successor to Sir David Manning as Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser] and team should draw up a strategy on this."

443. On 19 August, Mr Sérgio Vieira de Mello, the UN Secretary-General's Special Representative for Iraq, was killed in an attack on the UN headquarters in Baghdad (see Box below).[233]

Deteriorating security and the ISG

Deteriorating security in Iraq had an increasing impact on ISG operations from summer 2003.

On 13 August, the DIS reported the possibility of an emerging pattern of shootings at scientists who co-operated with the ISG.[234]

On 19 August, a bomb exploded outside the UN headquarters at the Canal Hotel in Baghdad, killing 22 UN staff and visitors, including Mr Sérgio Vieira de Mello, the UN Secretary-General's Special Representative for Iraq (see Section 9.2).[235]

Lieutenant General Andrew Ridgway, Chief of Defence Intelligence, told the Chiefs of Staff on 20 August:

> "Further attacks were expected. The bombing would affect coalition building, NGO confidence, and the reconstruction of utilities, which if not expedited could lead to a significant loss of consent."[236]

On 26 August, the DIS reported the disruption of an ISG deployment following an attack on a nearby US military convoy.[237]

As security deteriorated, the US sought to transfer some of the ISG's analysis capabilities to counter-terrorism activities.

The Op ROCKINGHAM weekly update for 21-28 August reported that Secretary Rumsfeld and US General John Abizaid, Commander CENTCOM, had indicated that they wanted some of the ISG's HUMINT and analysis capability dedicated to counter-terrorism tasks.[238]

In early September, the JIC judged that:

> "The security environment will remain poor, and will probably worsen over the next year, unless the Coalition, in conjunction with Iraqis, can reverse current trends. There are likely to be more spectacular attacks."[239]

In October, the DIS reported two direct attacks on ISG convoys.[240]

In his memoir, Mr George Tenet, the US Director of Central Intelligence (DCI), wrote:

> "A senior military officer later told me he … was 'flabbergasted' … when [in November 2003] Kay refused to lend some of the ISG's experienced intelligence analysts to help him find insurgents 'that are killing us'… Had he been a regular CIA officer, I would have relieved Kay of his command and ordered him home."[241]

Major General Tim Tyler, British Deputy Commander of the ISG from early January to late March 2004, told the Inquiry "there were lots of … constraints on the operations and the most predominant one was the security situation".[242]

444. On 21 August, the ISG was reported to be "firmly established" in Baghdad.[243] The Survey Operations Centre (SOC) and Survey Analysis Centre (SAC) had completed moves to their permanent location in Baghdad. Locations of the various operational elements of the ISG included:

- Combined Media Processing Centre (CMPC): headquarters in Qatar with satellite operations conducted out of Baghdad and Erbil;
- Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Centre (JIDC): Baghdad;

445. In a note on 30 August, Mr Blair requested an immediate and longer-term Iraq strategy dealing with the situation on the ground in Iraq, how we improve it, how we improve the system for dealing with it; and WMD.[244]

446. Mr Blair added:

> "… this must tie in with the way we deal with Hutton. I assume that though the judge may be critical of certain aspects of our handling, he will basically find for us. That may be optimistic. But if right, Hutton must be the chance to get our integrity back on Iraq. So whatever NS [Sir Nigel Sheinwald] does must include a timetable that incorporates: Hutton, Interim Report on WMD, improvement in Iraq, and other WMD issues (eg Iran, NK [North Korea] and Libya)."

447. Mr Straw informed Parliament on 1 September that:

> "Coalition forces and specialist personnel of the Iraq Survey Group are actively pursuing sites, documentation and individuals connected with Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes. We are investing significant effort in the search. The process will be painstaking.
> "There have been some successes: the discovery of mobile laboratories which bear a striking resemblance to those described in US Secretary of State Colin Powell's presentation to the UN Security Council in March 2003; and the recent recovery of a large quantity of documents relating to Iraq's nuclear programme together with parts of a gas centrifuge which had been hidden since 1991 by an Iraqi scientist formerly engaged on Iraq's nuclear programme. We anticipate that more scientists previously employed on Iraq's WMD programmes will start to come forward with evidence and equipment.
> "Any finds clearly must be very carefully analysed and assessed. This process is continuing. When we have collated the evidence, it will be presented appropriately and properly."[245]

448. On 3 September, Mr Sebastian Wood, Counsellor for External Affairs at the British Embassy Washington, informed Mr Scarlett that the US Government was bracing itself for a disappointing report from Dr Kay.[246] The Embassy was stressing to the US the need for careful co-ordination of public lines with the UK, but tensions between different interests in Washington meant that would be difficult. Close personal contact with Dr Rice and Mr Tenet would be important.

449. US General John Abizaid, Commander CENTCOM, called on Mr Blair on 5 September.[247] Mr Blair commented that he had "more than a passing interest in what turned up on WMD". Gen Abizaid reported that the ISG's HUMINT effort was starting to tell and that there was "stuff buried all over the country".

450. At Mr Powell's request, Mr Scarlett updated No.10 on the search for WMD possibly concealed in Lake Qadisiyah, behind the Haditha Dam on the Euphrates.[248] A Royal Navy team was due to arrive there on 5 September to assess the situation.

451. Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "There have been a number of reports, of varying degrees of reliability, that WMD may have been concealed in lakes, reservoirs, canals and rivers by Iraqi military or security organisations. Several reports record local gossip. Certain locations feature in reports from a number of sources, some with apparently good access or with an established record of reliable reporting."

452. The ISG completed the search of Lake Qadisiyah on 14 September.[249] No WMD-related material was found.

JIC discussion of the draft ISG Interim Report

453. The JIC discussed the draft ISG Interim Report on 10 September. It concluded that the draft contained little that was new and that handling of the report would be vital.

454. The JIC considered a Discussion Note, 'Iraqi WMD: The Emerging Picture', on 10 September.[250] The minutes recorded that the main points made were:

> "a) the first progress report from the ISG contained little new. Whilst there had been some progress on missiles and a coherent story on nuclear weapons, there was still a serious lack of hard evidence on CB. There had been a lot of collusion between Iraqi former officials under questioning and clear attempts to identify the limits of our knowledge in order to calibrate the information they gave … sources were being intimidated and fear was a big factor with those working in the CB area; and
> "b) the handling of the report would be vital. It was highly desirable to avoid publishing an unclassified version, which would not only display the limits of > our current knowledge but act as a disincentive to potential sources. We should therefore ensure an authoritative discussion … with the Allies at an early stage."

455. Following the discussion, a small number of amendments were made to the Note, including the addition of the judgement that it was "too early to conclude that there were no [chemical and biological] programmes".[251] An Annex to the paper stated:

> "So far no chemical or biological munitions or stocks of agent have been found, nor have any Al Hussein missiles or parts. A number of high level detainees claim that these munitions and systems do not exist. However, there are serious doubts over their openness and co-operation".

456. A number of other possible explanations as to why no munitions or systems had been found were identified, some supported by intelligence, including:

- destruction or concealment on the battlefield;
- destruction to ensure they were not discovered by UNMOVIC inspections;
- a concealment operation "so comprehensive that it did not allow for the rapid reconstitution of an effective CBW or Al Hussein missile capability";
- a political decision-making process paralysed by the Coalition attack;
- exaggeration of Iraq's capabilities by Iraqi opposition groups, "possibly through deliberate manipulation by the Iraqi intelligence services. UK intelligence assessments did not rely heavily on reporting from Iraqi opposition groups, but it cannot be ruled out that UK sources indirectly picked up some disinformation."

457. The revised Note was sent to Sir Nigel Sheinwald, Sir David Manning (British Ambassador to the US) and JIC Members, by Mr Scarlett on 12 September.[252]

458. The JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD discussed the ISG Interim Report on 12 September. It agreed advice for Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Sir Nigel Sheinwald and Sir Richard Dearlove to use in contacts with their US counterparts.[253]

459. Mr Edward Oakden, FCO Director International Security, wrote:

> "The objective, self-evidently – which I underlined repeatedly at the JIC Sub-Group – is to play down Kay's Report, making clear its interim nature: very far from the ISG's considered assessment."

[253] Minute Oakden to Private Secretary [FCO], 12 September 2003, 'Iraq WMD: Handling the Interim ISG Report'.

460. After the meeting, Mr Scarlett wrote to Sir Nigel Sheinwald about the need urgently to address the handling of the ISG Interim Report once it reached Washington.[254]

461. Mr Scarlett told Sir Nigel that the ISG Interim Report was not expected to differ significantly from the UK assessment, set out in a revised Discussion Note following the JIC meeting on 10 September. Mr Scarlett identified the main points as:

- the working environment in Iraq has proved much more difficult than expected (poor security situation, more denial, deception and intimidation);
- the evidence so far has not shown that WMD programmes were active pre-conflict. Nor has any firm evidence emerged of Iraq possessing WMD;
- Iraq maintained an intention to restart its nuclear weapons programme when UN sanctions were lifted, and concealed equipment and documentation in support of this (much of this is already in the public domain);
- there is credible evidence confirming Iraq's pursuit of ballistic and cruise missile programmes with ranges well in excess of the UN's permitted limit (this will receive some publicity through Panorama in late September/early October);
- it is not yet possible to establish any firm picture of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons capability. The compartmented, highly concealable, and dual-use nature of such programmes means that there are fewer firm leads to follow … It is too early to conclude that there were no programmes, and we expect more information to become available. But this will be a long and difficult process;
- there is clear evidence that Iraq was in breach of UN Security Council Resolutions."

462. Mr Scarlett advised that an ISG report along those lines, however interim, would raise difficult questions. That underlined the need to ensure it was handled correctly, with US and Australian agreement in advance. Mr Scarlett recommended publication of a short executive summary, with the full Interim Report being treated as a "classified stocktake for intelligence experts". The summary should get across three "fundamental messages":

- the Interim Report was "far from a considered final assessment";
- the ISG was operating in a difficult security environment and after years of deception and denial by Iraq; and
- there was a good deal more work to do.

463. Mr Scarlett recommended urgent representations by Ministers and senior officials in Washington, and on diplomatic and intelligence channels in Canberra. He provided seven points to be made with US interlocutors:

- Essential to have handling strategy agreed in Washington, London and Canberra.
- Potentially high-profile political issue in London.
- Expect that Report will feed scepticism about Iraq's possession of WMD.
- Main aim, therefore, to keep Report profile low and emphasise interim expert nature.
- Do not favour publishing full Report even in redacted form. It will show the limits of our knowledge and deter other[s] from coming forward. Better to offer short Executive Summary.
- Need to be ready to say this is our approach if press are alerted to arrival of draft in Washington.
- Like to send team to Washington to concert detailed handling once draft Report received."

464. Mr Ehrman discussed the ISG with the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD), the State Department, the National Security Council (NSC) and the CIA in Washington on 12 September.[255] He asked whether the Interim Report needed to be published at all and raised the difficulties UK members of the ISG were having in accessing sensitive US information. US views on publication were mixed, but Dr Kay would almost certainly have to brief Congress. The NSC thought it inevitable that parts of the Report would leak and suggested that it would be better to publish the whole document to keep leaks in context.

465. The British Embassy reported that all Mr Ehrman's interlocutors agreed to look into the "ridiculous situation" of UK access to sensitive US information.

ISC Report, 11 September 2003: 'Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessments'

466. The ISC report Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessments was published on 11 September 2003.

467. The ISC sent its report Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessments to Mr Blair on 9 September.[256]

468. The ISC called on Mr Blair in Downing Street on 11 September, before the Report was laid before Parliament.[257] Mr John Prescott (Deputy Prime Minister), Mr Straw, Sir David Omand, Mr Scarlett and Mr Powell were also present.

469. Mr Blair told the ISC that the ISG faced serious security constraints in Iraq, but its disclosures could change the context of discussion of Iraqi WMD in the UK.

470. In the conclusions to its report, the ISC stated that:

- The September 2002 dossier had been "founded on the assessments then available".
- It was content that the JIC had "not been subjected to political pressures". The JIC's independence and impartiality had "not been compromised in any way". The dossier had not been "sexed up".
- Use of the phrase "continued to produce chemical and biological weapons" in the foreword could have given the impression that Saddam Hussein had been actively producing chemical and biological weapons and significant amounts of agents. The dossier should have highlighted uncertainty about what had been produced and in what quantities to give a balanced view of Saddam Hussein's chemical and biological capacity.
- The dossier should have highlighted that battlefield rather than strategic weapons were the most likely chemical and biological munitions to be used against Western forces.
- The dossier had been for public consumption, not experienced readers of intelligence. It should have highlighted that the 45 minutes claim referred to battlefield chemical and biological munitions, not to any other form of attack. That omission had allowed speculation as to the exact meaning of the claim and had been unhelpful to an understanding of the issue.
- The initial failure by the MOD to disclose that some staff had put their concerns about the dossier in writing to their line managers was "unhelpful and potentially misleading".
- If individuals in the intelligence community wrote formally to their line managers with concerns about JIC Assessments, those concerns should be brought to the attention of the JIC Chairman.[258]

471. Sir David Omand recommended that the Government delay its formal response to the ISC report until after the conclusion of the Hutton Inquiry, in line with the approach taken with the FAC.[259]

472. The Government response, sent in February 2004, is described later in this Section.

The ISG Interim Report, 2 October 2003

473. Sir Nigel Sheinwald discussed the ISG with Dr Rice in Washington on 14 September.[260] After the meeting, he informed Mr Blair that the timing of the ISG Interim Report was unclear, but it was said to be detailed and long. There would be a short pause for analysis; Dr Kay would be obliged to brief Congressional Committees in private; and there would be leaks. The Report was likely to:

- confirm Iraqi deception and Iraqi intention to restart a nuclear weapons programme once sanctions were lifted;
- confirm Iraqi pursuit of ballistic and cruise missile programmes with ranges well beyond UN limits;
- provide little new information on BW or CW, "though there are some leads".

474. Sir Nigel advised that there was a risk an Interim Report of that kind would be used to show there had been no immediate threat from Iraqi WMD. He and Dr Rice had agreed that handling should be low-key, stress the Interim Report's preliminary nature, point out the difficulty of amassing evidence, and note that the Report showed Iraq had been in breach of UN resolutions.

475. Sir Nigel concluded:

> "The idea of an Interim Report was conceived when we thought there would be more to say in the autumn. We are now stuck with it, and are not in control of its use. We can't suppress it – its existence is too widely known. Nor did I seek to delay Kay's Congressional meetings, or any public statement about the Report – this too would be likely to leak. But it is possible that there will be a delay anyway – to the week of 22 September, or later. And we should avoid publication of a redacted version and go, if possible, for something shorter. Do you agree this approach?"

476. Mr Hoon discussed the ISG with Secretary Rumsfeld on 15 September.[261] He observed that the forthcoming Interim Report "looked as though it was not going to be particularly exciting". Mr Rumsfeld said that the process was "chugging along", but the real issue was whether the ISG had enough people. Mr Hoon offered any further support that was needed.

477. Mr Scarlett discussed the ISG Interim Report and the UK proposals for handling it with a senior US official on 15 September.[262]

478. Mr Scarlett reported to Sir Nigel Sheinwald that the US official had strongly agreed with the UK's preferred approach, but had made the point that the US and UK "could not just draft an Executive Summary as if we owned the Report". Mr Scarlett had acknowledged the point, "but repeated that the exceptional sensitivity of public presentation on this issue meant that we had to be involved".

479. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the importance of the ISG's forthcoming Report in their video conference on 16 September.[263] Mr Blair stated that Dr Kay should be able to refer to:

- the extent of Saddam's concealment operations;
- a ballistic missile programme on a far greater scale than intelligence had indicated;
- that Saddam had intended and prepared to reconstitute a nuclear programme after sanctions were lifted; and
- CW and BW programmes had been in existence as recently as the previous year.

480. On 18 September, Mr Wood reported from Washington that Mr Howard had been invited to discuss the draft ISG Interim Report at CIA Headquarters on 22 and 23 September.[264]

481. Initially, Mr Wood suggested that Mr Howard take the opportunity to call on Mr Dan Bartlett, White House Communications Director. He subsequently commented to Mr Miller that a call on Mr Bartlett:

> "… needs to be weighed against the risk of Howard's visit leaking & being portrayed as a 'sexing up' exercise. May be better for us [the British Embassy] to follow up separately with Bartlett/White House."[265]

482. Mr Miller informed Mr Howard that, after consulting Sir David Manning, Mr Wood had decided it might be better if the visit did not involve meetings with the press and was kept to the intelligence community.[266]

483. On 19 September, Mr Rycroft chaired a meeting at No.10 to discuss how to handle the Interim Report.[267] The Cabinet Office, the MOD, the FCO and SIS were represented.

484. Access to Dr Kay's text before its release remained a concern. The Interim Report was likely to be presented to Mr Tenet that day and Mr Howard was:

> "… expected to have access to (but not copies of) the Report on Monday [22 September] in Washington, and possibly a chance on Tuesday to help draft a summary to be made public …"

485. In the meantime, No.10 would continue to ask the White House for a copy of the Interim Report.

486. The meeting concluded that the Government's position with the media should be neither to heighten expectations nor to take a negative line in advance: "The key question was whether the Report disclosed additional evidence that the Saddam regime had breached UNSCRs." Additional material would be needed on areas expected to feature in the Interim Report as breaches of UNSCRs: "ballistic missiles, nuclear programme, UAVs, botulism". That material should be presented in a "facts-based, forensic manner".

487. Mr Howard read the Interim Report in Washington on 22 September.[268]

488. On 24 September, Mr Howard reported to a meeting of officials in London, chaired by Mr Miller, that the aim was "to complete the drafting process by the end of the week. A copy of the full Report would be sent electronically to C." It was likely that Dr Kay would brief the US oversight Committees the following week in private session, following which a very short public statement would be made, probably by Dr Kay and the Committee Chairs.

489. Mr Howard understood that:

> "The US were keen that the approach in the three countries [UK, US and Australia] was broadly in line; there was currently no intention in the US for the Administration to lead on presenting it … The UK and Australian preference was for a fuller executive summary to be produced which could be put in the public domain. One possibility was to make public the summary section of Kay's Report perhaps accompanied by a note of Iraqi breaches of UN resolutions (being prepared by the ISG) and evidence such as photographs of targeted locations and destruction. This approach would need to be agreed by Tenet and the White House."[269]

490. Mr Rycroft told Mr Blair:

- The draft ISG Interim Report was "a good, thorough, professional piece of work", which, helpfully, included a table setting out all the breaches of UN resolutions.
- The section on BW included information on the "vials etc".

[269] Minute Church to Miller, 24 September 2003, 'Note of a Meeting to Discuss ISG Report – 24 September 2003'.

- CW was the "thinnest area", with a "preliminary conclusion" that there were "no current programmes of production and no ability to fill munitions at the time of military action", but there was "more work to be done".
- "As expected", the nuclear section included "evidence of plans to reconstitute the programme, including research into isotope separation".
- The section on delivery systems included "lots on missile programmes, intentions, deception etc".
- The section on destruction and sanitation was a "new element" with "evidence of targeted looting since the end of military action".[270]

491. On the process of publication, Mr Rycroft explained:

- The UK was "pushing" the US to see whether Dr Kay's Congressional and public appearances could be brought forward from 9 to 8 October, to expand Dr Kay's public remarks, and to get him to publish at least his summary.
- Australia was "helpfully, pushing for a big public presentation".
- Efforts to press the US on those and other points were "hampered by the arms length approach the Administration are taking".

492. Mr Rycroft added that some aspects of handling the Interim Report had been overtaken by the "Andrew Neil leak", which Mr Blair had already discussed with Mr David Hill, Mr Campbell's successor as Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy. The Government was saying that it was Dr Kay's Report, the Government did not have it, and any comment was speculation on "an incomplete Interim Report".

493. On 24 September, the BBC reported that a Bush Administration source had told Mr Andrew Neil, presenter of BBC Television's Daily Politics, that the ISG had found no WMD in Iraq.[271]

494. In a letter to Sir Nigel Sheinwald on 24 September, Sir David Manning said that he had repeated to Mr Armitage how important it was to the UK that Dr Kay stress the provisional nature of his first report.[272] Sir David had also explained that there was "an immediate timing issue", with "a difficult Labour Party conference lying in wait".

495. Sir Nigel Sheinwald spoke to Dr Rice on 25 September.[273] He explained the damaging impact of the recent leak and the extent of the Prime Minister's concern. The leak had changed the situation and the UK hoped it would be possible to bring forward Dr Kay's testimony in order to reduce the period of uncertainty.

496. Mr Wood told Mr Scarlett on 25 September that President Bush's critics were:

> "… primed to portray the Kay Report as more bad news from Iraq for the Administration. Leaks will get worse next week when the Report is circulated … The media focus will inevitably be on the failure to find weapons. The more of Kay's Report is in the public domain, the less freedom critics will have to engage in inaccurate speculation.
> "There may be more bad news round the corner in Congress, where … the Senate Intelligence Committee may be coming to the conclusion that the judgements on Iraq WMD in the US National Intelligence Estimate of October 2002 were not justified by the raw intelligence."[274]

497. SIS3 responded to No.10's request [for additional material needed before the publication of the ISG Interim Report] on 26 September. SIS recognised:

> "… the need to bolster Kay's Interim Report on publication but … the release of any of our material on the Iraqi ballistic missile programme into the public domain would give us severe difficulty. This is a matter not just of source protection in relation to individual items, but of SIS being perceived by Iraqis and others to have received material in confidence and then been involved in releasing it in raw form to the press. This could damage SIS's reputation and make it even harder, in already adverse circumstances, to induce Iraqis to reveal the hard core secrets of the former regime's WMD programmes."[275]

498. On 29 September, Mr Wood reported that:

> "… despite pressing hard … we have not been able to get any further clarity from the NSC or CIA on what the Administration plan to make publicly available of David Kay's Report or of his testimony to Congress".[276]

499. Mr Wood explained that the Iraq WMD story was "now running full-bore in the US media". Democratic sources in Congress had leaked a letter from the House Intelligence Committee to Mr Tenet arguing that the judgements on Iraqi WMD in the US National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) of October 2002 were based on outdated, fragmentary and circumstantial evidence. Mr Wood added that "the media … understand that this is something of a bombshell, and will not let this one drop."

500. On 30 September, Mr Miller reported that the classified Interim Report would be handed to the UK later that day. US intentions on handling the unclassified text remained uncertain.[277]

501. The classified version of the ISG Interim Report was received in London on 30 September.

502. Before Dr Kay delivered his unclassified testimony to Congress on 2 October, Mr Rycroft sent an advance copy of the text to Mr Blair at the Labour Party Conference in Bournemouth. Mr Rycroft commented:

> "There is better than expected detail in this, particularly on missiles, nuclear + BW. Even the CW section is not bad. And the Report makes clear the interim nature, + the difficulties of the WMD search".[278]

503. Mr Rycroft asked for urgent comments from the FCO, the MOD and the Cabinet Office on a draft core script for use by the Government in response to Dr Kay's testimony.[279] The draft stated:

> "The ISG have discovered dozens of WMD-related programme activities in breach of UNSCRs and significant amounts of equipment in Iraq concealed from the UN.
> "Six things in the ISG Report:
> - There was a clandestine network of laboratories and safe houses within the Iraqi Intelligence Service that contained equipment subject to UN monitoring and suitable for continuing CBW research. None of these were declared.
> - They have found a prison laboratory complex, possibly used in human testing of BW agents, which Iraqi officials were explicitly told not to declare to UN inspectors.
> - A vial of a strain from which botulinum can be produced was hidden in the home of an Iraqi scientist, along with … other vials. The same scientist says he was asked to hide a further large cache of agents and refused. That cache is still missing. NB it takes just 1-10 nanograms of botulinum to kill an adult.
> - … [T]here was R and D work that paired overt work with surrogates for prohibited agents, such as anthrax and ricin. NB it takes just 1-7 micrograms of ricin to kill an adult. These are consistent with a BW programme ready for surge production.
> - Iraqi scientists and senior government officials have told the ISG that Saddam remained firmly committed to acquiring nuclear weapons, and that he would have resumed nuclear weapons development as soon as the West relaxed … Nuclear work had restarted under Dr Said.
> - It is clear that Saddam ordered the development of ballistic missiles with a range up to 1,000km … SCUD fuel production continued until at least 2001.

Iraq tried to procure missiles from North Korea with a range of 1,300km. And Iraq was continuing to develop Unmanned Aerial Vehicles with ranges over 500km.

"Even in the area of CW, where the ISG have not yet found the unaccounted for … and other material, there is emerging evidence of Iraqi attempts to restart production, and many leads for the ISG to follow up.

"All of these are breaches of UNSCRs. Any one of them, had it been known at the time, would surely have triggered a report back to the UN Security Council and an explicit authorisation from the UNSC for the use of military force following UNSCR 1441.

"Yet this is just the tip of the iceberg:

- This is just an interim report …
- The ISG's working environment has been very difficult … Some WMD personnel left Iraq during the conflict.
- Above all, there is now clear evidence of a pattern of deliberate deception and concealment, probably centrally organised … Scientists were threatened with death to stop them talking to UN inspectors. Some are still under threat now.

"So the Kay Report is not a final reckoning of Iraq's WMD. He concludes that we cannot say definitively either that weapon stocks do not exist or that they did exist before the war. We are not at the point where we can close the file on any of these programmes, he says. But what is clear already, after only three months, is that – at the very least – Saddam kept in place the programmes and the deception/concealment techniques so that he could revive his chemical, biological and nuclear weapons capability when the coast was clear. The ISG's work must go on before we can have definite answers."

504. The Inquiry has not seen any comments from other departments.

505. Dr Kay delivered his testimony to Congress on 2 October. He described the Interim Report as a "snapshot" of the ISG's first three months' work.

506. Dr Kay stated that the ISG had discovered "dozens of WMD-related program activities and significant amounts of equipment that Iraq concealed from the United Nations during the inspection that began in late 2002".

507. Dr Kay avoided drawing conclusions, but stated that Saddam Hussein "had not given up his aspirations and intentions to continue to acquire weapons of mass destruction".

508. In his unclassified testimony to Congress on 2 October, Dr Kay emphasised that the Interim Report was a "snapshot" after the ISG's first three months' work.[280] It was "far too early" to reach definitive conclusions and in some areas that goal might never be reached.

509. Dr Kay stated that the ISG had "not yet found stocks of weapons", but nor was it "yet at the point where we can say definitively either that such weapon stocks do not exist or that they existed before the war". Search efforts were being hindered by six main factors:

- deception and denial were built into each Iraqi WMD programme;
- there had been deliberate dispersal and destruction of material and documentation;
- looting, some of it systematic and deliberate;
- some WMD personnel had left Iraq immediately before and during the conflict;
- any weapons or material were likely to be small and difficult to find; and
- the environment in Iraq was "far from permissive".

510. Dr Kay stated that the ISG had discovered "dozens of WMD-related program activities and significant amounts of equipment that Iraq concealed from the United Nations during the inspection that began in late 2002", and listed examples.

511. Dr Kay explained that, although he had resisted drawing conclusions in the Interim Report, a number of things had become clearer as a result of the ISG's work:

- Saddam Hussein "had not given up his aspirations and intentions to continue to acquire weapons of mass destruction".
- There were "well advanced, but undeclared, ongoing activities" in the area of delivery systems that "would have resulted in the production of missiles with ranges up to 1,000km" if Operation Iraqi Freedom had not intervened.
- The ISG was confident that there had been ongoing clandestine CBW research and development activities embedded in the Iraqi Intelligence Service.

512. Discussion of the Interim Report at the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD on 3 October focused on media coverage.[281] The response from UK defence correspondents had been encouraging and there were no plans for Mr Blair to comment publicly. The meeting judged that press interest in the UK was likely to die down.

513. The meeting concluded that there was "no benefit in producing a JIC Assessment" of the Interim Report, but a "community wide analysis" should be made through a CIG meeting.

[281] Minutes, 3 October 2003, JIC Sub-Committee on IRAQ/WMD meeting.

514. Mr Scarlett discussed handling of the ISG Interim Report with Mr Tenet, Mr Stephen Hadley (Deputy National Security Advisor) and others in Washington on 2 and 3 October.[282]

515. Mr Scarlett reiterated to all those he met:

> "… the extreme political sensitivity of the issues in London and the need to bear UK political interests in mind, even when partisan and interagency tensions in Washington were high."

516. Mr Wood reported that Dr Kay had stated publicly that he would need six to nine months' work before he could begin to draw firm conclusions.

517. Mr Wood also commented on the tensions between senior members of the US Administration about the responsibility for inserting a reference to yellowcake into President Bush's 2003 State of the Union speech, which provoked "public warfare" and:

> "… looming over the horizon, the potentially much more serious matter of the Congressional Oversight Committees concluding after detailed review that the entire October 2002 NIE was flawed. The potential for renewed, and more serious, internecine warfare is very clear."

518. In his memoir, Mr Tenet wrote:

> "Collectively, Kay's interim testimony was a damning portrait of deception and dissembling … Yet in the resulting headlines, the press stressed only what Kay had not found. None of it, however was the 'smoking gun' that would justify our NIE estimates …"[283]

519. On 5 October, Sir Nigel Sheinwald sent Dr Rice a Note written by Mr Blair for President Bush about their common political interest in addressing the problems related to Iraq.[284] The Note and the wider background of the deteriorating position in Iraq are addressed in Section 9.2.

520. In relation to WMD, Mr Blair wrote that the failure to find "enough on WMD" and the losses to terrorist attacks meant the public was led to doubt whether the invasion had been:

> "… worth it, or even worse is persuaded we misled them. And in the international community there is a sense of Schadenfreude …
> "We need a coherent strategy to get us back on the high ground and get the public, at home and abroad, to focus on the big picture."

521. Mr Blair characterised the position as "a battle for legitimacy" which had to be won. The issue of WMD was about more than Iraq, it was a global threat. Iraq had been the "starting place":

> "… because of the history. But the reason for action was never Iraq in isolation. It was Iraq as a test case of how determined we were to confront the threat.
> "My worry now is that the world thinks: well, Iraq was a tough deal, so they won't try that again.
> "I think we must be absolutely unapologetic. This is the security threat. We must deal with it. This means:
> (a) The Libya deal is really important …
> (b) Iran and North Korea should not be put on the back burner … We need to be, if anything, stronger on this. Not that we're about to go to war. But that it's only as a result of Iraq that these nations know we're serious and we can resolve it peacefully.
> (c) A public disruption of the trade in WMD …"

522. Mr Blair suggested that the UK and US needed a "strategic plan to re-highlight the terrorism/WMD issue", and to:

> "Get our confidence in our story back. Iraq is better without Saddam. WMD/terror remains the 21st century threat. Our global agenda is the only way to a better future not just for us but for the world. We're not going soft on it. We're going to be utterly determined on it, because it's right.
> "… [M]y political position is very clear. I won't win re-election on Iraq alone. But if Iraq is wrong or people don't get the security threat, it will be a major problem. On the other hand, if Iraq comes right and people do get the threat, my opponents will have a lot of explaining to do."

523. In a letter on 6 October, Mr Blair wrote that he was:

> "… very grateful for SIS's remarkable contribution both to the Iraq campaign and on the complex political and diplomatic manoeuvrings which preceded it".[285]

524. In his video conference with President Bush on 7 October, Mr Blair commented that Dr Kay's Interim Report had been better than the UK media had anticipated.[286]

Follow-up to the ISG Interim Report

525. In October, UK officials identified Iraq's CW and BW programmes as the issues needing most work. The ISG had opened up several lines of investigation on BW. There had been little progress on CW.

526. On 9 October, Mr Howard sent Mr Scarlett a paper on the future direction of the ISG, agreed with members of his WMD Task Force, suggesting that the ISG focus its effort on areas where knowledge was "most incomplete".[287]

527. Although work remained to be done on every subject, BW and CW were the most challenging. The most comprehensive areas of the Interim Report were: nuclear and long-range missile programmes; denial, deception and destruction; and procurement networks.

528. The ISG's findings on BW had opened up several lines of investigation which "should continue to be pursued with vigour". Efforts to find evidence of CW research and production had yielded little. Mr Howard suggested that it might be better "to focus on the other end of the food chain and concentrate on amassing evidence of possible deployment, or plans for deployment of CW".

529. Further work would be needed in two important supporting areas:

- encouraging sources to come forward; and
- ensuring that relevant information on Iraqi WMD generated outside Iraq was fed into the ISG.

530. Mr Howard reported that Dr Kay was hinting that "the final reckoning may not happen for another six to nine months", which was "probably realistic". He recommended striking a balance between producing further interim reports with something substantive to say and allowing the ISG to continue its work out of the public gaze. A number of "external drivers", including the Panorama programme on WMD, the outcome of the Hutton Inquiry and the need to make the case to Congress for additional funding for the ISG could have an impact.

531. Mr Howard also wrote that the probability that force protection and counter-terrorism would soon be given equal status with the search for WMD in the ISG's work was a "potential complicating factor". His major concern was that the ISG should be given sufficient security and logistical support to carry out the investigative work needed.

532. The JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD discussed Mr Howard's paper on 10 October.[288] It was agreed that he should produce a version for the US and that the importance of offering immunity or amnesty to witnesses should be emphasised at the highest level. Advice on specific examples should be sought from the ISG before the issue was put on the agenda for discussion between Mr Blair and President Bush.

House of Commons debate on Iraq, 22 October 2003

533. On 22 October, the House of Commons rejected a third Opposition motion calling for an independent judge-led inquiry into pre-conflict intelligence.

534. On 22 October, the House of Commons debated an Opposition motion to set up "a comprehensive independent judicial inquiry into the Government's handling of the run-up to the war, of the war itself, and of its aftermath, and into the legal advice which it received".[289]

535. The Opposition motion was defeated by 303 votes to 190.[290] The Government amendment, adopted by 293 votes to 141, stated:

> "That this house notes that the Intelligence and Security Committee … the appropriate body to consider the intelligence relating to Iraq, and the Foreign Affairs Committee have both carried out inquiries into matters relating to the decision to go to war in Iraq; further notes that substantial oral and written evidence, by and on behalf of the Government, was provided to both inquiries; believes that there is no case for a further inquiry, including a judicial inquiry …"[291]

536. During the debate Mr Straw was asked by Mr Tony Wright (Labour) whether he still believed that the Iraqi regime had represented "a clear and present danger" to the UK. Mr Straw replied:

> "Yes, I do … It [the ISG] has done a great deal of work and found a good deal of evidence. I regret that, because of the environment in which it has been working, it has not so far been able to find more. However, nothing that it has found so far has diminished my view of the threat."[292]

Impact of the transfer of ISG resources from WMD to counter-terrorism

537. The Op ROCKINGHAM daily report on 21 October stated that the ISG had aborted an exploitation mission after a convoy had been attacked twice with Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs).[293] There had been one very minor injury and three vehicles had been damaged.

538. Maj Gen Dayton announced during an ISG video conference on 21 October that counter-terrorism had been given equal status with WMD in the ISG's work, but that no extra US resources were being made available.[294]

539. On 22 October, Mr Howard informed the Chiefs of Staff of the ISG's decision.[295]

540. Mr Oakden reported that the UK contribution to the ISG would gradually change to include a counter-terrorism element.[296]

541. On 30 October, Op ROCKINGHAM reported another IED attack on an ISG convoy:

> "Although the number of ISG missions attacked is still small, and no serious injuries have yet been sustained, the incidents do appear to be occurring more frequently."[297]

542. Mr Howard told the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD on 4 November that a number of US document exploitation experts, case officers and analysts were being diverted to counter-terrorism work.[298] Maj Gen Dayton was reported to be satisfied that this could happen without damaging the WMD effort; Dr Kay was less sure. DIS would be deploying some analysts shortly "who could be applied to either target".

543. Mr Scarlett and Mr Dowse expressed concern about an apparent loss of ISG momentum since the Interim Report. Op ROCKINGHAM reports were "very thin these days".

544. Members of the Sub-Committee agreed that media interest had moved on from WMD, pending publication of the Hutton Report. The BBC Panorama report on the ISG would air on 29 November. SIS reported that the programme would focus heavily on missiles, but also show the difficult conditions under which the ISG was working.

545. On 11 November, Mr Howard reported to Mr Scarlett that the ISG's "operational tempo remains at a very high level, though some site missions have been postponed due to the increased security threat. The ISG functional teams are all continuing to conduct debriefing and site exploitation operation."[299] There had also been a considerable increase in the ability to exploit documents and different media formats.

546. Mr Howard added that the apparent reduction in reporting was the result of the move away from large-scale acquisition of data characteristic of the initial months of operation. Staff turnover and fatigue had also contributed. Measures were in hand to address that. The DIS had now "lowered reporting thresholds" for Op ROCKINGHAM daily and weekly reports so that they reflected better the tempo of activity.

547. On 10 November, Sir Nigel Sheinwald informed Mr Blair that Dr Kay expected to report to Congress again in February or March 2004. Dr Kay hoped to have more evidence of WMD programmes, but expected the basic story to be unchanged.

548. During a meeting with Sir Nigel Sheinwald in Baghdad on 8 November, Dr Kay said that the ISG had uncovered more material since the Interim Report:

- evidence of development of a ceramic warhead for CW use in 2001:
- details of the movement of suspect items to Syria immediately before the war;
- work on the stability of CW precursor agents between July 2002 and January 2003;
- laboratory testing of advanced chemical agents; and
- an anthrax stimulant production line "up to the outbreak of war".[300]

549. Dr Kay was reported to have criticised Coalition handling of detainees. Many had been debriefed for tactical information only and there was a severe shortage of trained interrogators.

550. Dr Kay envisaged that, by June 2004, the ISG would have about 80 percent of the picture on Iraqi WMD. At that point, it might be appropriate to reconsider its role. He did not want it to have an open-ended, diminishing role, or to see it refocused on other tasks. By June 2004, he would also expect Iraq to perceive the ISG as very intrusive.

551. As part of his wider report on his visit to Iraq (see Section 9.2), Sir Nigel Sheinwald told Mr Blair that Dr Kay expected to report to Congress again in February or March 2004.[301] Dr Kay hoped to have further specific evidence of WMD programmes, but the basic story would be unchanged. Sir Nigel had told Dr Kay that, if there was a further interim report, better handling would be needed: "a proper strategy with the key points identified in advance so that we were not put on the back foot by leaks".

552. Sir Nigel asked Mr Blair whether there was anything else he wanted said to Dr Kay or the CIA. Mr Blair replied:

> "Just keep me informed as to what he's finding; & surely we must now know what happened to WMD. What do our pre-war contacts say?"[302]

553. Mr Scarlett informed Sir Nigel on 17 November that he had asked the DIS to review the new material described by Dr Kay in his meeting with Sir Nigel Sheinwald.[303] The DIS had concluded, "not for the first time, Kay may have talked up some of the current ISG lines of enquiry". The DIS had not been able immediately to substantiate the areas highlighted by Dr Kay. They should be treated with caution.

554. At its meeting on 28 November, the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD concluded that the BBC Panorama programme, broadcast on 23 November, "had presented a fairly balanced view of the current state of ISG investigations. It suggested that some progress had been made, but concluded that the jury was still out on the question of Iraqi WMD."[304]

Government responses to the FAC

555. In November 2003, the FCO sent its initial response to the FAC report The Decision to go to War in Iraq, which had been published on 7 July and is described earlier in this Section.[305]

556. The FCO stated that several judgements in the September 2002 dossier had been borne out by subsequent UNMOVIC inspections and the work of the ISG. They included:

- Iraq's programme to extend the range of the Al Samoud missile;
- Iraq's programme to produce even longer-range missiles;
- concealment of documents at the homes of personnel associated with WMD programmes;
- undeclared UAV capabilities;
- a dual-use capability, "to a greater or lesser extent", at most of the sites listed in the dossier and visited by UNMOVIC;
- evidence presented in the ISG Interim Report of viable seed stocks of clostridium botulinum organisms and covert laboratories working on assassination techniques using WMD-related materials; and
- ISG reporting of systematic Iraqi concealment of nuclear weapons-related materials, personnel and capabilities.

557. Separately, in September 2003, the FCO had sent an initial response to the FAC's 15 July 2003 report Foreign Policy Aspects of the War Against Terrorism, in which it listed key lessons from weapons inspections in Iraq and the UK's own BW practice challenge inspection programme.[306] Those included "the critical importance of interviews for effective inspections" and "the need to keep in mind … sites that could be misused to produce, modify, test and store BW delivery systems".

558. On 19 November, Mr Donald Anderson, Chairman of the FAC, asked Mr Straw for answers to a number of questions arising from the Government's response to the 15 July report, including on lessons learned from the ISG.[307]

559. On WMD, Mr Anderson wrote:

> "… the Committee asked that the Government set out in detail the lessons that can be learnt from the experience of UN weapons inspections in Iraq for the future monitoring of BW programmes. The Committee now requests a memorandum setting out the lessons learnt from the Iraq Survey Group. It also wishes to learn how the past year's weapons inspections process will contribute to developing policy towards monitoring and addressing the threat of WMD from Iran, Syria and other states of concern."

560. FCO officials recommended that Mr Straw inform Mr Anderson that, in relation to the ISG, it would not be appropriate to divert resources from an ongoing operation or to try to present lessons learned from an incomplete process.[308]

561. In his response to Mr Anderson on 2 December, Mr Straw stated:

> "The Iraq Survey Group is part of an ongoing operation. I do not believe it would be appropriate at this stage to divert resources away from the ISG's operational role or to attempt to present lessons learned from an incomplete process.
> "Her Majesty's Government … has not been given access to UNMOVIC's records … It is not, therefore, possible to carry out any full analysis of what lessons have been learned. The UK has … encouraged UNMOVIC to carry out such an exercise. If UNMOVIC does conduct an analysis, it is by no means certain that we would have access to the results.
> "What has become clear from the experience of weapons inspections in Iraq since 1991 is the need for intrusive inspection regimes to generate confidence that no illegal activities are taking place."[309]

The transition from Dr Kay to Mr Duelfer

562. In December 2003, Dr Kay was reported to be considering leaving the ISG. His departure was confirmed in January 2004.

563. At the beginning of December, UK officials learned from their US counterparts that Dr Kay was considering not returning to Iraq after his visit to the US in the second week of December.[310]

564. Mr Scarlett told Sir Nigel Sheinwald that the reasons were not clear, but Dr Kay was reported to have objected strongly to the transfer of some of the ISG's resources from WMD to work on the security situation and to be concerned about the difficulty and danger of ISG activity in Iraq.

565. On 5 December, Mr Scarlett reported that Sir Richard Dearlove had been told that Dr Kay's departure was not certain and that, if he did go, there would be "a heavyweight replacement".[311] Sir Richard had also received confirmation that there would be no reduction in resources devoted to the ISG's WMD work and the job would be done thoroughly.

566. Sir Nigel Sheinwald commented to Mr Blair on 8 December:

> "… it now seems that Kay has to be persuaded to stay on. It seems unlikely that he'll stay, as planned, until next summer."[312]

567. Mr Howard discussed the ISG with Mr John McLaughlin, Deputy Director for Central Intelligence, in Washington on 11 December.[313] Mr Howard said that he was "scouring the barrel" to meet a request from Mr McLaughlin to find more people for the ISG. The UK would be able to supply an additional four former UN inspectors with BW expertise and was looking to see if it could provide more good analysts. The principal UK BW experts could not be spared full-time, but could continue to deploy to the ISG in short bursts. Mr Howard suggested that better use could be made of the UK mobile laboratory.

568. Mr Howard also reiterated that the UK would need "full consultation on timing, content and presentation of any interim report".

569. On 15 December, Mr Cannon sent Mr Blair a list of "key points" from the ISG Interim Report for use at PMQs.[314] It largely repeated the draft core script sent out by Mr Rycroft on 2 October. The key additions, taken from the Interim Report, were:

- "Two key former BW scientists confirmed that Iraq under the guise of legitimate activity developed refinements of processes and products relevant to BW agents. The scientists discussed the development of improved, simplified fermentation and spray drying capabilities for the stimulant Bt [Bacillus Thurengiensis] that would have been directly applicable to anthrax, and one scientist confirmed that the production line for Bt could be switched to produce anthrax in one week if the seed stock were available."

- Sufficient evidence had been discovered "to conclude that the Iraqi regime was committed to delivery system improvements that would have, if Operation Iraqi Freedom had not occurred, dramatically breached UN restrictions … in 2000 Saddam ordered the development of ballistic missiles with ranges of at least 400km and up to 1,000km and that measures to conceal these projects from UNMOVIC were initiated in late 2002 … several sources contend that Saddam's range requirements for the missiles grew from 400-500km in 2000 to 600-1,000km in 2002."
- The ISG had found documents describing "a high level dialogue between Iraq and North Korea that began in December 1999 and included an October 2000 meeting in Baghdad. These documents indicate Iraqi interest in the transfer of technology for surface-to-surface missiles with a range of 1,300km … and land-to-sea missiles with a range of 300km. The documents quote the North Koreans as understanding the limitations imposed by the UN, but being prepared 'to co-operate with Iraq on the items it specified'."
- "Even in the area of CW … there is evidence of Iraqi interest in restarting production."
- "Dr Kay told the press that one scientist was 'assassinated literally hours after meeting' an ISG member, killed by a single shot to the back of his head outside his apartment."

570. The paper appears not to have been shown to Mr Blair.[315]

571. In an interview with the British Forces Broadcasting Service (BFBS), reported in the media on 16 December, Mr Blair stated:

> "… the Iraq Survey Group has already found massive evidence of a huge system of clandestine laboratories, workings by scientists, plans to develop long range ballistic missiles. Now frankly, these things weren't being developed unless they were developed for a purpose …"[316]

572. On 18 December, The Washington Post reported that US Government officials had confirmed that Dr Kay intended to leave the ISG before it completed its work.[317] The newspaper also reported: "The insurgency has forced the Pentagon to divert personnel from Kay's team to help commanders identify and question insurgents."

573. Brigadier Garry Robison, Brig Deverell's successor as ISG Deputy Commander, reported on 7 January 2004 that the preparation of cases against High Value Detainees (HVDs) for the forthcoming human rights tribunal had not yet had a direct impact on the ISG, but had the potential to do so.[318] Rules preventing UK ISG personnel from direct involvement in the preparation of evidence and testimony for the tribunal were well understood.

574. Mr Scarlett informed No.10 on 7 January that the US had confirmed that Dr Kay would be leaving the ISG "probably by the end of next week".[319]

575. In January 2004, in the absence of compelling finds in Iraq, the Government sought to emphasise the impact of military action in Iraq on wider counter-proliferation efforts.

576. On 11 January, Mr Blair was asked by Sir David Frost on BBC Television's Breakfast with Frost whether he should apologise for apparently being wrong about WMD in Iraq. Mr Blair replied: "What they've [the ISG] found already is a whole raft of evidence about clandestine operations that should have been disclosed to the United Nations."[320]

577. Pressed by Sir David Frost on the absence of weapons, Mr Blair said: "there is … something bizarre about the idea that Saddam had these weapons, got rid of them and then never disclosed the fact that he got rid of them."

578. Asked if he thought there was still a chance that WMD would be found, Mr Blair replied:

> "I believe that we will but I agree … there were many people who thought we were going to find this during the course of the actual operation … In a land mass twice the size of the UK it may well not be surprising that you don't find where this stuff is hidden because part of the intelligence was that it was hidden and concealed. But you know we just have to wait and see."

579. On 13 January, Mr Scarlett told No.10 that Dr Kay's departure had been delayed "to distance it from a spate of critical WMD articles in last week's US media".[321]
Mr Scarlett reported that draft US press lines focused on three points:

- The departure does not mean Kay has concluded that no weapons will be found.
- The ISG has more work to do on WMD.
- Ideally, Kay would have preferred ISG resources not to be diverted (as to some extent they have been) to counter terrorism …"

580. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed Dr Kay's departure in their video conference on 14 January.[322] Mr Blair said that Dr Kay's departure would have an impact in the UK media. He hoped the CIA would work with the UK on handling.

581. In a Cabinet discussion of the situation in Iraq on 15 January, a number of points were made on WMD, including that:

- Public opinion continued to focus on the absence of WMD discovered in Iraq, while the broader counter-proliferation story was inadequately covered.
- The report by Dr Blix in early 2003 (the "clusters" document of 6 March, see Section 3.7) had provided 173 pages of material about Iraq's WMD programme, including 10,000 litres of anthrax unaccounted for. There was a "strong presumption of its continued existence".
- The counter-proliferation progress in other countries, and "Libya in particular" was "dramatic". The military action in Iraq had had a "hugely beneficial effect on the international climate, but this was insufficiently recognised at home".[323]

582. Mr Blair concluded that the counter-proliferation successes which had been registered since the invasion of Iraq were "considerable and he hoped that there would be further developments in the next few weeks. The Government's supporters need to be briefed accordingly."

583. On 16 January, Mr Scarlett informed No.10 of the dates of a series of US Congressional hearings in February and March relevant to Iraqi WMD.[324] Potentially the most controversial was Mr Tenet's appearance on 4 March at a closed session of the Senate Intelligence Committee on pre-conflict Iraq-related intelligence, and there would almost certainly be an open session. It would be important to stay in contact with US briefing plans.

584. In his State of the Union address on 20 January, President Bush reported that:

> "We're seeking all the facts. Already the Kay report [the ISG Interim Report] identified dozens of weapons of mass destruction-related program activities and significant amounts of equipment that Iraq concealed from the United Nations. Had we failed to act, the dictator's weapons of mass destruction programs would continue to this day. Had we failed to act, Security Council resolutions on Iraq would have been revealed as empty threats, weakening the United Nations and encouraging defiance by dictators around the world."[325]

585. In January, with no timetable for the publication of the next ISG report, Mr Howard proposed a number of options. He recommended that the best approach might be to draw a line under the issue of WMD by summer 2004.

586. On 21 January, after visiting the ISG in Qatar, Baghdad and Basra, Mr Howard reported "a sense of uncertainty and lack of strategic direction" at the ISG headquarters in Baghdad: Dr Kay's successor had not been identified; the timing of future ISG reports was not known; and there was continuing debate about the extent of the ISG contribution on counter-terrorism.[326] Security remained an issue, but ISG staff morale seemed high and people were working "incredibly hard".

587. Mr Howard assessed that, despite the good work being done, the overall picture was not fundamentally different to that described in the Interim Report.

588. On the future of the ISG, Mr Howard suggested that the right option might be to draw a line under the issue of Iraqi WMD by summer 2004. There was no guarantee that the new Iraqi Government would be prepared to allow the ISG to continue after it took office and there was a possibility that the ISG's final analysis would look like the Interim Report: clear Iraqi intent to preserve and conceal an ability to reconstitute programmes, but no operational or current production capability.

589. Mr Howard identified three options for the next ISG report:

- a single, final report around June;
- the major substantive report in March or April, with loose ends tied up in June or July; or
- a low-key report focused on context and operating environment in March, with a substantive report in June.

590. On 22 January, Mr Scarlett produced a summary of the ISG's findings and possible points for Mr Blair to make in public.

591. Mr Scarlett sent No.10 a paper summarising the "current understanding" of the ISG's findings on 22 January.[327] The paper had been prepared within the Assessments Staff, in consultation with Mr Howard, but it had been given a limited distribution. It was not the result of a full JIC Assessment and had not been considered by a CIG.

592. The paper summarised what had been found, what remained to be done and questions raised by the ISG's work:

"What has been established?

"Nuclear Programmes

"The ISG have found documents and equipment, related to Iraq's pre-1991 nuclear programme … not declared to the UN/IAEA … Iraqi scientists and senior officials have stated that Saddam intended to reconstitute such a programme once sanctions were lifted. There is no evidence however, that Saddam explicitly ordered that research activity should continue for this specific purpose.

"Chemical and biological weapons

"The ISG have found documents and equipment at 13 undeclared laboratories and facilities … There is no clear evidence of a link to a military programme.

"… Legitimate work on biopesticides and other BW stimulants meant that expertise and production techniques … were maintained …

"The exact purpose of the two trailers discovered by the ISG in May 2003 has yet to be determined …

"Delivery systems

"… ISG have found substantial evidence of research and design work on longer range delivery systems (up to 1,000km range), and of substantial illegal procurement for all aspects of Iraq's missile programme …

"Concealment and destruction

"Iraq had failed to declare its programmes and equipment to the UN, and to comply with its obligations under successive UNSCRs …

"In addition … the ISG have found substantial evidence of the targeted destruction of documents, equipment and computer files …

"What is still to be done?

"… We do not have a complete picture; the ISG continues with its work despite the difficult operational environment …

"What has not been established?

"The ISG have not found chemical or biological weapons, agents or precursors in militarily significant quantities, nor any long range missiles. They cannot confirm the existence of active programmes for the development or production of chemical or biological weapons, or of steps to reconstitute the nuclear programme, after 1998. They have found nothing to substantiate the repeated reports that WMD was moved from Iraq into Syria, either before UNMOVIC arrived or immediately before, during and after the conflict.

What major questions does this raise?

- Why is the account … different from the intelligence picture before the conflict, which was broadly agreed by virtually all Western Governments …?
- Why did the Iraqi regime undertake such an extensive programme of concealment and deception at the UN? What were they trying to conceal and what did they destroy?
- Why, when UNMOVIC returned to Iraq in 2002, were so many obstacles placed in its way …?
- Was Saddam's key aim … to preserve the capability to reconstitute his programmes rapidly once UN sanctions were lifted …?
- … Did the fear of appearing weak drive Saddam's continuing denial and deception of the international community?
- Did Saddam, his colleagues and senior officials believe their own disinformation?"

593. Mr Scarlett suggested a list of points Mr Blair could make in public:

- The ISG had not so far found chemical or biological weapons or "evidence of the continued production of such weapons, or that the nuclear weapons programme was being reconstituted".
- It had found "evidence of efforts to maintain BW and nuclear capabilities".
- There was a "lot of evidence of planning and design work for missiles well beyond the permitted range".
- The ISG had "also found evidence that equipment and documentation were destroyed – including to deceive the UN inspectors in the final period before the conflict – and that Iraq failed to declare activities or otherwise comply with Security Council resolutions".
- The ISG had a lot of work still to do.

594. Those points raised "some big questions including":

- What was Saddam trying to conceal and why did he take such risks to do it? … Why did the regime continue to obstruct and defy the inspectors right up to the last minute?
- Was Saddam Hussein trying to preserve his capabilities and programmes while trying to get sanctions lifted as quickly as possible?
- Were Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi leadership properly informed about the state of their WMD facilities? Were they being told the truth by their subordinates?
- Why does what we have found (or not found) differ from the assessments of Iraq's WMD capabilities accepted by most major Governments and many reputable institutes pre-conflict?"

595. Mr Scarlett wrote that, if asked whether the UK was still confident that weapons would be found, the answer could be: "a lot of work has been going on, there is a lot of work still to do, and a lot of questions still to answer. We do not know how it will turn out in the end."

596. If asked whether the Government stood by the intelligence assessment in the September 2002 dossier, the answer could be: "we stand by the dossier as our best assessment on the information available at the time. Since September 2002 a great deal has happened. Again, we do not know what the ISG's eventual assessment will be."

597. Mr Scarlett described the purpose of the points offered as "a way of looking ahead to the future", building on Mr Blair's comments in his interview with Sir David Frost on 11 January. If they were to be used, the UK "must warn the Americans first".

598. Mr Rycroft described Mr Scarlett's note to Mr Blair as:

> "The first draft of a narrative on WMD to move our position on slightly, by floating possible explanations for the lack of WMD found so far, through questions rather than assertions."[328]

599. In relation to Mr Scarlett's point that the assessments pre-conflict had been accepted by most major governments, Mr Rycroft drew Mr Blair's attention to the provisions of resolution 1441 (2002), which had included:

> "Recognising the threat Iraq's non-compliance with Council resolutions and proliferation of WMD + long range missiles poses to international peace + security".

600. On 23 January, Mr Tenet announced Dr Kay's resignation and the appointment of Mr Charles Duelfer, who had been Deputy Executive Chairman of UNSCOM from 1993 to 2000, as the new Head of the ISG.[329]

601. Mr Tenet wrote in his memoir that he continued to defend the independence of the ISG under Mr Duelfer: "My guidance to Duelfer – just like my guidance to Kay – and to everyone in the ISG was simply to go out and find the truth."[330]

602. Mr Duelfer wrote that Mr Tenet "made good on his commitment" and instructed that the ISG should not be seeking to justify the NIE.[331]

603. In late January, the Government highlighted to the US the sensitivity in the UK of public comments in the US about the apparent absence of WMD in Iraq.

604. UK officials suggested that the two countries should keep in close step over their responses to calls for public inquiries into pre-conflict intelligence.

605. Dr Kay gave a number of briefings to US media before his testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee on 28 January.

606. In an interview for Reuters shortly after his resignation, widely reported in the UK media, Dr Kay stated:

> "I don't think they [WMD] existed. What everyone was talking about is stockpiles produced after the end of the last Gulf War and I don't think there was a large-scale production program in the nineties."[332]

607. The UK media also gave extensive coverage to comments by Secretary Powell on 24 January, including that it was an "open question" whether Iraq held any stocks of WMD.[333]

608. Speaking on BBC Television's Breakfast with Frost, Mr Kennedy said:

> "The more that we see the absence of weapons of mass destruction, the more we see both the Prime Minister and the President of the United States qualify what it is that the Iraq Survey Group may or may not uncover."[334]

609. Mr Rycroft spoke to the White House to underline the difficulties Secretary Powell's comments were causing in the UK.[335] Dr Rice urged that, as soon as possible, all public comments should refer back to resolution 1441: Saddam Hussein had WMD, had used them in the past and had obligations to destroy them. Resolution 1441 had given him a final opportunity to comply with his international obligations, which he had failed to take.

610. In an interview for The New York Times published on 25 January, Dr Kay said that Iraq had been "a dangerous place" with the ability to produce WMD, terrorist groups "passing through" and no central control.[336] But the CIA had missed signs of the "chaos" in the Iraqi regime that had corrupted Iraq's weapons capabilities. Iraqi scientists and documents had revealed that Iraq had also been far more concerned about UN inspections than Washington had ever realised.

611. Mr Rycroft discussed Iraqi WMD with Mr Hadley on 26 January.[337] Mr Rycroft set out the timetable for the Hutton Inquiry and "underlined the sensitivities of any US public comments particularly during this period". The US and UK should keep in "very close step" over their responses to growing calls in both countries for full public inquiries into the intelligence leading up to the war. The UK would continue to argue that, after the FAC, ISC and Hutton inquiries, another was unnecessary.

612. Mr Scarlett discussed Dr Kay's statements with a senior US official later on 26 January.[338] He reported to No.10 that Dr Kay's comments might make Mr Tenet's appearance before the Senate Intelligence Committee in early March more difficult. Mr Tenet was therefore considering a statement of his own on the intelligence underlying the NIE.

613. Mr Scarlett also reported that he had been told Mr Duelfer might pass through London on his way to Baghdad in about a week, and that it looked likely that there would be an interim ISG report in late March or early April.

614. Under the headline "Bush Backs Away From His Claims About Iraq Arms", The New York Times reported on 27 January that, now Dr Kay was suggesting Iraq's WMD had been disposed of before the invasion, President Bush had declined to repeat his earlier claims that WMD would be found.[339]

615. Reporting on the public debate in the US on 27 January, Sir David Manning wrote:

> "Kay is briefing the media extensively. His main theme is that, although the Administration have acted with integrity and were correct to invade Iraq, there has been a major intelligence failure on Iraq WMD."[340]

616. Sir David observed that President Bush's public line had become "a little more nuanced", leading the press to claim the White House was "in retreat". Sir David reported that on 27 January:

> "Bush was sounding a bit less bullish and a bit more nuanced ('I think it's very important for us [the US Administration] to let the Iraq Survey Group do its work so we can find out the facts and compare the facts to what was thought … [T]here is no doubt in my mind that Saddam Hussein was a grave and gathering threat to America and the world')."

617. Sir David concluded:

> "From the point of view of a White House political strategist, Kay's line looks probably not too unhelpful: it is lowering public expectations of future WMD finds, increasing the pressure for this issue to be brought to closure before the election season gets going in earnest after Easter, and placing the blame for any false prospectus for war firmly with the intelligence agencies rather than with the Administration."

Dr Kay's evidence to the Senate Armed Services Committee, 28 January 2004

618. On 28 January, Dr Kay gave evidence to the Senate Armed Services Committee.[341] In his opening remarks, he stated:

> "A great deal has been accomplished by the [ISG] team … I think it important that it goes on and it is allowed to reach its full conclusion. In fact, I really believe it ought to be better resourced and totally focused on WMD …
> "But I also believe that it is time to begin the fundamental analysis of how we got here …
> "It turns out that we were all wrong, probably in my judgement, and that is most disturbing …
>
> "In my judgement … Iraq was in clear violation of the terms of resolution 1441…
> "We have discovered hundreds of cases, based on both documents, physical evidence and the testimony of Iraqis, of activities that were prohibited under the initial UN resolution 687 [1991] and that should have been reported under 1441, with Iraqi testimony that not only did they not tell the UN about this, they were instructed not to do it and they hid material.
> "I had innumerable analysts who came to me in apology that the world we were finding was not the world they had thought existed …
> "I wish it had been undue influence, because we know how to correct that … The fact that it wasn't tells me we've got a much more fundamental problem of understanding what went wrong …
> "I regret to say that I think at the end of the work of the ISG there's still going to be an unresolvable ambiguity about what happened.
> "A lot of that traces to the failure on April 9 [2003] to establish immediately physical security in Iraq – the unparalleled looting and destruction, a lot of which was directly intentional, designed by the [Iraqi] security services to cover the tracks of the Iraq WMD program and their other programs as well …"

619. Asked whether it was too early to pronounce that everyone had been wrong, that weapons might still be hidden, Dr Kay replied:

> "It's theoretically possible … When the ISG wraps up its work … there are still going to be people to say, 'You didn't look everywhere. Isn't it possible it was hidden someplace?" and the answer has got to be honestly, 'Yes, it's possible' …

[341] Centre for Research on Globalisation, 28 January 2004, Dr David Kay's Testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"But I agree, we're not in disagreement at all. The search must continue."

620. Mr Blair discussed the ISG with President Bush on 28 January.[342] Mr Blair said that the first ISG Report showed that Saddam Hussein had been in breach of multiple Security Council resolutions. When the next report came it would be necessary to ensure that it was properly presented.

621. Mr Duelfer wrote in his memoir that Dr Kay's testimony, "We were all wrong", had sounded conclusive even though Dr Kay had been declaring that Iraq was violating UN resolutions throughout the 1990s and in the lead-up to the war:

> "Aside from angering the staff he left in Iraq, Kay's declarations made it much more difficult to collect information from Iraqi sources. Once the world had heard the decrees of the former ISG leader, why should any of the Iraqis provide further information?"[343]

The Hutton Report, 28 January 2004

622. On 28 January, Lord Hutton published his report into the circumstances surrounding the death of Dr Kelly.[344] The principal conclusions of the Hutton Report relating to the September 2002 intelligence dossier and the 45 minutes claim are addressed in Section 4.2.

623. Commenting on the Hutton Report at the meeting of the JIC on 28 January, Mr Scarlett said:

> "The JIC's reputation had taken a knock in the short term but it was important to keep things in proportion. There continued to be great respect for the JIC and what it represented. The JIC's higher profile as a result of the Hutton Inquiry carried implications however that would need careful managing."[345]

624. Mr Scarlett also thanked the Committee members and the Assessments Staff for their support.

625. After the publication of the Hutton Report, the Government sent its deferred response to the 11 September 2003 ISC report Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessments.[346]

626. In response to the ISC's criticism that the 9 September 2002 JIC Assessment, 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios' (see Section 4.2), did not highlight in the Key Judgements the uncertainties and gaps in UK knowledge about Iraq's biological and chemical weapons, the Government stated that the JIC had followed convention: "The Key Judgements section is not intended to be a summary of the main facts in the paper."

627. The Government stated that the September 2002 dossier did present "a balanced view of the Iraq's CBW capability based on the intelligence available", but acknowledged that presentation of the 45 minutes issue "allowed speculation as to its exact meaning".

628. The Government took "careful note" of the ISC conclusion that the inhibiting effect of UN inspections was not fully reflected in JIC Assessments, but observed that JIC Assessments produced in October and December 2002 and in March 2003 did reflect the point.

629. In response to the ISC recommendation that, if individuals in the intelligence community formally wrote to their line managers with concerns about JIC Assessments those concerns should be brought to the attention of the JIC Chairman, the Government stated that it was "important to preserve the line management authority of JIC members in judging what should be brought to the attention of the JIC Chairman".

630. After the publication of the Hutton Report, the FCO also sent its deferred response to the conclusions about the 45 minutes claim and the September dossier in the 7 July 2003 FAC report on the decision to go to war in Iraq.[347] The FCO stated:

> "We disagree that the 45 minute claim was given undue prominence. The 45 minutes claim came from an established, reliable and long-standing line of reporting. It was included in an early September Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessment as soon as the underlying intelligence had become available. It was consistent with previous JIC judgements on Iraq's command and control arrangements. Other issues were given a similar level of prominence in the dossier: for example the judgement that Iraq was building up its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) capability and that it was concealing its programmes.

> "Had Saddam used chemical and biological weapons (CBW) munitions during the conflict we have no reason to doubt he could have deployed them in this timeframe.

The decision to establish the Butler Review

631. In late January, officials advised Mr Blair that there was "a clear risk" that President Bush would set up an inquiry into Iraq intelligence before he was forced to do so by Congress.

632. Sir Nigel Sheinwald discussed the mounting pressure for inquiries in the UK and the US with Dr Rice on 29 January.[348] He recommended that No.10 and the White House stay "in the closest touch" to ensure public lines were co-ordinated.

633. Sir Nigel told Mr Straw's office that the US Administration would prefer to make an announcement itself rather than be pushed into one by Congress or the media. It was clear that something was "stirring" in Washington. The announcement of an inquiry there would make it very difficult to hold the line in the UK.

634. Mr Powell sent a copy of Sir Nigel's letter to Mr Blair with the advice:

> "You must decide on this with Bush on Tuesday [3 February] before the [Parliamentary] debate on Wednesday."[349]

635. In a minute to Sir Nigel Sheinwald on 30 January, Mr Scarlett set out his understanding of developments in the US, including concern about a "Notification to Congress that one piece of intelligence underpinning" Secretary Powell's presentation to the UN on 5 February 2003 "came from an unreliable source", and that CIA analysts had missed a "fabrication warning".[350]

636. Mr Scarlett commented:

> "This discredited report was sent to SIS but not issued by them so it was not reflected in our classified assessments or in the dossier. There is one reference in the dossier (the Executive Summary) to mobile 'laboratories'. This was a general term to cover mobile facilities and was not meant to be distinct from 'production' units. In terms of any press lines it will be sufficient to say that the discredited report was not issued by SIS."

637. Mr Scarlett added:

> "The ground is audibly shifting in Washington. There is a clear risk that the Administration will set up an Inquiry into the Iraq intelligence. This will take many months to report and push the whole issue beyond November. It might have the side effect of prompting an early winding up of the ISG."

638. On 31 January, Mr Rycroft informed Mr Blair that, during a visit to Washington from 30 to 31 January, he had explained that recent comments from Mr Kay, Dr Rice and Secretary Powell had been damaging in the UK.[351] He had also argued against an intelligence inquiry, and for maximum transparency and co-ordination if the US decided to go down that route. There was a strong chance that the US would do so, possibly very fast.

639. Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair: "You need to raise with Bush at Monday's [2 February] video conference."

640. On 31 January, Sir David Manning reported growing political pressure on President Bush to admit intelligence failure and announce an inquiry.[352] Asked for his views on whether there should be an inquiry, President Bush had told the press:

> "… I too, want to know the facts. I want to be able to compare what the Iraq Survey Group has found with what we thought prior to going into Iraq. One thing is for certain – one thing we do know from Mr Kay's testimony, as well as from the years of intelligence that we had gathered, is that Saddam Hussein was a … growing danger."

641. Sir David Manning advised that President Bush's remarks suggested he was leaving himself room to set up an inquiry.

642. Mr Blair set out his position on Iraq and WMD in a Note sent to President Bush on 1 February.

643. Mr Blair recognised the need to learn lessons about the difficulties of gathering intelligence and that there was a legitimate issue about its accuracy, but at that stage envisaged asking the ISC to address the issue.

644. On 1 February, Sir Nigel Sheinwald sent Dr Rice a Note "by the Prime Minister" on Iraq and WMD, to be shown to President Bush before the video conference with Mr Blair on 2 February.[353]

645. The Note addressed two issues:

- "Iraq and WMD"; and
- "WMD as a threat more generally".

[353] Letter Sheinwald to Rice, 1 February 2004, 'Iraq and WMD' attaching Note [Blair to Bush], 'Note on WMD'.

646. On the former, Mr Blair wrote:

"We know Saddam had WMD. We know the ISG has not yet found weapons, though it has found evidence of programmes. The truth is that we anticipated finding the weapons during or shortly after the conflict. So to say we are surprised at the ISG's findings is no less than the truth.

"The issue of US/UK good faith can be laid to rest. We received the intelligence. We honestly believed it.

"The issue now is: was it right; and if it wasn't, what can we learn about the difficulties of gathering intelligence in these situations?

"What we can say is this:

"(a) there is no doubt that Saddam had WMD. It was not just US/UK intelligence agencies that said so, it was many others around the world. In any event, Saddam used them. The UN when it left in 1998 found stockpiles unaccounted for. That is why UN resolution 1441 unanimously described his weapons as a threat to world peace.

"(b) we should exercise some caution in saying definitely no stockpiles now exist. In the 1990s despite intensive investigation, the full extent of his programmes remained concealed for years. We know from intelligence pre-war that he intended to conceal them. The ISG has found ample evidence of an intention to conceal. Look at what we know now Libya is co-operating, compared with what we could speculate on, on the basis of intelligence.

"I don't concede there are no weapons. But I do concede we expected to find them sooner and there is plainly a legitimate issue about the accuracy of the intelligence.

"(c) let us get it clear what the ISG has said so far and what Dr Kay has said.

"The ISG has found:

- Evidence of efforts to maintain BW and nuclear capabilities including equipment, documents and organisms. Teams of scientists were retained to work on them.
- Planning and design work for missiles of up to 1,000km in range.
- Equipment and documentation being systematically destroyed …
- Undeclared laboratories and facilities that have a potential for BW and CW production, that should have been declared to the UN.
- In 2002, Iraq successfully tested an UAV with a range of 500km.

"All of these things are a breach of the UN resolutions.

"Therefore, though the ISG have not found evidence of actual weapons, they have found evidence of programmes. Any of this would have triggered a justification for conflict.

"Dr Kay has said:

- He believes no major new production of weapons occurred post-1991.
- He speculates that Saddam may have been told tales about the programmes or that some stuff moved to Syria.
- But some old stockpiles may well exist and the capabilities and determination remained intact.
- That Iraq was 'a very dangerous place'.
- That the conflict was justified, and
- That the US/UK did not interfere with the intelligence.

"He makes a claim also that Saddam was trying to manufacture ricin up to the last minute … but UK services at least don't seem to know the provenance of this.

"(d) however, in view of the fact that we certainly thought production of new weapons was continuing and it may be that it wasn't, it is sensible to learn the intelligence lessons.

"Therefore, the US is going to have a Commission of Experts look into it.

"The UK will refer the issue back to the Intelligence and Security Committee …

"Meanwhile the ISG will continue its work on the ground since there are at least 26 million pages of documents and many unvisited sites still to follow up."

647. On the wider threat from WMD, Mr Blair wrote:

"Whatever the intelligence from Iraq, let us be in no doubt about the threat.

"The threat of terrorism and proliferation of WMD continues. It would be disastrous if doubts about the strength of intelligence in Iraq blinded us to the danger. We know that Iran and North Korea are trying to develop nuclear weapons and it is only since Iraq that real pressure on them has started to pay off.

"We now know that Libya was far closer then we thought to nuclear capability and on CW than we thought; and, since Iraq they are working with us to eliminate it …"

648. Mr Blair concluded:

"If we have to accept that some of the Iraq intelligence was wrong, we will do so. But let us not either (a) lurch to the opposite extreme and start pretending Iraq had nothing; or (b) let any intelligence inaccuracy move us off confronting the WMD issue.

"So we need:

To put ourselves in the right place on accepting some intelligence may have been wrong and letting that be looked into.

To get across what Kay and the ISG are actually saying.

To reassert the importance of the WMD question."

649. On 1 February, US media reported that President Bush would shortly be announcing "a bipartisan, independent commission to investigate apparent flaws in intelligence used to justify the Iraq war".[354]

650. Mr Straw spoke to Secretary Powell on 1 February.[355] Secretary Powell explained that the US planned to make an announcement about the independent commission, probably on 2 February. Mr Straw briefed Secretary Powell on the discussion in the UK. It would be important, if possible, to make announcements at the same time.

651. Following a discussion with Dr Rice that evening, Sir Nigel Sheinwald wrote to Mr Geoffrey Adams, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, reporting that Mr Blair, Mr Straw and others had been "reflecting on how to handle the issue of intelligence on Iraqi and other WMD in the light of developing US plans".[356] Mr Blair would be chairing a meeting the next morning to discuss the way forward.

652. The following day, President Bush confirmed that he would make an announcement once the details had been agreed.[357]

653. The Executive Order establishing a "Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction" was published on 6 February.[358] It stated that the Commission should:

"… assess whether the Intelligence Community is sufficiently authorized, organized, equipped, trained, and resourced to identify and warn in a timely manner of, and support United States Government efforts to respond to, the development and transfer of knowledge, expertise, technologies, materials, and resources associated with the proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction, related means of delivery, and other related threats of the 21st century and their employment by foreign powers …"

654. Mr Blair and Mr Straw met early on 2 February.[359] Sir Andrew Turnbull (Cabinet Secretary), Sir David Omand, Mr Scarlett, Sir Richard Dearlove, Dr David Pepper (Director, GCHQ), Mr Ehrman, Mr Powell, Sir Nigel Sheinwald, Baroness Morgan (No.10 Director of Political and Government Relations), and other officials from No.10 were present.

655. The meeting concluded that the Government would set up a committee to review the intelligence on WMD, and agreed its Terms of Reference and membership. It "should be wider than the ISC"; and it "should look at intelligence on WMD in general, not just Iraq".

656. In their video conference on 2 February, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed their intentions to establish commissions to examine aspects of the pre-conflict intelligence on Iraq and WMD.[360] They also discussed the timescale for the ISG to produce its final report and whether, in the meantime, further material from the ISG's Interim Report could be used in public.

657. In Mr Blair's view, the ISG had already found weapons programmes, plans to restart programmes after the UNMOVIC inspectors left and hitherto undiscovered breaches of UN resolutions. The public and media had not digested the implications of the reports and Dr Kay's remarks. There was enough in the ISG's findings to justify US/UK military action. When the findings were linked to the wider picture, it would have been irresponsible not to take action on Iraq.

658. Following the discussion, Sir Nigel Sheinwald sent draft Terms of Reference for the UK committee to Dr Rice, stating that they had been revised in the light of the video conference, but were "very much a working draft".[361]

659. In a subsequent letter, Sir Nigel wrote that he had made clear that the UK Terms of Reference, which Dr Rice had not yet seen, were narrower that those under consideration in the White House, and the aim was to complete the review "as soon as possible".[362]

660. On 2 February, Mr Scarlett sent Mr Powell suggested amendments to Mr Blair's Note to President Bush on WMD.[363] They were "Points of detail but some are important to get right".

661. A revised version of the Note Mr Blair had sent to President Bush, with Mr Scarlett's amendments underlined, was passed to Mr Blair as part of the brief for his appearance before the House of Commons Liaison Committee.[364] The amendments included:

- "… The UN when it left in 1998 noted that large stockpiles of weapons and agents were unaccounted for. They are still unaccounted for. That is why UN resolution 1441 unanimously recognised the threat posed to international peace and security by Iraq's proliferation of WMD and long range missiles."
- "… Look at what we know about Libya's CW weapons, now that they are co-operating compared with what we could obtain through intelligence."
- "… [T]hough the ISG has not found evidence of actual weapons, they have found substantial evidence of prohibited activities".
- Three additions to the list of points made by Dr Kay:
  - "Iraq was in clear violation of the terms of UNSCR 1441".
  - "Iraq deliberately waged a policy of destruction and looting".
  - "[T]he ISG has learned things about Iraq's WMD programmes that no UN inspector could have learned".

662. On 2 February, UK news media reported the imminent announcement of a decision to set up a UK inquiry into intelligence on WMD.[365]

663. The Guardian described the forthcoming announcement as "a major u-turn" which had been "forced upon" Mr Blair by President Bush's decision to hold an inquiry in the US.[366]

664. In his evidence to the Liaison Committee on 3 February, Mr Blair stated:

> "The whole reason why we took this action in Iraq was because of the risk posed by an unstable state with weapons of mass destruction capability and the risk that at some point, not necessarily immediately, but at some point in the future, that then gets into the hands of those who are terrorists with terrorist intent."[367]

665. Mr Straw announced Mr Blair's decision to establish a committee to review intelligence on WMD in the House of Commons on 3 February.[368] The Terms of Reference of the committee, to be chaired by Lord Butler, would be:

> "… to investigate the intelligence coverage available in respect of WMD programmes in countries of concern and on the global trade in WMD, taking into account what is now known about these programmes; as part of this work, to investigate the accuracy of intelligence on Iraqi WMD up to March 2003, and to examine any discrepancies between the intelligence gathered, evaluated and used by the Government before the conflict, and between that intelligence and what has been discovered by the Iraq Survey Group since the end of the conflict; and to make recommendations to the Prime Minister for the future on the gathering, evaluation and use of intelligence on WMD, in the light of the difficulties of operating in countries of concern."

666. Mr Straw explained that, while the ISC, FAC and Hutton inquiries had been under way:

"… three proposals were put before the House in June, July and late October on Opposition motions calling for wider inquiries into aspects of the Government's handling of events in the run-up to the Iraq war. At the time, the Government resisted those calls, including on the ground that the inquiries already under way should be allowed to complete their work. Later, both the Prime Minister and I also referred to the continuing activities of the Iraq Survey Group.

"Over the past week, we have seen the publication of the Hutton Report and the evidence of Dr David Kay, former head of the Iraq Survey Group, to a US Congressional Committee. It has also emerged that the Iraq Survey Group may take longer to produce a final report than we had all originally envisaged. All that has led the Government now to judge that it is appropriate to establish this new inquiry of Privy Councillors."

667. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed WMD on 4 February.[369] Mr Blair said he thought the public needed to be educated on the nature of intelligence: "not clear facts, but patterns of information on which leaders had to make a judgement".

668. Mr Tenet used a speech at Georgetown University on 5 February to set out his position on Iraqi WMD and the October 2002 NIE.[370]

670. Mr Powell informed Mr Blair that the draft included "Good defence for Iraq".[372]

671. Mr Blair asked for the speech to be circulated to MPs.[373]

672. Mr Dowse, who had succeeded Mr Miller as Chief of the Assessments Staff in November 2003, passed "two major comments" to the US Embassy in London:

- The section of the draft speech on good news stories of intelligence work against Libya and AQ Khan[374] appeared to pre-empt plans for co-ordinated speeches by President Bush and Mr Blair which had been under discussion for some time.
- The UK was uncomfortable with the draft's presentation of the role played by intelligence from allies in the US assessment. The implication was that it had been the crucial factor: "Examples: 'Now, did this information make a difference in my thinking? You bet it did …'"[375]

673. In his speech, Mr Tenet explained that intelligence analysts' differences on several important aspects of Iraq's WMD programmes were spelt out in the NIE:

> "They never said there was an 'imminent' threat. Rather, they painted an objective assessment for our policy-makers of a brutal dictator who was continuing his efforts to deceive and build programs that might constantly surprise us and threaten our interests."

674. Mr Tenet compared the ISG's interim findings with the October 2002 NIE, emphasising that any comparison was provisional: the ISG's work was "nowhere near 85 percent finished". The ISG needed more time and more data.

675. The references to the impact of intelligence received from foreign partners, on which Mr Dowse had commented, remained unchanged. Mr Tenet stated:

> "Several sensitive reports crossed my desk from two sources characterized by our foreign partners as 'established and reliable'.

[375] Minute Dowse to Scarlett, 5 February 2004, 'Iraqi WMD: Tenet Speech'.

"Could I have ignored or dismissed such reports at the time? Absolutely not."

676. Mr Tenet concluded that, based on the data collected over the previous 10 years, it would have been difficult for analysts to reach conclusions other than those in the NIE. But the intelligence community needed to reflect on a number of questions, including:

- Did the history of Saddam Hussein's behaviour cause the intelligence community to overlook alternative scenarios?
- Did the failure to spot how close Saddam Hussein came to acquiring a nuclear weapon in the early 1990s lead to over-estimation of his programmes in 2002?
- Was the absence of information flowing from a repressive regime considered carefully?
- Were policy-makers told clearly what was and was not known?

The search for WMD, January to July 2004

677. On 9 February, Mr Duelfer informed Mr Blair that:

- the ISG would now focus its effort on people rather than sites;
- he was not yet prepared to conclude that there were no WMD in Iraq; and
- he envisaged an interim report in March.

678. Mr Blair remained concerned about the nature of the public debate on WMD.

679. Mr Duelfer called on Mr Blair in London on 9 February.[376] In answer to questions from Mr Blair, he said that:

- The ISG had much work to do and had the resources it needed to get to the bottom of the issue.
- The ISG would now focus on people rather than sites. There were also "vast mounds" of documents to examine.
- The ISG "must examine the strategic intentions of Saddam's regime. His [Mr Duelfer's] hypothesis was that the regime's strategy was to outlast the UN and sanctions. We could not make judgements until this was proven."
- He was not yet prepared to conclude that the weapons were not there.
- He envisaged an interim report in March, but the final report was "some time away".

680. Mr Rycroft's record of the meeting stated that Mr Blair was:

"… content with the timing of late March for the next ISG interim report … provided that it does not slip. Its handling will require military precision, since its content will fix the debate on WMD for the months ahead."

---

[376] Letter Rycroft to Baker, 9 February 2004, 'Iraq Survey Group: Meeting with Duelfer'.

681. Mr Duelfer described the meeting in his memoir:

> "Blair was very well informed on the WMD issue, and I had the opportunity to go into greater depth about my plans and tactics than I had with President Bush or Condoleezza Rice … I highlighted that I felt it was important to take this historic opportunity to record the reasons for Saddam's decisions on WMD and to understand where the regime was headed …
> "Prime Minister Blair asked questions about the sources of information and how I would arbitrate between the views of differing experts. He did not make strong suggestions, but carefully inquired where I was headed and asked about rough estimates on timing. I said I felt … that when sovereignty was returned to Iraq on 30 June, this would greatly affect ISG operations. I promised to keep the UK Government fully informed."[377]

682. During a wider discussion on Iraq on 9 February, Sir Nigel Sheinwald told Dr Rice about Mr Blair's meeting with Mr Duelfer.[378] Mr Blair remained concerned about the nature of the public debate, which Sir Nigel stated was "either there were stockpiles of WMD, or nothing at all. We needed to publicise the reality of the position. The next interim ISG report … would be very important." Dr Rice agreed the need to "keep repeating our position", and to work together on the next report.

683. Mr Dowse updated Sir Nigel Sheinwald on the survey of five sites where intelligence suggested WMD-related items had been hidden underwater.[379] It had been suggested during Mr Blair's video conference with President Bush on 2 February that the ISG was hopeful of finding objects hidden in the Tigris River. Mr Dowse reported that specialist divers had failed to find six rectangular metal objects located by sonar on 21 and 22 January and that the survey of a second site had not located anything suspicious.

684. Mr Scarlett discussed co-ordination between the UK and US with Mr McLaughlin and Mr Hadley in Washington on 9 February.[380] Mr Scarlett said that, from a London perspective, there was an urgent need to get more detailed factual information about the work of the ISG into the public domain. The next ISG report would need to be better presented and less indigestible than the last.

685. In a meeting the following day with Ms Jami Miscik, CIA Deputy Director of Intelligence, Mr Scarlett set out "the broad gameplan for getting some balance back into the public debate on WMD".[381] "The key was to get more facts into the public domain."

He stated that "[m]ore widely", a "succession of speeches, articles and media events" were needed "to highlight the wider proliferation problem".

686. Mr Scarlett commented on Mr Tenet's "spotlighting" in his speech:

> "… particular intelligence from a trusted intelligence partner (ie the UK). The media of course were watching like hawks for any signs of UK/US splits. Some had interpreted Tenet's comments as laying the ground to shift the blame for faulty intelligence to SIS."

687. Mr Scarlett also discussed the debate in Washington and its focus on whether intelligence had been politicised, and whether the assessments had been wrong. On the former, there were comments about the highly politicised environment and the extent to which "very persistent lines of questioning" from politicians might have led analysts "further towards particular judgements than they would have moved of their own accord".

688. Mr Wood, who accompanied Mr Scarlett to the meeting, commented afterwards that, in the wake of Mr Tenet's speech, there remained "ample potential for a serious public CIA/White House blame game between now and the [US presidential] election".

689. Mr Blair described his meeting with Mr Duelfer to President Bush during their video conference on 10 February.[382] Mr Blair said that, if there were an ISG interim report by the end of March, it would define the issue for some time. It therefore needed to be detailed, with factual backing, and carefully handled. Mr Duelfer had a clear idea of what was needed, including background on the Iraqi concealment effort, destruction of documentation, and the compartmentalisation of the WMD programmes.

690. SIS sent No.10 a copy of a senior officer's speaking note dated 10 February for an address to staff on the issue of why no WMD had been found in Iraq.[383]

691. Sir Nigel Sheinwald drew Mr Blair's attention to the note's conclusion that critics were unlikely to be proved wrong in the short term, but that the story of Iraq's WMD would come out in the end.[384]

692. Mr Blair commented on the paper:

> "But is Duelfer + ISG now working? That's what we must press. But this is a good paper."[385]

693. In a speech in Washington on 11 February, President Bush highlighted recent counter-proliferation successes, including the breaking of the AQ Khan nuclear proliferation network and Libya's agreement to end its nuclear and chemical weapons programmes, and announced a package of proposals to strengthen international counter-proliferation efforts.[386]

694. On 13 February, the British Embassy Washington reported that, although President Bush's "big pitch on proliferation" had had some success in broadening the political debate about WMD, a poll in The Washington Post suggested that a majority of Americans believed the President had intentionally exaggerated evidence that Iraq had WMD.[387]

695. The Embassy also reported that the Senate Intelligence Committee had decided to broaden its investigation, previously restricted to the performance of the intelligence community, to include whether policy-makers' statements were substantiated by intelligence.[388] The Embassy concluded that the way was probably now clear for the Committee to release a report at the end of March which criticised the intelligence community.

696. The Embassy also reported that:

- The CIA had released an internal speech by Ms Miscik to The Washington Post, which had reported on 12 February that "an internal review revealed several occasions when analysts mistakenly believed that Iraq weapons data had been confirmed by multiple sources when in fact it had come from a single source" and that Mr Tenet had "ordered an end to the long-standing practice of withholding from analysts details about the clandestine agents who provide the information".
- The New York Times on 13 February had quoted "senior intelligence officials" as saying that analysts had not been told that much of the information came from defectors linked to exile organisations that were promoting an American invasion.
- Newsweek had reported on 12 February that the CIA was "re-examining the credibility of four Iraq defectors" and had already "acknowledged that one of the defectors had been previously branded a fabricator by another US intelligence agency".

697. The Washington Post article was also reported by the UK media on 12 February, including by the BBC under the headline "Iraq 'prompts CIA method change'".[389]

698. Ms Miscik's speech was released publicly by the CIA in March 2004.[390]

699. On 17 February Mr Dowse sent SIS3 the draft of a speech on WMD to be made by Mr Blair at some time in the next six to eight weeks.[391] It was "very different from the version" they had been discussing. Mr Blair had reworked the text himself over the weekend and it focused "much more [on] the justification for the war in Iraq".

700. The No.10 briefing for Mr Blair's video conference with President Bush on 17 February stated that the President's speech on proliferation had not had the impact he seemed to have expected.[392] Mr Blair should inform President Bush that he was working on his own speech "to produce a philosophical rationale for our action on WMD (and terrorism)".

701. Mr Blair told President Bush on 17 February that he wanted his own speech to get across the linkages between WMD, rogue states and terrorism.[393] Recent investigations were uncovering further details of the AQ networks in the UK.[394] Mr Blair added that, in dealing with WMD, it was impossible for the political leadership to err on the side of caution.

Preparation of the ISG Status Report

702. Preparations for the ISG Status Report began in late February.

703. Mr Duelfer made it clear to the UK that he would not accept "joint drafting".

704. Mr Scarlett sent to Mr Duelfer "nuggets" from the September 2003 ISG Interim Report that he considered might be relevant to the next ISG report. He assured Mr Duelfer that these were not drafting proposals.

705. Mr Blair stated that Mr Duelfer must be in charge of production of the report, but that it must be handled better than the last.

706. Mr Duelfer set out his plans for the next ISG report during a video conference on 24 February.[395] The report, later known as the ISG Status Report, would be no more than 25-30 pages, avoid conclusions or assessments, identify the issues remaining to be addressed and highlight the intentions of the regime. There would be no detailed annexes. Any annexes that had been prepared in his absence would be included in the final report.

707. Mr Howard explained the wish at the highest political level in the UK for the report to include as much detail as possible. He offered to host a seminar in London bringing together experts from the ISG, London and Washington. Mr Duelfer was not averse to including detail as long as there were no piecemeal conclusions, and was fully committed to consulting capitals on the interim and final reports. He was not attracted to the idea of a seminar.

708. Mr Scarlett advised Sir Nigel Sheinwald that getting "the right balance of detail" into the next ISG report might not be as simple as the record of the video conference suggested. He was pressing for immediate sight of the latest draft.[396]

709. Mr Scarlett reported separately that, during a video conference on 2 March, Mr Duelfer had explained that he did not intend to share the draft of the next interim report with capitals in advance, but was willing to discuss detail.[397] He had emphasised the importance of the report being seen to be the independent work of the ISG. Mr Scarlett and Mr Howard had stressed the importance of capturing some of the detail from the September 2003 Interim Report, which underpinned public statements. They had been invited to submit areas of the 2003 Interim Report they would like to see reflected.

710. The Op ROCKINGHAM weekly update for 27 February to 4 March reported that the ISG's pace of operations could not be sustained in March.[398] Limiting factors included a reduction in the number of already scarce interpreters and a requirement to train US units arriving on troop rotation.

711. In early March, Mr Blair requested weekly updates on the ISG.[399]

712. During a video conference on 2 March, Mr Scarlett stressed to Mr Duelfer the need for his forthcoming report to capture some of the detail from the September 2003 ISG Interim Report.[400] Mr Duelfer invited Mr Scarlett to submit "nuggets" which the UK believed were "relevant" to the forthcoming report.

713. On 4 March, Mr Scarlett told Sir Nigel Sheinwald that discussions with Mr Duelfer would need careful handling. Mr Duelfer had made it clear that he owned the report and would not accept "joint drafting". Mr Scarlett advised that, whatever assurances were received from the US, the UK would have to work hard to avoid "surprises".

> "It is going to be difficult to get the sort of interim ISG report we want … I've asked the FCO + SIS to press on their channels. I'll talk to Condi [Rice], and you should raise again with the President next week."[401]

715. On 8 March, Mr Scarlett sent Mr Duelfer "nuggets" from the September ISG Interim Report for inclusion in the forthcoming report.[402] Mr Scarlett explained:

> "Without knowing the details of your current draft it is difficult to judge where these 'nuggets' would fit in. But I am confident their inclusion will:
> - establish the context for the latest developments which your functional teams are preparing for inclusion in your new report;
> - help to set out clearly where the ISG have established Iraqi breaches of UNSCRs;
> - explain the current state of the ISG's key, most important lines of enquiry.
> "They do not require you or your report to come to conclusions about these lines of enquiry. You explained your approach on this point when you were in London last month and, as you know, it is one with which we agree."

716. The material proposed for inclusion by Mr Scarlett included:

- BW. Quotes from Iraqi scientists to the effect that Iraq was still actively pursuing ricin for weaponisation and that as of March 2003 it was being developed into stable liquid to deliver as aerosol in small rockets, cluster bombs and smoke generators.
- CW. The Iraqi declaration in December 2002 that it had imported 11,500 tonnes of white phosphorous, a potential precursor for nerve and blister agents.
- Nuclear. Remarks attributed to Mr Tariq Aziz (Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister from 1979 to 2003) and Mr al-Huwaish on the strategic intentions of the Iraqi regime.
- Missile. Material that had already been used by the BBC on the designs for long-range missiles using SA-2/Volga engines.
- Sanitisation and destruction. Further material on the deliberate sanitisation and destruction witnessed by the ISG to help reinforce the message on the difficult operational environment.

717. Mr Scarlett concluded:

> "The above is designed to point you to particular areas in the classified September [Interim] Report which appear to be of relevance to your work now. They are not intended as drafting proposals. I am also aware that the precise drafting of items which comprise potential intelligence must take account of the need not to undermine lines of continuing operational investigation."

718. Mr Scarlett sent a copy to Mr Rycroft, explaining that it:

"… does no more than draw his [Mr Duelfer's] attention to items already written up by Kay in classified form, in September. But I have made it clear I was not trying to do his drafting for him."[403]

719. In his memoir, Mr Duelfer described the relationship with Mr Scarlett:

"I met … John Scarlett … and stayed in touch with him and his office throughout the process … He wanted to be certain that the ISG had access to the same data that the United Kingdom had …

"I valued the direct involvement of Scarlett. Some questioned his suggestions for ISG. I found it helpful to hear and evaluate his ideas."[404]

720. Mr Duelfer also wrote:

"Scarlett and I had spoken in person in London and I had requested that he bring to my attention any aspects that I might have overlooked. The particular points he recalled from the earlier Kay Report had been further investigated since their publication and found to be without consequence. The nuggets were fool's gold, but I was reassured to have examined them."

721. Mr Blair raised the ISG during a video conference with President Bush on 9 March.[405]

722. Mr Blair said that Mr Duelfer must remain in charge of production of the next report, but it was vital that it was handled better than the last. There was a better story to be told. Much material in October's secret Interim Report could be drawn on publicly next time, such as transcripts of interviews with scientists. By including detailed material, the next report should lead people to the conclusion that "something" was going on in Iraq in breach of UN resolutions, even if the material did not lead to concrete evidence of actual weapons. The next step, probably in a further report, would be to set out exactly what had been happening.

723. Mr Rycroft described the conversation as "A good exchange."

724. On 11 March, Sir Nigel Sheinwald sent Mr Blair a note from Mr Scarlett on the progress of his discussions with Mr Duelfer.[406] Sir Nigel informed Mr Blair that Mr Scarlett's "nuggets" would be included in Mr Duelfer's report, although the timing would be "tight, + difficult".

725. Mr Blair asked: "But can they also include the transcripts of interviews which I found v[ery] persuasive in the Oct 2003 background draft?"[407]

726. In a note to No.10 officials on 15 March, Mr Blair wrote:

> "As for the ISG, the problem is that they don't seem to understand that, at present, opinion thinks there is either a WMD finding or nothing. Actually there is a mystery as to what happened to the physical evidence but it was plain much was going on in breach of UN resolutions. It is the latter point that the further interim report could deal with, eg by disclosing transcripts of interviews with Iraqi scientists and officials as per the background paper in October. We need to work intensively on this with the US this week."[408]

727. Mr Blair's initial view of the draft ISG Status Report was that it was better than expected.

728. Mr Blair was clear that the principal messages – that Saddam Hussein had been in breach of Security Council resolutions and that his behaviour had raised "immense suspicions" – must stand out.

729. The first copy of the draft ISG Status Report was received in London on 15 March.[409] Mr Scarlett described it as:

- short
- a summary of developments since the September [Interim] Report
- focused on strategic intentions of the regime
- careful to avoid conclusions".

730. Mr Scarlett drew attention to material in the section on new developments:

- Nuclear – "Some useful new detail here which strengthens the previous comment."
- BW – "This is weaker and lacking detail. Almost all the points from Kay's report, which we proposed for inclusion are not here. Although the draft avoids 'conclusions', some negative assessment points in that direction, especially on the mobile labs."
- CW – "Again, this lacks detail including the 'nuggets' proposed by us …"
- Missiles – "As before, some useful detail but there could be significantly more, again including our proposals from the previous report."

731. Mr Scarlett wrote that Mr Duelfer had included only a few of the UK's suggestions and seemed to be trying to avoid going into detail, especially if it came from Dr Kay's Interim Report. There were "numerous instances" where Mr Duelfer could have brought out breaches of resolutions, but did not.

732. Mr Scarlett concluded:

> "Overall, this is a carefully written, 'strategic' document designed to restore or to reinforce the credibility of the ISG and to lay the groundwork for future conclusions in a final report …"

733. Addressing tactics, Mr Scarlett added:

> "We will concentrate on repeating our previous proposals for inclusion of further detail … We will also point up the many opportunities for emphasising breaches of UNSCRs …"

734. Mr Scarlett reported that his US interlocutors were:

> "… very clear that 'comments' must come from the intelligence community and not the policy makers … Duelfer is already feeling sensitive to 'pressure' from London …"

735. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the impact of the next ISG interim report on 16 March.[410] Mr Blair said that the first draft was better than expected. Although it contained nothing completely new, it showed that Iraq had been in clear breach of UN resolutions. It was important to keep some of the "colour" in the report, but even as it stood it was quite powerful: "it helped attack the argument that the Coalition should find physical evidence or the war was unjustified".

736. Mr Blair chaired a meeting to discuss the ISG on 17 March, attended by Mr Scarlett, Mr Howard, Mr Dowse, a senior SIS official and officials from No.10.[411]

737. In response to Mr Scarlett's advice on the timetable for the next interim report, Mr Blair commented:

> "There could be no question of our seeking to influence the material in the report. Mr Duelfer must set out the facts as he saw them.
> "But (a) an interim report was necessary (b) the material should be set out clearly (c) presentation of the report was important."

[411] Minute Cannon to Scarlett, 18 March 2004, 'Iraq Survey Group'.

738. Mr Blair's initial view of the draft was that it was:

> "… better than expected. The whereabouts of the physical evidence remained unresolved. But an unbiased reader could only conclude that Saddam had been in breach of SCRs and that he was involved in highly suspicious activities."

739. In discussion of the detailed text, the following points were identified:

- Mr Blair thought the section on procurement needed more detail and clarity.
- Mr Scarlett thought the points on Iraq's nuclear activities were "too firm". The report "needed to point out the possible non-nuclear dual use potential for some of this equipment".
- Mr Blair "wanted background explanations on 'dual use goods': the regime had gone to elaborate lengths to obtain material allegedly for fertiliser or insecticide production and the suspicious nature of this should be picked up".
- The report should make clear that "deception and concealment operations continued right up to the outbreak of the conflict" and ask "why such elaborate deception was needed if there was nothing to hide".
- The need to "underline that Blix had been systematically hindered", including over interviews with scientists.
- "Quotations from interviewees would add verisimilitude to the report."
- "We should underline the deliberate destruction of evidence and sanitisation of sites eg repairing of buildings during the conflict."
- There should be more material on Korean missile technology.

740. Mr Scarlett said that the interim report would "flag up problems over eg the alleged BW mobile laboratories and the unexpected absence of battlefield CW".

741. Mr Blair concluded that Mr Duelfer "needed to be clear about the 'top line' of his report". Based on the draft, that was that Saddam Hussein:

> "(a) had been in clear breach of SCRs and (b) his behaviour raised immense suspicions, even if we had yet to pin down the exact nature of his machinations … [T]here could be no question of influencing the material that appeared in the report. But it was important that, as a document, it held together as a logical, coherent and well-documented whole."

742. Mr Scarlett discussed the ISG report in a video conference with Mr Duelfer, Maj Gen Dayton and the CIA on 18 March.[412]

743. Mr Scarlett told Sir Nigel Sheinwald that Mr Duelfer felt the report would need to be "heavily sanitised" to avoid public exposure of operational details of lines of enquiry being pursued by the ISG. Two options were under consideration: sanitising the draft for public release, or producing a three- to five-page executive summary.

744. Mr Rycroft commented to Mr Blair that Mr Duelfer's suggested approach was "worrying", and that Mr Scarlett and Sir Nigel Sheinwald would be pursuing the issue with the US.[413]

745. On 22 March, Mr Scarlett told Sir Nigel Sheinwald that the ISG had reported the previous day that Mr Duelfer had decided that the sanitised version of the full report would need to remove all the paragraphs on the direction of future investigation, as well as the items that were policy and source sensitive.[414] As a result, he had directed that work should focus on a short summary, which was "broadbrush" and gave "little supporting detail".

746. Mr Scarlett added that the points which stood out were:

- "a focus on the use of illicit funds for procurement" although there was "a big gap between the funds raised (several billion dollars) and those allocated to the Military and Intelligence Commission ($500m)";
- "no CBW weapons found nor any agent production facilities";
- "unresolved questions over research into CBW agents and planned chemical agent production, but little detail given";
- "items on the high speed rail gun and explosive test facilities which have possible nuclear weapons implications";
- "little new information in the section on delivery systems".

747. Mr Scarlett "wondered" whether the change in Mr Duelfer's position reflected "advice from Washington", but he had "no evidence", and it might well have been "generated within the ISG on operational grounds".

748. Mr Scarlett wrote that he had "made it clear" to Mr Duelfer and to the CIA in Washington "that the clear preference for policy makers in London is for publication of a sanitised version of the full report".

749. On instruction from Mr Blair, Sir Nigel Sheinwald raised UK concerns about the drafting of the report with Dr Rice on 22 March.[415] Sir Nigel told Dr Rice that:

> "Duelfer now seemed to have decided against publishing any of the report itself, and had circulated a five page summary in the form of his intended Congressional testimony. This was in fact similar to the technique used last October by David Kay, which had not worked at the time. But Kay's unclassified summary was a good deal more detailed than Duelfer's draft. We seemed to be going backwards."

750. Sir Nigel explained that the UK was "not asking for the report to be over-egged. We should be honest and say that there were no clear answers on what had happened." But it was important that Mr Duelfer should be able to conclude that, at the very least, Iraq was in breach of UN resolutions.

751. Sir Nigel commented:

> "The problem is that the draft is getting worse, not better from our point of view; and it will be difficult to secure a substantial change of direction at this stage. But we will try. John Scarlett is in touch separately with the CIA."

752. Mr Scarlett discussed the ISG draft report at a video conference on 23 March with Mr McLaughlin, Ms Miscik, Mr Duelfer, Maj Gen Dayton, Mr Howard and an Australian representative.[416] Mr Duelfer was working on three documents: the classified report; an unclassified summary; and his personal statement to the Congressional Committees. The UK had seen the first two and was expecting the third shortly. Mr Duelfer emphasised that his personal statement would make clear that Iraq had been in breach of UN resolutions.

753. Mr Duelfer also reported that three senior analysts had left the ISG, unhappy with what they expected the report to cover. They had felt that Mr Duelfer's reluctance to draw conclusions reflected political interference rather than his stated position that he needed to familiarise himself with his new responsibilities first. There were concerns that the three might make their views public.

754. Sir Nigel Sheinwald discussed the draft report with Dr Rice later on 23 March.[417] He said that the "key" was "a clear message that, whatever construction was to be placed on what the ISG had found or not found, UNSCRs had been breached and suspicious activity was continuing under Saddam".

755. Sir Nigel commented that the discussion had been more encouraging than might have been expected. It could still prove difficult to persuade Mr Duelfer "to change tack completely", but Sir Nigel's contacts with Dr Rice and Mr Scarlett's with the CIA seemed to have "shaken up" the CIA to some extent. There should now be an opportunity to strengthen the text to some degree.

756. Mr Duelfer visited London on 26 March to discuss the ISG Status Report.[418] He met Mr Howard's WMD Task Force and Mr Scarlett and Sir Nigel Sheinwald.

757. Mr Scarlett reported that the position had moved on significantly. Two documents had been prepared:

- the full, classified Status Report, addressed to Mr Tenet and to be copied to Congress; and
- Mr Duelfer's testimony to the Congressional Committee hearings on 30 and 31 March.

758. Mr Scarlett wrote that the testimony replaced an earlier unclassified summary of the Status Report. It was a "more forceful" document and would need only light adjustment for public release.

759. Mr Scarlett also reported that Mr Duelfer intended to draft a final report over the summer and was looking to "surge" additional staff. Mr Howard was considering how the UK might help.

760. Mr Blair, who was shown Mr Scarlett's report by Sir Nigel Sheinwald, commented in the margin that the additional staff were "obviously vital".[419]

761. Sir Nigel Sheinwald advised Mr Blair that the text of Mr Duelfer's testimony was an improvement on earlier texts, but the media was "still likely to judge it thin" and the points Mr Duelfer intended to emphasise were "very process-oriented".[420]

762. Sir Nigel wrote:

> "… our pressure should now shift from the substance of the report (where we have made little headway) to the handling. If you agree I suggest the following steps on Monday [29 March]:
> - We need to ensure that the CIA take as little as possible out for the sanitised version. We need all the detail we can secure.
> - Duelfer should prepare a short summary … This must include a clear statement of breach of SCRs … The summary needs to bring out new and suspicious evidence.The Assessments Staff should pass a draft to the Americans.
> - … [H]e needs to prepare a clear brief statement for the broadcast media …
> - We need supporting media appearances in both the US and UK, in parallel. The Foreign Secretary is being lined up here. We need to ensure that the Americans have made a similar plan – last time it was all last minute.
> - This will require action on several fronts: Hill/Bartlett, Scarlett/CIA, me/Condi, possibly Jack [Straw]/Powell. It will be too late by the time you speak to the President on Tuesday [30 March].

"Do you agree that these are the main things we should be focusing on?"

763. Mr Blair replied: "Yes but if the report is weak it will be v[ery] hard to succeed."[421]

764. No.10 sent a separate record of the meeting between Mr Duelfer and Sir Nigel Sheinwald and Mr Scarlett to Mr Straw's Private Office.[422] The record stated:

- Duelfer said that he hoped to put together a 'compelling case' that the Saddam regime had put in place a system to 'sustain the intellectual capital' for a WMD programme, with a 'break-out capacity' once a decision to reinstate the programme was taken.
- Duelfer said that, while he was slightly more optimistic than when he took up the job that actual WMD might be found, the odds were still that they would not be located. He was looking into the possibility that some had been smuggled into Syria.
- He had not realised the extent of the fears of potential interviewees, either of prosecution by the Americans or of assassination by former colleagues.
- If stocks of WMD did not exist, then they would have been destroyed long before the Iraq campaign.
- The core group around Saddam had been remarkably successful in eroding sanctions up to 9/11, including by manipulating some members of the Security Council. He believed that the ISG would be able to demonstrate that the regime had been thwarting UN sanctions and making plans to resuscitate its WMD programmes … It was clear that the regime's ultimate goal had been to obtain nuclear weapons. There had been a policy of continuing WMD development under the cover of 'dual use' programmes.
- Duelfer said that Washington might have misled us about his touchiness about UK advice: in fact he welcomed advice although he could not guarantee he would take it. He would take into account advice on public perceptions in the UK.
- The interim report would be a status report, with no new revelations, and a forward look … Duelfer would certainly not be pulling back on Kay's fundamental contention that Saddam had been in clear breach of resolution 1441."

765. Mr Blair commented that Mr Duelfer "still needs to list any UN breaches with supporting evidence".[423]

766. The meeting of the JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD on 29 March, chaired by Mr Scarlett, discussed plans for responding to Mr Duelfer's testimony, including a draft summary of key points which had been sent to Mr Duelfer.[424]

767. The key points included:

- "Iraq was remarkably successful in eroding UN sanctions. Containment strategy was being systematically undermined by several countries including key members of the UNSC."
- "Iraq derived billions of dollars between 1999 and 2003 from oil smuggling, kickbacks and abuse of the Oil-for-Food [OFF] programme. This was outside the control of the UN and free for the regime to spend without restriction."
- "ISG has information regarding dual-use facilities and ongoing research suitable for a capability to produce CBW at short notice."
- "ISG has also found evidence to indicate Iraqi interest in preserving and expanding the knowledge needed to design and develop nuclear weapons."
- "In addition … the ISG has continued to uncover very robust programmes for delivery systems."
- "The ISG is focusing on the broader picture of regime intent and how the technical developments fit into this picture in an integrated manner."

The ISG Status Report, 30 March 2004

768. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the impact of the ISG Status Report on 30 March.[425] Mr Blair said that the draft he had seen was quite good and certainly better than it might have been. Expectations in the UK were low. The more detail that could be declassified and put into the text the better. Mr Duelfer's methodology was better than Dr Kay's, which had not been rigorous.

769. Mr Duelfer delivered his testimony to Congress later on 30 March, explaining:

> "This Report is very limited in scope. It is intended to provide a status report of my efforts at steering the ISG. It is not a preliminary assessment of findings."[426]

770. The Status Report incorporated many of the key points sent to Mr Duelfer by the UK:

- Challenges. Iraqi managers, scientists and engineers were extremely reluctant to speak freely and documents were not easy to interpret. The ISG still did not fully understand regime intentions.

[426] Central Intelligence Agency, 30 March 2004, Testimony by Charles Duelfer on Iraqi WMD Programs.

- Procurement. Iraq derived billions of dollars between 1999 and 2003 from oil smuggling, kickbacks and abuse of OFF, money which was outside the control of the UN. Iraq imported banned military weapons and technology and dual-use goods through OFF contracts.
- Denial and deception. The ISG had uncovered more details about Iraq's efforts to deceive UNSCOM and then UNMOVIC right up to the invasion in March 2003.
- Biological and chemical weapons. The ISG had new information on Iraq's dual-use facilities and research into short-notice production of CBW. "Iraq did have facilities suitable for the production of biological and chemical agents needed for weapons. It had plans to improve and extend and even build new facilities."
- Nuclear weapons. ISG analysis suggested "Iraqi interest in preserving and expanding the knowledge needed to design and develop nuclear weapons".
- Delivery systems. The ISG had continued to uncover "a very robust program for delivery systems that were not reported to the UN. New information has been discovered relating to long range ballistic missile development and Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs)."
- Regime intent. Mr Duelfer had instilled a new focus on the question of regime intent. It was "critically important to understand the intentions of the regime" when putting other activities into context.

771. Mr Blair commented on the absence of media coverage of Mr Duelfer's testimony:

> "Amazing it got no publicity. Sh[oul]dn't we now publicise it? What is our Iraq SCU [Strategic Communications Unit] doing?"[427]

772. Sir Nigel Sheinwald advised that the Government "sh[oul]d not try to publicise this Report now". He asked Mr David Quarrey, a Private Secretary in No.10, to discuss the issue with Mr Scarlett, the MOD and the FCO before putting advice to Mr Blair.[428]

773. On 8 April, Mr Quarrey advised Mr Blair:

> "The Report received little coverage, although it did usefully get some information into the public domain. But things have moved on now. In current circumstances (ie the security situation) it would be extremely difficult to get further coverage in anything other than negative terms."[429]

774. Also on 8 April, Mr Wood reported from Washington that there were likely to be three UK angles to the Report of the Senate Intelligence Committee into pre-conflict intelligence on Iraq:

- the reference to yellowcake in President Bush's State of the Union speech in 2003, on which the Committee was likely to be more critical of the US than the UK;
- the "45 minute claim" on which the Report would conclude that there was a basis in intelligence for the public claim; and
- […].[430]

The transfer of power to the Iraqi Interim Government

775. On 29 March, a senior SIS officer sought guidance from Mr Ehrman on the responsibilities of the future Government of Iraq for counter-proliferation and "the legacy of CBRN related capabilities".[431] The Coalition had had a difficult year. Questions to consider included:

- where responsibility for those issues would lie in the CPA and its successors;
- how policy-makers saw the UK helping Iraq solve the "CBRN riddles remaining from the past"; and
- the point at which international organisations would be brought in to help Iraq and the amount of preparatory work that would be necessary with the US.

776. Mr David Landsman, Mr Dowse's successor as the Head of FCO Counter-Proliferation Department, co-ordinated Whitehall discussion.[432] On 31 March, he sought views on:

- how long the ISG would be needed;
- the legal basis for ISG operations after the transfer of sovereignty;
- how the UK would engage with Iraq on other counter-proliferation activities;
- what sort of co-operation programmes and assistance should be established; and
- when to bring in international agencies.

777. A DIS official replied on 3 April.[433] He reported that US thinking on the future of the ISG was fluid. The ISG's work had not been included in Iraq's Transitional Administrative Law (TAL) (see Section 9.2) and it was not yet possible to advise on the legal basis for the ISG's work in Iraq after the transfer of sovereignty. The WMD Task Force had told Mr Duelfer that it hoped it would be possible to produce a final report within the next few months but, in practice, the UK would have to continue to support the ISG until Mr Duelfer was ready to produce his report.

778. The Op ROCKINGHAM weekly update for 2 to 7 April stated that deteriorating security in Baghdad and Basra was affecting ISG operational planning.[434] A shortage of vehicles with armoured protection was complicating efforts to complete outstanding collection activities before the end of June.

779. On 13 May, Mr Howard wrote to Mr Scarlett about the future of the ISG.[435] He advised that the ISG still had much work to complete, including collection activities at suspect sites, interviews of HVDs, and analysis of millions of documents. Its ability to continue those tasks after 30 June was uncertain and future command and control arrangements were in a state of "flux".

780. Mr Howard reported that Mr Duelfer expected to "produce a detailed report" in the late summer/early autumn. While that would "not necessarily draw the line underneath the question of WMD in Iraq" it was "likely to make provisional conclusions". That would "almost certainly signify in the public mind the 'final word' from the ISG on Iraq WMD".

781. After the transfer of sovereignty on 30 June, the ISG would focus increasingly on analysis of Iraq's intentions and future WMD programmes, and decision-making in Saddam Hussein's regime. The report was "unlikely to focus on whether Iraq has disarmed, which was of course UNMOVIC's focus".

782. Mr Howard also wrote that:

- The ISG was "likely to survive" to deal with other tasks after the release of its "final report" on WMD.
- The UK had "benefited considerably" from having the ISG Deputy Commander post.
- Deteriorating security in Iraq had impeded the ISG's effectiveness. The UK continued to fulfil its duty of care to staff and would monitor closely the post-transfer of sovereignty security situation.

783. At No.10's request, Mr Dowse prepared an update on the ISG on 21 May.[436]

784. Mr Dowse covered much the same ground as Mr Howard. He wrote:

- ISG planning since March had been hampered significantly by poor security throughout Iraq, high staff turnover, difficulty in filling posts and some equipment shortages.
- A major part of current ISG activity was "combating the efforts of insurgent networks to develop and use chemical weapons against Coalition forces".

[435] Letter Howard to Scarlett, 13 May 2004, 'Iraq: Future of the Iraq Survey Group (ISG)'.
[436] Minute Dowse to Quarrey, 21 May 2004, 'Iraq Survey Group'.

The ISG believed insurgent groups were "looking to draw on the knowledge and experience of people previously engaged with Iraq's CW programme", although the scale of that effort was "unclear". The use of mustard and sarin artillery shells in two recent improvised explosive devices was "not a reliable indicator". Those using the weapons were "probably unaware of their nature". The rounds were in "a very poor condition and almost certainly part of Iraq's pre-1991 stockpile".

- Two consistent themes were emerging from the debriefing of HVDs:
  - "CW was used in the Iran-Iraq war, but remaining stocks had been destroyed in 1991, without records"; and
  - after 1991 Saddam Hussein was "determined to maintain scientific expertise for post-sanctions reconstruction of WMD programmes".
- The US had stated that the ISG mission would not change after 30 June, the end of the CPA, but Maj Gen Dayton would be replaced by a one-star US Marine Corps officer.
- The next report would be the ISG's last. Mr Duelfer's aim was to have a draft ready by the end of June, to be worked on during July and released in August. It was likely to focus on:
  - "Iraqi contravention of sanctions in the procurement of goods that could be used to support WMD programmes";
  - diversion of OFF funds; and
  - a broader picture of the regime's "strategic intent" towards WMD.

785. In his note to No.10 officials on 23 May, Mr Blair wrote in relation to the ISG that it:

> "… seems to be doing nothing. Surely it is absurd that they will say nothing is found, though there was strategic intent; when, in reality, they have been unable to look. They need to leave actual WMD an open issue. Also can I have an assessment of the conventional stockpiles in Iraq at the end of the war."[437]

786. In response to the update from Mr Dowse, Mr Blair commented:

> "… the ISG should not just conclude that there was strategic intent but no WMD were found, when it is clear that they have been unable to look. They need to leave WMD as an open issue."[438]

787. No.10 asked the "JIC/MOD" for advice on how to get the result Mr Blair wanted.

788. In his discussion with President Bush on 26 May (see Section 9.2), Mr Blair stated that the ISG should not be forgotten and that proper reporting on what it was up to was needed.[439]

789. Mr Duelfer called on Mr Scarlett and Mr Tony Pawson, Mr Howard's successor as DCDI, on 28 May.[440] Mr Scarlett reported the main points from both discussions to Sir Nigel Sheinwald:

- ISG work. Interviews with HVDs, including Saddam Hussein, remained a priority but were yielding little specific information. The ISG was still trying to establish whether there were specific Iraqi policies to maintain or develop industrial capacity with an embedded or inherent WMD production capability. High priority was being given to work on terrorists' and insurgents' capacity to obtain or produce WMD for immediate use.
- ISG status. Mr Tenet had assured Mr Duelfer that the ISG's status would not change while Mr Duelfer remained in charge. For legal purposes, after 30 June the ISG would have to fall under the remit of the Multi-National Force – Iraq (MNF-I). Day-to-day operational command should remain with CENTCOM.
- ISG report. Mr Duelfer envisaged that a first draft would be ready by June but a final text would "not be ready until August". This would be a "comprehensive" report, but not a "final" one. It would have much to say on regime intent and would make clear many questions remained open. Mr Duelfer would not commit to specific dates for publication or his departure from the ISG.
- Management. Mr Duelfer was anxious to work with the UK. He was open to comments and views on content and presentation, but was clear that the report would be his own. Mr Pawson and Mr Dowse would stay in close touch with Mr Duelfer and Washington.
- Release of HVDs. There was concern that, with the release of most HVDs before 30 June, some might go to the press to allege mistreatment and press the case that WMD had never existed. There was a danger that could undermine the authority of the ISG report.

790. In his memoir, Mr Duelfer explained that support for the ISG was at its highest during June 2004, in the weeks leading up to the transfer of sovereignty:

> "ISG analysts developed new targeting packages … Planning for a final pulse of raids was accelerated … All the agencies in Washington and the military in the field understood the importance of getting to the bottom of the WMD question."[441]

791. Maj Gen Dayton handed over command of the ISG to Brigadier General Joseph McMenamin on 12 June.[442]

792. Before his departure, Maj Gen Dayton discussed the future of the ISG with Mr Pawson. Mr Pawson reported to Mr Scarlett that, while some reconfiguring of the ISG was inevitable with the release of HVDs, there was no reason to think that a separation of its component parts was imminent.

Mr Tenet's resignation

Mr Tenet announced his resignation as Director of Central Intelligence (DCI) on 3 June.[443] Mr McLaughlin was appointed Acting Director.

Mr Tenet stepped down formally on 11 July.[444]

In his memoir, Mr Duelfer wrote:

> "McLaughlin recognized my position and stepped in to make sure I was not left dangling. He would provide, as he had been all along, direct personal attention to the ISG on an almost daily basis".[445]

793. On 6 June, the Security Council adopted resolution 1546 (2004) (see Section 9.2). The resolution welcomed the beginning of a new phase in Iraq's transition to a democratically elected government, and looked forward to the end of the Occupation by 30 June 2004.[446]

794. In operative paragraph (OP) 21, the Security Council decided that the prohibition on the sale and supply of arms to Iraq would "not apply to arms or related material required by the Government of Iraq or the multinational force to serve the purposes of this resolution".

795. In OP22, the Council noted that OP21 did not affect material prohibited by or the obligations in paragraphs 8 and 12 of resolution 687 (1991) and paragraph 3(f) of resolution 707 (1991). It also reaffirmed "its intention to revisit the mandates" of UNMOVIC and the IAEA.

796. A letter from Secretary Powell to the President of the Security Council was annexed to the resolution. Secretary Powell confirmed that:

> "… the MNF stands ready to continue to undertake a broad range of tasks to contribute to the maintenance of security and to ensure force protection. These include … the continued search for and securing of weapons that threaten Iraq's security."

797. On 24 June, Mr Douglas Feith, US Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, informed Mr Simon Webb, MOD Policy Director, of the post-30 June arrangements for the ISG.[447] Resolution 1546 envisaged that the MNF-I would have the task of searching for and securing weapons that threatened Iraq's security. The ISG would therefore move from CENTCOM to MNF-I command.

798. Mr Webb said that the UK would continue to support the ISG, though resources were strained. The problem would get worse in the autumn, when reductions of scale might be desirable.

799. Mr Webb also told Mr Feith that Mr Duelfer's report would be "a significant political event in the UK", in which Mr Blair took a personal interest. The UK looked forward to seeing a draft in advance.

800. Control of the ISG transferred from CENTCOM to the MNF-I after the transfer of sovereignty on 28 June.[448]

801. At the end of June, the ISG comprised 1,787 personnel: 1,722 from the US, 54 from the UK and 11 from Australia.[449]

802. On 1 July, Mr Straw was advised that the only grounds for internment after 30 June should be "imperative reasons of security or criminal activity".[450] FCO legal advice made clear that internment for intelligence exploitation alone was not sufficient. The British Embassy Washington had already been instructed to raise with the US UK concerns about the basis for continued US internments that did not fall into the two categories recognised by the UK.

803. The FCO stated that restrictions on the activities of UK personnel in the ISG were unlikely to affect its overall operational capability, but were likely to be unwelcome to the US military at a time when US and UK resources were under considerable pressure. There was a risk that, during a critical time for the preparation of the next ISG report, the UK might be fully involved only in the ISG's assessment work and missions compatible with UK policy.

804. The FCO also reported that Dr Ayad Allawi, the Iraqi Prime Minister, had expressed strong support for the ISG which he hoped would remain active for the next six months or so. There had not, however, been detailed discussions between the ISG and the Iraqi Interim Government (IIG) about how the ISG would operate. Prime Minister Allawi was reported to be "convinced that WMD will be found".

805. Mr Ehrman advised Mr Straw's Private Office:

> "We pressed the US to address the future of ISG operations when SCR 1546 was being negotiated. They did not want to do so. Eventually they agreed to the phrase in [Secretary] Powell's letter ['the continued search for and securing of weapons that threaten Iraq's security'] … The UK contingent makes up only 3% of the ISG's strength. Its activities will now need to be circumscribed … This will be unwelcome to the US but that is the consequence of the arrangements put in place by 1546."[451]

806. The Op ROCKINGHAM weekly update of 1 July reported that:

- The UK element of the ISG had withdrawn from all debriefing activity while discussions continued on the legal basis for future ISG operations.
- Prime Minister Allawi had nominated Dr Mowaffak al-Rubaie, his National Security Adviser, as the IIG point of contact for the ISG.[452]

The Butler and Senate Intelligence Committee Reports, July 2004

807. In a Note for President Bush on 16 June, Mr Blair stated that the truth on Iraq's WMD was probably that Saddam Hussein:

> " … was developing long range ballistic missile capability in breach of UN resolutions; he probably had no or no large stockpiles of tactical CW or BW weapons; but he retained the capability and expertise to recommence production as soon as he could, again in breach of UN resolutions."

808. Mr Blair's "hunch" was that the Butler Review would reach similar conclusions. Both Lord Butler and the Senate Intelligence Committee were "bound to be critical … in certain respects".

809. On 16 June, Sir Nigel Sheinwald sent Dr Rice a Note written by Mr Blair for President Bush about the need for a strategic plan for Iraq (see Section 9.2).[453]

810. In relation to the need "to deal with any WMD/intelligence issues", Mr Blair wrote that he remained "deeply concerned" about WMD:

> "The public need an explanation and there will linger a real trust/truth issue …
> "At present the public debate lurches between the two extremes: pro-war people insist the intelligence was right, but the plain fact is no WMD has been found; anti-war people claim it was all a fraud, as if Saddam never really had any WMD, which is plainly fatuous … [T]he ISG thinking, and probably the truth, is somewhere in between. He was developing long range ballistic missile capability in breach of UN resolutions; he probably had no or no large stockpiles of tactical CW or BW weapons; but he retained the capability and expertise to recommence production as soon as he could, again in breach of UN resolutions. And, of course, with the missile capability, he could fit any warhead he wanted at the appropriate time.

So he had strategic intent and capability on WMD; and an active programme on ballistic missiles.

"Such an explanation would mean that some of the intelligence upon which we acted was wrong; but that nonetheless the threat was there, as was the breach of UN resolutions. It would also explain why the picture was so confused and why, whilst the exact basis of action was not as we thought, the action was still justified."

811. Mr Blair's "hunch" was that the Butler Review would reach similar conclusions. Both Lord Butler and the Senate Intelligence Committee were "bound to be critical … in certain respects". But the US and UK had "to avoid the absurd notion that therefore there was no threat at all, as if 12 years of history and UN resolutions never existed".

812. Mr Blair suggested that, if Mr Duelfer were thinking along those lines, it made sense urgently to investigate the possibility of publishing the ISG report at the same time as the Senate and Butler Reports. That would "provide the clear evidential basis for saying there was indeed a threat, even if it was not the threat that had been anticipated".

813. Mr Blair added:

"It may be impossible but if at all possible we should have this issue dealt with and lanced all at the same time."

814. During a video conference with President Bush on 22 June, Mr Blair said that Mr Duelfer seemed to be planning to publish in August. That was up to him, but with other WMD reports due to be published earlier, it might make sense to bring the date forward.[454]

815. Reporting on a meeting in London on 2 July, Mr Landsman wrote that Mr Duelfer had been insistent that there was still plenty for ISG to do and that he had "repeatedly mentioned CW/terrorism".[455]

816. Mr Duelfer was reported to have said:

- The timing for his next report "could slip a little".
- There was "potentially a good story to tell on the Saddam regime strategic intent", but he was "unhappy about the quality of the drafting produced in the ISG".
- He "wanted to use his report to challenge assumptions".
- Saddam Hussein's regime was "highly arbitrary and personalised: we should not expect to find carefully set out plans and consultation exercises".
- He "hoped to be able to point to a 'sharp breakout capability'".

[455] Minute Landsman to FCO [junior official], 5 July 2004, 'Iraq WMD: Meeting with Duelfer, 2 Jul'.

- He was "surprised" by Prime Minister Allawi's optimism that "WMD were there to be found".
- UNMOVIC's "excellent information base was 'about an Iraq which no longer existed'".
- "[W]e should begin to consider to what extent responsibility could eventually go to the Iraqis themselves".
- A possible cache in Syria was "not out of the question", but "Syria was 'well covered' and something should have come to light by now".

817. Mr Blair discussed Iraq with President Bush again during a video conference on 6 July.

818. The briefing for Mr Blair advised that President Bush might raise the Butler and Senate Intelligence Committee Reports, but that there was "no point in pushing again on the ISG – Duelfer will not report before August and further pressure will not change this".[456]

819. The record of the video conference between Mr Blair and President Bush on 6 July did not include any reference to discussion of the ISG or to the Butler and Senate Intelligence Committee Reports.[457]

Mr Blair's evidence to the Liaison Committee, 6 July 2004

820. During his appearance before the Liaison Committee on 6 July, Mr Blair was asked about the implications of the failure to find WMD.[458]

821. In his responses, Mr Blair made a number of points, including:

- He had "to accept that we have not found them [stockpiles of WMD] and that we may not find them. What I would say very strongly, however, is that to go to the opposite extreme and say, therefore, that no threat existed from Saddam Hussein would be a mistake. We do not know what has happened to them; they could have been removed, they could have been hidden, they could have been destroyed."
- The ISG had already indicated "quite clearly that there have been breaches" of UN resolutions.
- The purpose of military action "was in order to enforce" the UN resolutions.
- It was "absolutely clear from the evidence that has already been found … that he [Saddam] had the strategic capability, the intent and that he was in multiple breaches".

[458] Liaison Committee of the House of Commons, Session 2003-2004, Oral evidence taken before the Liaison Committee on Tuesday 6 July 2004, Qs 236-271.

- He genuinely believed "that those stockpiles of weapons were there; I think that most people did, and that is why the whole of the international community came together and passed the United Nations resolution it did [1441 adopted in November 2002], but that is a very different thing from saying that Saddam was not a threat; the truth is he was a threat, to the region and to the wider world, and the world is a safer place without him."
- He "would not accept" that Saddam Hussein "was not a threat and a threat in WMD terms".
- He did "not believe we would have got the progress on Libya, on AQ Khan, on Iran and on North Korea" without Iraq.
- In his view, "the reason … it was important that we took a stand on the WMD issue, and the place … to take that stand was Iraq because of the history of breaches of UN resolutions and the fact that they used WMD … is that if you carry on with this proliferation of WMD with these highly repressive states developing it … at some point you would have this new form of global terrorism and those states with WMD coming together."

The Senate Intelligence Committee Report, 9 July 2004

822. On 9 July, the Senate Committee on Intelligence published its report on the U.S. Intelligence Community's Prewar Intelligence Assessments on Iraq.[459] The main conclusions included:

- Most of the key judgements in the October 2002 US National Intelligence Estimate (NIE), 'Iraq's Continuing Programs for Weapons of Mass Destruction', either overstated, or were not supported by, the underlying intelligence reporting. A series of failures, particularly in analytic tradecraft, led to the mischaracterisation of the intelligence.
- The intelligence community did not accurately or adequately explain to policy-makers the uncertainties behind the judgements in the October 2002 NIE.
- The intelligence community suffered from a collective presumption that Iraq had an active and growing WMD programme. This "group think" led intelligence community analysts, collectors and managers both to interpret ambiguous evidence as conclusively indicative of a WMD programme and to ignore or minimise evidence that Iraq did not have active and expanding weapons of mass destruction programmes. This presumption was so strong that formal mechanisms established to challenge assumptions and group think were not used.

[459] Select Committee on Intelligence, 9 July 2004, Report of the Select Committee on Intelligence on the U.S. Intelligence Community's Prewar Intelligence Assessments on Iraq.

- In a few significant instances, the analysis in the NIE suffered from a "layering" effect, with assessments built on previous judgements without carrying forward the uncertainties of the underlying judgements.

823. Between September 2006 and June 2008, the Senate Intelligence Committee published additional detail on many of the issues addressed in the July 2004 Report.[460] The five parts of its "Phase II" Report covered the expanded investigation into pre-conflict intelligence announced by the Committee in February 2004:

- 'The Use by the Intelligence Community of Information Provided by the Iraqi National Congress' (September 2006);
- 'Postwar Findings About Iraq's WMD Programs and Links to Terrorism and How They Compare With Prewar Assessments' (September 2006);
- 'Prewar Intelligence Assessments about Postwar Iraq' (May 2007);
- 'Report on Whether Public Statements Regarding Iraq by US Government Officials Were Substantiated by Intelligence Information' (June 2008);
- 'Report on Intelligence Activities Relating to Iraq Conducted by the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group and the Office of Special Plans Within the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy' (June 2008).

CIG Assessment, 13 July 2004: 'A Review of Intelligence on Possible Links Between Al Qaida and Saddam's Regime'

On 13 July, at the request of the Cabinet Office, the CIG produced an Assessment reviewing the links between Al Qaida and Saddam Hussein's regime.[461]

The Key Judgements were:

- Nothing we have learnt since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime has invalidated previous JIC judgements on the possible links between the regime and Al Qaida.
- There were some contacts between the regime and Al Qaida during the 1990s, but they did not progress beyond the exploratory stage and the degree of practical co-operation, if any, was limited.
- Some sources … asserted that Al Qaida was seeking chemical and biological (CB) expertise. But the intelligence is not strong. Al Qaida did not receive CB material from Iraq.
- Saddam Hussein's regime was not involved with the 9/11 attacks.
- Al Qaida associates such as [Abu Musab] al-Zarqawi and members of Ansar al-Islam were known by the regime to be operating in Iraq and the Kurdish Autonomous Zone (KAZ) before Coalition action in 2003, but the exact relationship between the regime and Al Qaida-linked terrorists remains unclear.

[461] CIG Assessment, 13 July 2004, 'A Review of Intelligence on Possible Links Between Al Qaida and Saddam's Regime'.

- Al-Zarqawi made Iraq his base for jihad on his own initiative, but with plans in line with the Al Qaida global jihadist agenda."

The additional points in the Assessment included:

Pre 9/11

- After its defeat in 1991, the Iraqi regime "sought to make contact with a number of Islamist groups".
- "Senior Al Qaida detainees have revealed that Bin Laden was personally against any formal alliance with the Iraqi regime, but that others … believed some contact would be useful."
- The exact nature of early contacts remained "unclear".
- Intelligence indicated that "further contacts took place in the late 1990s".
- There was doubt about the reliability of some of the reporting, but "sufficient intelligence to assess there was some contact throughout the 1990s".

Post 9/11

- After the fall of the Taliban in Afghanistan, "reports suggested that Iraq was being used as a transit route for Islamist terrorists", and: "By 2002 Al Qaida-linked terrorists had established a presence … some involved in the development of CB substances at a facility near Halabjah, run by Ansar al-Islam."
- It was "likely that the regime knew these Islamist terrorists were operating in Iraq, though it would not have been able to act against them in the KAZ".
- "Post war intelligence" suggested that "in Baghdad and elsewhere some effort … was made to arrest Al Qaida-linked terrorists".

The Butler Report, 14 July 2004

824. In its meeting on 7 July, the JIC discussed the forthcoming publication of the Butler Report.[462] Sir David Omand stated that it "would be the first time that such an extensive list of JIC reports had been made public". It was "in the JIC's interests that the Report showed that the right kind of warnings" had been given, and that "there was a depth to the intelligence and assessment on Iraq". There were, however, "serious security implications" and the danger of setting precedents. Redactions to the extracts from JIC Assessments would need to be agreed before publication.

825. The Butler Report was published on 14 July.[463]

826. In the House of Commons, Mr Blair assessed the Report's implications for two questions that had persisted throughout the debate on Iraq:

> "One is an issue of good faith – of integrity. This is now the fourth exhaustive inquiry that has dealt with the issue. This Report, the Hutton Inquiry, the Report of the Intelligence and Security Committee before it, and that of the Foreign Affairs Committee before that, found the same thing. No one lied. No one made up the intelligence. No one inserted things into the dossier against the advice of the intelligence services. Everyone genuinely tried to do their best in good faith for the country in circumstances of acute difficulty. That issue of good faith should now be at an end.

[463] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898.

"But there is another issue. We expected – I expected – to find actual usable chemical or biological weapons shortly after we entered Iraq … Lord Butler, in his Report, says: 'We believe that it would be a rash person who asserted at this stage that evidence of Iraqi possession of stocks of biological or chemical agents, or even of banned missiles, does not exist or will never be found.' However, I have to accept that, as the months have passed, it has seemed increasingly clear that, at the time of invasion, Saddam did not have stockpiles of chemical or biological weapons ready to deploy. The second issue is therefore this: even if we acted in perfectly good faith, is it now the case that in the absence of stockpiles of weapons ready to deploy, the threat was misconceived and therefore the war was unjustified?

"I have searched my conscience … to answer that question. My answer would be this: the evidence of Saddam's weapons of mass destruction was indeed less certain and less well founded than was stated at the time … However … he retained complete strategic intent on WMD and significant capability … He had no intention of ever co-operating fully with the inspectors, and he was going to start up again the moment the troops and the inspectors departed, or the sanctions eroded. I say further that if we had backed down in respect of Saddam, we would never have taken the stand that we needed to take on weapons of mass destruction, we would never have got the progress on Libya, for example, that we achieved, and we would have left Saddam in charge of Iraq, with every malign intent and capability still in place, and with every dictator with the same intent everywhere immeasurably emboldened."[464]

827. Mr Blair commented on the Butler Report's statement that:

"… with hindsight making public that the authorship of the dossier was by the JIC was a mistake. It meant that more weight was put on the intelligence than it could bear, and put the JIC and its chairman in a difficult position. It recommends in future a clear delimitation between Government and the JIC, perhaps by issuing two documents. I think this is wise, although I doubt that it would have made much difference to the reception of the intelligence at the time. The Report also enlarges on the criticisms of the ISC in respect of the greater use of caveats about intelligence both in the dossier and in my foreword, and we accept that entirely.

[464] House of Commons, Official Report, 14 July 2004, column 1431.

> "The Report also states that significant parts of the intelligence have now been found by the Secret Intelligence Service to be in doubt. The Chief of the SIS, Sir Richard Dearlove, has told me that it accepts all the conclusions and recommendations of Lord Butler's Report that concern the Service. The SIS will fully address the recommendations that Lord Butler has made about its procedures and about the need for the Service properly to resource them. The Service has played and continues to play, a vital role in countering worldwide the tide of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Indeed, its successes are evident in Lord Butler's Report.
> "I accept the Report's conclusions in full. Any mistakes should not be laid at the door of our intelligence and security community. They do a tremendous job for our country. I accept full personal responsibility for the way in which the issue was presented and therefore for any errors that were made."[465]

828. The Inquiry cites the findings of the Butler Review at a number of points in Sections 4.1, 4.2 and 4.3 where they best illuminate the issues under discussion, rather than attempting to summarise them in one place. Those include:

- Findings relating to the intelligence underpinning individual JIC Assessments and the quality of those Assessments;
- Findings on the way in which intelligence and JIC Assessments were used to underpin public statements by the Government, and in particular the September 2002 dossier and statements to Parliament;
- Findings on the reporting issued in September 2002 about the production of chemical agent; and
- Findings on the serious doubts about other lines of reporting and the eventual withdrawal of that reporting, including reports about mobile facilities for the production of biological agent and the claim that chemical and biological munitions could be moved into place for an attack within 45 minutes.

The ISG Comprehensive Report, 6 October 2004

829. Mr Blair discussed the ISG Comprehensive Report with President Bush in late July.

830. Mr Blair stated to officials that the Comprehensive Report needed to indicate the degree of certainty that Iraq had not possessed WMD and how far the security situation in Iraq had affected the search.

831. Officials warned of the need to avoid any repeat of allegations that the UK had exerted improper pressure on the preparation of the previous ISG report.

[465] House of Commons, Official Report, 14 July 2004, column 1435.

832. Mr Blair raised the ISG report during a video conference with President Bush on 22 July.[466] He said that Mr Duelfer needed to prove that Saddam Hussein had been "procuring the means to develop WMD, had missiles to deliver it, and the intent to use it". The ISG report could prove to be a powerful argument in support of the war.

833. Mr Blair suggested that, with the ISG report and the Butler Review, which had made clear that Al Qaida had been present in Iraq, "we could clearly argue that it would have been wrong to let Saddam go unchecked". The timing of the ISG report had to be right. Sir Nigel Sheinwald noted that early September looked realistic.

834. Mr Dowse discussed the ISG report with Mr Duelfer at a meeting hosted by the US Embassy in London on 31 August.[467] Mr Duelfer stated that he did not expect the report to satisfy those wanting evidence of WMD, but thought it would disappoint those who said that sanctions and containment had been working. There would be plenty of very clear evidence that Iraqi abuse of OFF had allowed the regime to siphon off "huge amounts" of money.

835. Mr Dowse reported that it was Mr Duelfer's "firm intention" to deliver the report to Mr McLaughlin by the end of September in a form suitable for immediate publication. A draft should be ready for review by governments in Washington, London and Canberra in about two weeks.

836. Mr Blair commented that Mr Duelfer needed:

> "… a conclusion on WMD weapons themselves. How clear is it that they didn't exist; is it an open question; how has the security situation post May 03 & now affected the search? He will need answers to this."[468]

837. Mr Dowse responded on 10 September. The UK had not seen the latest text, but Mr Duelfer was expected to say that:

- the ISG had "not been able to determine conclusively whether Saddam possessed WMD in 2003"; and
- the likelihood was that "even if some did exist, they were not of military significance".[469]

838. Mr Dowse reported that Mr Duelfer remained "extremely (and rightly) sensitive" to leaks of the report before publication, and particularly to any suggestion that he may be influenced by Washington or London. Mr Dowse advised: "we must avoid a repeat of the allegations that HMG exerted improper pressure on the last report".

839. The JIC Sub-Committee on Iraq/WMD, chaired by Mr Ehrman, who took up his appointment as Chairman of the JIC at the end of August, discussed Mr Duelfer's draft Comprehensive Report on 17 September.[470]

840. The meeting was also informed that Washington planned to reduce the size of the ISG in Baghdad, culminating in its merger with MNF-I. During the drawdown period it could follow up a number of lines "including reporting on the chemical laboratory network and links with Syria".

841. Mr Ehrman reported to Sir Nigel Sheinwald that the DIS had received five of the six chapters of the draft Comprehensive Report, which would be considered for factual accuracy and intelligence source protection.[471] Mr Duelfer had made it clear he would not accept any attempt to alter the judgements in the Report. Mr Ehrman stated that no such attempts were being made.

842. Mr Ehrman explained that the JIC was:

> "… preparing a table showing key conclusions set against what the dossier and JIC assessments said before the war … [T]he headline points can be summarised as follows:
> a) Strategic intent
> Duelfer concludes that Saddam wanted to recreate Iraq's WMD capability after sanctions were removed. Though there was no formal written strategy or plan for this, the ISG say they have clear evidence of his intent to do it. Saddam aspired to develop a nuclear capability but intended to focus on ballistic missile and tactical CW capabilities.
> Iraq never intended to meet the spirit of the UNSC's resolutions … By mid-2000 elements within Saddam's regime boasted that the UN sanctions regime was slowly eroding.
> b) WMD capabilities
> Duelfer judges that Iraq's WMD capability was mostly destroyed in 1991 …
> Saddam's perceived requirement to bluff about WMD … made it too dangerous to reveal this to the international community …
> Duelfer says that the ISG has not judged conclusively whether or not Saddam possessed WMD in 2003 …

[471] Minute Ehrman to Sheinwald, 17 September 2004, 'Iraq Survey Group (ISG) Report'.

c) CW

… There are no indications that Baghdad resumed production of chemical munitions [after 1991] …

… the Iraqi Intelligence Service maintained from 1991 to 2003 a set of undeclared covert laboratories to research and test various chemicals and poisons, primarily for intelligence operations …

The ISG judges that Iraq had a capability to produce large quantities of sulphur mustard agent within three to six months.

d) Nuclear

Saddam ended the nuclear programme in 1991. The ISG found no evidence to suggest concerted efforts to restart the programme …

The ISG has uncovered no information to support allegations of Iraqi pursuit of uranium from abroad in the post-Operation Desert Storm era …

e) Delivery systems

The ISG has uncovered no evidence that Iraq retained SCUD-variant missiles (ie Al Husseins) …

… The ISG assesses that Saddam clearly intended to reconstitute long range delivery systems and that the systems were potentially for WMD.

The ISG has substantial documentary evidence and source reporting indicating that the regime intentionally violated various international resolutions and agreements in order to pursue its delivery systems programmes."

843. Mr Ehrman recommended that the Government's public lines on the Comprehensive Report should focus on:

- the Report's confirmation of Saddam Hussein's breaches of resolution 1441;
- Saddam Hussein's strategic intent to reconstitute his WMD when sanctions were lifted; and
- the conclusion that sanctions and therefore containment were becoming progressively less effective.

844. Mr Ehrman advised that many of the ISG's points had already been covered in the Butler Report, but the ISG's "central judgement, that Iraq's WMD capability was essentially destroyed in 1991 and not reconstituted by March 2003", was "firmer than the judgement Lord Butler had reached".

845. On 21 September, Mr Ehrman informed Sir Nigel Sheinwald that the UK had received the final, BW, chapter of the draft Comprehensive Report.[472] He explained that the JIC had also been able to look at the detail of the section on illicit finance and procurement.

846. Mr Ehrman wrote that, on BW:

- The ISG judged that Iraq appeared "to have destroyed its undeclared stocks of BW agent", but it lacked "evidence to document complete destruction".
- "Iraq retained some BW-related seedstocks until their discovery after Operation Iraqi Freedom."
- After Operation Desert Storm, in 1991, Iraq "sought to save what it could of its BW infrastructure and covertly to continue BW research, as well as to hide evidence of that and earlier efforts".
- The ISG judged that Iraq "abandoned its existing BW programme, destroying the facility at al Hakam" when the Iraq economy was "at rock bottom in 1995".
- The ISG had "found no direct evidence that Iraq, after 1996, had plans for a new BW programme or was conducting BW-specific work for military purposes".
- The ISG judged that BW applicable research since 1996 "was not conducted in connection with the development of a BW programme".
- "The Iraqi intelligence service had a series of laboratories that conducted biological work including research into BW agents for assassination purposes until the mid-1990s." Experiments had been conducted on human beings, who died, but there was "no evidence to link these tests with the development of BW".
- "In spite of exhaustive investigation", the ISG had "found no evidence that Iraq possessed or was developing, BW agent production systems mounted on road vehicles or railway wagons".
- The ISG judged that "the two trailers captured in 2003" were "almost certainly designed and built exclusively for the generation of hydrogen".
- The ISG judged that "Iraq could have re-established an elementary BW programme within a few weeks to a few months of a decision to do so, but it has discovered no indications that the regime was pursuing such a course".

847. On illicit finance and procurement, Mr Ehrman reported that the findings included:

- Private companies from Jordan, India, France, Italy, Romania and Turkey appeared to have engaged in possible WMD-related trade with Iraq.
- The Governments of Russia, Syria, Belarus, North Korea, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Yemen directly supported or endorsed private companies' efforts to assist Iraq with conventional arms procurement, in breach of UN sanctions.

- The Governments of Jordan, China, India, South Korea, Bulgaria, Ukraine, Cyprus, Egypt, Lebanon, Georgia, France, Poland, Romania and Taiwan allowed private and/or state-owned companies to support Iraq's conventional arms procurement programmes.
- The number of countries supporting Iraq's schemes to undermine sanctions increased dramatically between 1995 and 2003.
- A number of bilateral trade agreements with "neighbouring" countries, including Jordan, Syria, Turkey, Egypt and Yemen, eventually led to sanctions violations.
- France was one of the top three countries with companies or individuals receiving secret oil vouchers.
- There was a significant amount of captured documentation showing contracts between Iraq and Russian companies "close to government".

Mr Blair's speech to the Labour Party conference, 28 September 2004

In his speech to the Labour Party conference on 28 September, Mr Blair raised the issue of trust and the decisions he had made on future security in the preceding three years.[473] Mr Blair said that he wanted to deal with the issue of Iraq "head on". He stated:

> "The evidence about Saddam having actual biological and chemical weapons, as opposed to the capability to develop them, has turned out to be wrong.
> "I acknowledge that and accept it.
> "I simply point out, such evidence was agreed by the whole international community, not least because Saddam had used such weapons against his own people and neighbouring countries.
> "And the problem is, I can apologise for the information that turned out to be wrong, but I can't, sincerely at least, apologise for removing Saddam.
> "The world is a better place with Saddam in prison not in power."

Mr Blair challenged the "belief that the basic judgement I have made since September 11th [2001], including on Iraq, is wrong, that by our actions we have made matters worse not better". He acknowledged that the issue had "divided the country", but set out his view of the need to deal with the threat from the "wholly new phenomenon of worldwide global terrorism", including in Iraq, and the importance of the alliance with the US.

[473] BBC News, 28 September 2004, Full text of Blair's Speech.

848. On 28 September, Mr Ehrman sent Sir Nigel Sheinwald draft "lines to take" on the ISG Comprehensive Report, excluding the section on illicit finance and procurement, which Mr Duelfer was reported to be rewriting.[474]

849. Mr Ehrman proposed that the focus should be on the three themes he had identified in earlier minutes:

- Saddam's strategic intent to reconstitute his WMD when sanctions were lifted;
- his repeated breaches of Security Council resolutions, including 1441;
- the ISG conclusions on the progressive erosion of sanctions."

850. Mr Ehrman added:

> "The lines to take also seek to deal with the main point which many will make (put crudely 'no WMD') – mainly by reference to Lord Butler's conclusions. We will be asked: 'Do you endorse/accept the ISG Report?' I recommend that we stick to the reference back to Butler, whose conclusions were very close to the ISG's, and to the fact that the Government accepted these. We cannot go further because we do not accept Duelfer's conclusion on uranium and Niger, which is the opposite of Butler's. Nor has Duelfer in most cases made clear the full reasoning behind his conclusions."

851. Mr Ehrman sent a further update on 1 October, explaining that the chapter on procurement was still being worked on.[475]

852. Mr Anthony Phillipson, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, sent Mr Blair a minute on developments later the same day.[476] Formal publication of the ISG Comprehensive Report would be at 1500 UK time on 6 October. The US Government would brief the US press at 1900 UK time on 5 October. The FCO was leading on UK press handling and intended to take "a low-key, defensive, approach". It was not a UK report and there would be no UK pre-briefing. Mr Straw would issue a Written Statement.

853. Mr Phillipson wrote that Mr Blair would:

> "… want to discuss this on Monday [4 October], particularly if you want to take a more proactive approach to get across the positive aspects of the Report regarding Saddam's strategic intent to develop WMD."

854. Mr Phillipson added that the US had decided that there would be two printed versions of the Comprehensive Report, not one:

- a "not for publication" version for Congress and the US Government; and
- an online version with references to US companies and individuals excised for legal reasons.

[476] Minute Phillipson to Prime Minister, 1 October 2004, 'ISG Report: Publication'.

855. Mr Phillipson wrote that the US Government had rejected Mr Duelfer's argument that it should be sufficient to issue a disclaimer stating that naming companies in the Report was not an indication of guilt or complicity; a published official CIA report could not mention named US individuals or entities. The UK had pressed for the exclusion of all such references, but the US position was that the legal restriction did not apply to non-US entities. Presentationally, that approach was better than removing only US and UK names; it emphasised that it was not the UK's report.

856. The other issue still to be addressed was the withdrawal of intelligence used before the invasion to support assessments about Iraqi WMD programmes. No.10 was discussing handling, including informing the ISC, with SIS.

857. Sir Nigel Sheinwald and Dr Rice discussed the ISG Comprehensive Report on 4 October.[477] Sir Nigel said that there had been good co-ordination between the US and UK. He set out Mr Blair's view on handling: the failure to find WMD stockpiles it should be presented as "yesterday's story" and the media should be encouraged to focus on the new material about strategic intent, concealment and sanctions busting.

858. Mr Blair raised the ISG Comprehensive Report with President Bush during a video conference on 5 October.[478]

859. Mr Blair's brief for the conversation suggested that he tell President Bush that the UK was focusing on the positive aspects of the ISG Report rather than the lack of WMD.[479]

860. During his wider discussion with President Bush on Iraq on 5 October (see Section 9.3), Mr Blair stated that the ISG Report "showed that Saddam had a clear strategic intent to develop WMD" and that "terrorists had now chosen to make Iraq the battleground".[480] It would be naive to say that Iraq had been stable and non-threatening before March 2003 and would still be so if no action had been taken. Mr Blair concluded that:

> "We needed to focus on the fact that sanctions had not been working, Saddam had strategic intent to rebuild his capability, and even if he had no deployable weapons, the enforcement regime wasn't working and Saddam was gearing up for when it was removed. We had to focus on the whole story."

861. The ISG Comprehensive Report was published on 6 October 2004.

862. In the 'Scope Note' introducing The Comprehensive Report of the Special Advisor to the DCI on Iraq's WMD (the ISG Comprehensive Report), Mr Duelfer stated that the Report covered the ISG's findings between June 2003 and September 2004.[481] Since there remained "the possibility (though small) of remaining WMD", reports of WMD-related material in the future would continue to be investigated.

863. The Comprehensive Report was divided into six sections, each opening with a summary of key findings.[482] Those included:

Regime Strategic Intent:

- "Saddam Hussein so dominated the Iraqi regime that its strategic intent was his alone. He wanted to end sanctions while preserving the capability to reconstitute his weapons of mass destruction (WMD) when sanctions were lifted."
- "Saddam wanted to recreate Iraq's WMD capability – which was essentially destroyed in 1991 – after sanctions were removed and Iraq's economy stabilized, but probably with a different mix of capabilities to that which previously existed. Saddam aspired to develop a nuclear capability – in an incremental fashion, irrespective of international pressure and the resulting economic risks – but he intended to focus on ballistic missile and tactical chemical warfare (CW) capabilities."

Regime Finance and Procurement:

- "Saddam directed the regime's key ministries and governmental agencies to devise and implement strategies, policies and techniques to discredit the UN sanctions, harass UN personnel in Iraq, and discredit the US. At the same time, according to reporting, he also wanted to obfuscate Iraq's refusal to reveal the nature of its WMD and WMD-related programs, their capabilities, and his intentions."
- "Iraq under Saddam successfully devised various methods to acquire and import items prohibited under UN sanctions …"

Delivery Systems:

- "Desert Storm and subsequent UN resolutions and inspections brought many of Iraq's delivery programs to a halt."
- "While other WMD programs were strictly prohibited, the UN permitted Iraq to develop and possess delivery systems provided their range did not exceed 150km. This freedom allowed Iraq to keep its scientists and technicians employed and to keep its infrastructure and manufacturing base largely intact … This positioned Iraq for a potential breakout capability."

- "ISG uncovered Iraqi plans or designs for three long range ballistic missiles with ranges from 400 to 1,000km and for a 1,000km-range cruise missile, although none of these systems progressed to production and only one purportedly passed the design stage. ISG assesses that these plans demonstrate Saddam's continuing desire – up to the beginning of Operation Iraqi Freedom (OIF) – for a long range delivery capability."
- "Procurements supporting delivery system programs expanded after the 1998 departure of the UN inspectors. Iraq also hired outside expertise to assist development programs."
- "… ISG assesses that Saddam clearly intended to reconstitute long range delivery systems and the systems potentially were for WMD*."

Nuclear:

- "Iraq Survey Group (ISG) discovered further evidence of the maturity and significance of the pre-1991 Iraqi Nuclear program but found that Iraq's ability to reconstitute a nuclear weapons program progressively decayed after that date."
- "In the wake of Desert Storm, Iraq took steps to conceal key elements of its program and to preserve what it could of the professional capabilities of its nuclear scientific community."
- "As with other WMD areas, Saddam's ambitions in the nuclear area were secondary to his prime objective of ending UN sanctions."

Chemical:

- "Saddam never abandoned his intentions to resume a CW effort when sanctions were lifted and conditions were judged favourable …"
- "*While a small number of old, abandoned chemical munitions have been discovered, ISG judges that Iraq unilaterally destroyed its undeclared chemical weapons stockpile in 1991. There are no credible indications that Baghdad resumed production of chemical munitions thereafter …"
- "The way Iraq organized its chemical industry after the mid-1990s allowed it to conserve the knowledge-base needed to restart a CW program …"
- "Iraq's historical ability to implement simple solutions to weaponization challenges allowed Iraq to retain the capability to weaponize CW agent when the need arose …"

Biological:

- "ISG judges that Iraq's actions between 1991 and 1996 demonstrate that the state intended to preserve its BW capability and return to a steady, methodical progress toward a mature BW program when and if the opportunity arose."

- "ISG found no direct evidence that Iraq, after 1996, had plans for a new BW program or was conducting BW-specific work for military purposes."
- "Nevertheless, after 1996 Iraq still had a significant dual-use capability – some declared – readily useful for BW if the regime chose to use it to pursue a BW program. Moreover, Iraq still possessed its most important BW asset, the scientific know-how of its BW cadre."
- "Depending on its scale, Iraq could have re-established an elementary BW program within a few weeks to a few months of a decision to do so, but ISG discovered no indications that the regime was pursuing such a course."
- "The IIS [Iraqi Intelligence Service] had a series of laboratories that conducted biological work including research into BW agents for assassination purposes until the mid-1990s. ISG has not been able … to determine whether any of the work was related to military development of BW agent."

864. In his memoir, Mr Duelfer wrote:

> "I [did not] want the Report to tell people what to think up front: There was no executive summary with a predetermined conclusion. The story of Iraq, sanctions, and WMD was too intricate for that: It deserved to be seen in its entirety, without single aspects being taken out of context."[483]

The Government's response to the ISG Comprehensive Report

865. In the House of Commons on 12 October, Mr Straw described the ISG Comprehensive Report as providing "chapter and verse as to why the policy of containment was not working".

866. The following day, Mr Blair told the Commons:

> "Those people who want to pray in aid the Iraq Survey Group in respect of stockpiles of weapons must also accept the other part of what the Iraq Survey Group said, which is that Saddam retained the intent and the capability … and was in breach of United Nations resolutions. That is what Mr Duelfer expressly said."

867. In the House of Commons on 12 October, Mr Straw stated:

> "The [ISG] Report concludes that by the mid-1990s, Iraq was essentially free of weapons of mass destruction, but it goes on to describe a sophisticated and systematic campaign by Saddam Hussein to bring down the United Nations sanctions regime and to reconstitute his weapons programme.

[483] Duelfer C. Hide and Seek: The Search for Truth in Iraq. Public Affairs, 2009.

"The Report provides chapter and verse as to why the policy of containment was not working."[484]

868. At PMQs on 13 October, Mr Blair stated:

"We know from the Iraq Survey Group that he [Saddam Hussein] indeed had the intent and capability and retained the scientists and desire, but that he might not have had stockpiles of actually deployable weapons. We have accepted that and I have already apologised for any information that subsequently turned out to be wrong.

"Those people who want to pray in aid the Iraq Survey Group in respect of stockpiles of weapons must also accept the other part of what the Iraq Survey Group said, which is that Saddam retained the intent and the capability – the teams of scientists and so on – and was in breach of United Nations resolutions. That is what Mr Duelfer expressly said. It was the breach of UN resolutions and their enforcement that was and is the reason for going to war."[485]

869. On 28 October, in response to a Written Parliamentary Question from Mr Llew Smith (Labour) asking for a list of the conclusions of the ISG Comprehensive Report with which the Foreign Secretary did not agree, Mr Denis MacShane, Foreign Office Minister, set out three principal areas of disagreement:

"The Iraq Survey Group (ISG) Report concludes that there is no evidence to suggest that Iraq sought to procure uranium from Africa in the 1990s. The Government continues to believe that credible evidence exists to support the assertion made in the September 2002 dossier. Lord Butler of Brockwell's Review upheld that belief. The UK was not in a position to share all the intelligence on this issue with the ISG.

"The ISG also expressed doubt that the aluminium tubes referred to in the September dossier were evidence of a resumption of Iraq's nuclear programmes. Again, Lord Butler's Review assessed this, and concluded that the Joint Intelligence Committee were right to include reference to the tubes in the dossier and that it properly reflected doubts about the use of the tubes in the caution of its assessments. The Government fully accepts the findings of Lord Butler's Review.

"The ISG also report that they found no evidence to support the claim in the dossier that Iraq 'is almost certainly seeking an indigenous ability to enrich uranium' based on gas centrifuge technology. They do, however, admit that elements of useful and relevant technologies were being developed."[486]

Closure of the ISG and Addendums to the Comprehensive Report

870. Mr Duelfer visited London on 15 October on his way back to Iraq.[487] He told a DIS official that he expected to remain in Baghdad until about Christmas to work on the remaining unresolved issues, including cross-border movement into Syria.

871. In his memoir, Mr Duelfer described the energy for ISG activities as "almost completely extinguished".[488] Mr McLaughlin and the White House supported the idea of the ISG collecting more information to "close out the remaining uncertain issues", including the reported movement of WMD to Syria before the invasion, but most ISG staff were now focused on the insurgency.

872. On 28 October, Op ROCKINGHAM reported that the ISG continued to investigate:

- remaining stocks of CBW agents;
- WMD infrastructure and associated individuals of concern; and
- the Syrian connection.[489]

873. The ISG was also revisiting priority WMD-related sites to document and secure equipment of proliferation concern.

874. On 8 November, two US military protection officers were killed in a convoy taking Mr Duelfer and his deputy to a meeting in Baghdad to discuss the Syrian connection.[490] After the incident, the US instructed that all ISG data-gathering missions should stop.

875. Mr Duelfer left Baghdad on 16 December.[491]

876. In April 2005, the ISG published additional material as Addendums to the Comprehensive Report.

877. On 23 December 2004, Mr Ehrman informed Sir Nigel Sheinwald that Mr Duelfer planned to publish a version of the Comprehensive Report with a number of new annexes, in the second half of January.[492] The UK had received four annexes for factual checking. The key points in the annexes included:

- Residual proliferation risks from people and equipment/materials. Mr Duelfer had concluded that the threat of proliferation of WMD skills beyond Iraq was "small".
- The value of Iraqi detainees to the ISG investigation. If the US agreed to publication, this could cause the most interest. The draft annex stated that pre-conflict intelligence on people in the WMD programme was as inaccurate as intelligence on WMD infrastructure and was very critical of the US debriefing process.

- Residual pre-1991 stocks in Iraq. The ISG believed that any remaining chemical munitions did not pose a militarily significant threat to Coalition Forces. Iraq had "never successfully formulated" BW agents "for long term storage". Any remaining BW agents thus posed little or no risk to Coalition Forces or civilians.
- Iraq's Military Industrial Commission. Reports that Qusay Hussein had asked for a list of Iraqi BW experts to be compiled for him to pass to Syria and that an Iraqi computer hacker claimed to be able to hack into US military satellites might arouse some interest.

878. A fifth annex containing an outline plan for future investigation of possible WMD links with Syria was under consideration.

879. Mr Ehrman did not expect publication of the annexes to attract major media interest. He advised that the ISG would "effectively wind up" in January 2005, with responsibility for WMD issues passing to the MNF in Baghdad.

880. The ISG continued into 2005 as Mr Duelfer completed work, in Washington, on the Addendums to the September 2004 Comprehensive Report.[493]

881. On 25 February 2005, Mr Ehrman reported to Sir Nigel Sheinwald that the text had been sent to the printers and was expected to be published in early to mid-March.[494] He explained that the final version included an additional one-page annex on possible pre-conflict movement of WMD out of Iraq. The ISG had been unable to rule out unofficial movement of limited WMD materials, but judged it unlikely that an official transfer had taken place.

882. Mr Ehrman attached draft press lines prepared by the FCO and the MOD. He advised that the main points remained unchanged:

- "Saddam had strategic intent to reconstitute Iraq's WMD programmes when sanctions were lifted".
- "Iraq repeatedly breached Security Council Resolutions, including 1441".
- "[S]anctions were progressively eroding before the conflict".

883. Mr Ehrman advised:

> "If asked about the Report's conclusion that, by the mid-1990s Iraq was essentially free of WMD, we will refer to the Prime Minister's statement of 28 September 2004 in Brighton that 'evidence about Saddam having actual BW and CW weapons, as opposed to the capability to develop them, has turned out to be wrong'."

884. The DIS reported on 2 March that the ISG was to be deactivated by 18 April.[495] It would be absorbed into the Combined Intelligence and Operations Centre (CIOC), which would retain WMD as a secondary role, after counter-insurgency and counter-terrorism.

885. Shortly before the eventual publication of the final edition of the Comprehensive Report on 25 April, Mr Ehrman sent Mr Sheinwald draft press lines, which had been sent to the US for "one last check" that they did not conflict with US lines.[496]

886. The main points included:

- "… [S]ix new addenda … do not fundamentally alter the findings of the earlier Report".
- "Government has already accepted the ISG conclusion that by the mid-1990s, Iraq was effectively free from WMD."
- "But have set out repeatedly why existence or otherwise of WMD does not affect the legal basis for going to war."

887. Mr Duelfer ceased to be Special Advisor to the DCI on 21 April.[497]

888. On 25 April, the final edition of the ISG Comprehensive Report, including six Addendums, was published by the US Government.[498]

889. The Addendums covered:

- 'Prewar Movement of WMD Material Out of Iraq'. The ISG reported that declining security had halted the investigation and the results remained "inconclusive". The ISG judged it "unlikely" that there had been an official transfer of WMD material from Iraq to Syria.
- 'Iraqi Detainees: Value to Investigation of Iraq WMD and Current Status'. Detainees had provided "a vital primary source of information" on Iraq's WMD programmes and the regime's strategic intent.
- 'Residual Proliferation Risks: People'. There remained a danger that hostile governments, terrorists or insurgents might seek Iraqi expertise. The number of individuals was small, but they remained "an important concern".
- 'Residual Pre-1991 CBW Stocks in Iraq'. The ISG assessed that small numbers of degraded pre-1991 chemical weapons would continue to be found, but did not pose "a militarily significant threat to Coalition forces". Any biological agents that had survived would "probably have significantly decreased pathogenicity

Report of the US Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction, 31 March 2005

890. The Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction, established by President Bush on 6 February 2004, published its Report on 31 March 2005.[499]

891. In their covering letter to President Bush, the members of the Commission wrote:

> "We conclude that the Intelligence Community was dead wrong in almost all of its pre-war judgments about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. This was a major intelligence failure. Its principal causes were the Intelligence Community's inability to collect good information about Iraq's WMD programs, serious errors in analyzing what information it could gather, and a failure to make clear just how much of its analysis was based on assumptions, rather than good evidence …
> "After a thorough review, the Commission found no indication that the Intelligence Community distorted the evidence regarding Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. What the intelligence professionals told you about Saddam Hussein's programs was what they believed. They were simply wrong."

JIC Assessment, 28 September 2006: 'Iraqi Chemical Weapons: Implications of Recent Finds'

892. In September 2006, the JIC issued an Assessment considering recent US recovery of chemical munitions, 'Iraqi Chemical Weapons: Implications of Recent Finds'.[500] It addressed:

- a series of US-led operations to purchase chemical weapons in MND(SE);
- recent US discoveries of canisters from a previously unidentified site at Taji, a large military complex north of Baghdad; and
- occasional individual finds.

---

[499] The Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction, 31 March 2005, Report to the President of the United States.
[500] JIC Assessment, 28 September 2006, 'Iraqi Chemical Weapons: Implications of Recent Finds'.

893. The Assessment stated that, in southern Iraq, "Some 545 sarin nerve agent warheads for 122mm rockets had been recovered." The UK did not know the original sources or the sites from which the weapons had been recovered. The Assessment judged that they had been produced before 1991 and were probably from forward ammunition supply points, not the principal CW storage depot at Al Muthanna or any other large depot. The warheads did "not constitute evidence of a concerted Iraqi plan to retain chemical weapons covertly post-1991 in a viable state for future use". Their existence could be explained by a number of reasons, including careless disposal, poor accounting or simple loss or abandonment. The Assessment also stated that Iraqi sarin "had a relatively short shelf life".

894. The munitions recovered at Taji were "CW-capable" but no CW agents had been identified.

895. The Assessment stated that small numbers of munitions designed to carry agents other than sarin had been recovered, "including 11 or 12 155mm mustard-based artillery rounds". None contained "more than residual traces of mustard".

896. The Assessment also stated:

> "It is unlikely ever to be possible to reconcile the tens of thousands of 122mm chemical weapons that the former regime declared it had manufactured, used and destroyed with figures from UNSCOM or the findings of the Iraq Survey Group. We judge that further recoveries of sarin-based chemical weapons are highly likely, but we cannot estimate how many will be found in total."

Conclusions

897. This Section has considered the impact of the failure to find stockpiles of WMD in Iraq in the months immediately after the invasion, and of the ISG's emerging conclusions, on:

- the Government's response to demands for an independent judge-led inquiry into pre-conflict intelligence on Iraq; and
- the Government's public presentation of the nature of the threat from Saddam Hussein's regime and the decision to go to war.

898. The Inquiry has not sought to comment in detail on the specific conclusions of the ISC, FAC, Hutton and Butler Reports, all of which were published before the withdrawal by SIS in September 2004 of a significant proportion of the intelligence underpinning the JIC Assessments and September 2002 dossier on which UK policy had rested.

899. In addition to the conclusions of those reports, the Inquiry notes the forthright statement in March 2005 of the US Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction.

Reporting to President Bush, the Commission stated that "the [US] Intelligence Community was dead wrong in almost all of its pre-war judgments about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. This was a major intelligence failure."

900. The evidence in this Section shows that, after the invasion, the UK Government, including the intelligence community, was reluctant to admit, and to recognise publicly, the mounting evidence that there had been failings in the UK's pre-conflict collection, validation, analysis and presentation of intelligence on Iraq's WMD.

901. Despite the failure to identify any evidence of WMD programmes during pre-conflict inspections, the UK Government remained confident that evidence would be found after the Iraqi regime had been removed.

902. Almost immediately after the start of the invasion, UK Ministers and officials sought to lower public expectations of immediate or significant finds of WMD in Iraq.

903. At the end of March 2003, Mr Scarlett informed No.10 that the Assessments Staff considered that:

- most sites associated with WMD production had been "cleansed over the last six to nine months"; and
- "the best prospect of exposing the full extent of the WMD programmes rests in free contact with scientists, and other individuals, involved in the WMD programmes and the (extensive) concealment activity".

904. On 21 April, Mr Straw expressed concern to Mr Blair that the Government was being pushed into a position where it accepted that war would only have been justified if there was a significant find of WMD.

905. The post-invasion search for WMD did not start well. XTF-75, the US-led military unit responsible for locating and securing personnel, documents, electronic files, and material, achieved little on WMD. It failed to make significant finds or to prevent the loss of potentially valuable information.

906. By May, when the US announced the creation of the ISG to take over the search for WMD, the absence of significant finds in Iraq was already generating critical media comment on the nature of the pre-invasion intelligence.

907. The UK Government employed the same arguments used to explain the inspectors' lack of finds – the regime's skill at cheating and concealment and the need to conduct interviews with key personnel – to explain the lack of any significant finds from the early post-invasion searches.

908. The Government sought to emphasise the complexity of the exercise and the time needed for work to be completed.

909. The early discovery of two mobile trailers was the most significant find, but the trailers' use for BW production remained unproven.

910. The lack of evidence to support pre-conflict claims about Iraq's WMD challenged the credibility of the Government and the intelligence community, and the legitimacy of the war.

911. The Government and the intelligence community were both concerned about the consequences of the presentational aspects of their pre-war assessments being discredited.

912. Although the US proposed the creation of the ISG in April, it was not launched until 30 May. Mr Tenet appointed Dr Kay as the ISG's first Head on 11 June and it was another two months before Mr Scarlett was able to inform No.10 on 10 August that the ISG was "fully operational".

913. By June, the Government had acknowledged the need for a review of the UK's pre-conflict intelligence on Iraq. It responded to demands for an independent, judge-led inquiry by expressing support for the reviews initiated by the ISC and the FAC.

914. The announcement of the Hutton Inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the death of Dr David Kelly on 18 July reinforced the Government's position that additional reviews were not needed.

915. The Government maintained that position until January 2004, backed by three votes in the House of Commons (on 4 June, 15 July and 22 October) rejecting a succession of Opposition motions calling for an independent inquiry into the use of pre-war intelligence.

916. Mr Blair's initial response to growing criticism of the failure to find WMD was to counsel patience.

917. In Washington on 17 July, Mr Blair told the media that he believed "with every fibre of instinct and conviction" that he would be proved right about the threat from Iraqi WMD, but that it was important to wait for the ISG to complete its work.

918. In his Interim Report to Congress on 2 October, Dr Kay stated that the ISG had not found stocks of weapons. He judged that, although it was "far too early" to reach definitive conclusions, Saddam Hussein "had not given up his aspirations and intentions to continue to acquire weapons of mass destruction".

919. Despite finding that Saddam Hussein had breached Security Council resolutions and that he had intended to restart his WMD programmes as soon as he was able, the ISG Interim Report did not change the tone of the public debate.

920. After the publication of the ISG Interim Report, the Government's focus shifted from finding stockpiles of weapons to emphasising evidence of the Iraqi regime's strategic intent.

921. Mr Blair sought to redefine the public debate, shifting focus away from the failure to find WMD and concerns about the reliability of intelligence towards efforts to counter global proliferation and what he assessed to be the positive impact of military action in Iraq on those efforts.

922. On 5 October, in response to the failure to find "enough on WMD" and the deteriorating security situation in Iraq, Mr Blair outlined to President Bush a new strategy "to get us back on the high ground and get the public … to focus on the big picture". He concluded:

> "WMD/terror remains the 21st century threat. Our global agenda is the only way to a better future not just for us but for the world. We're not going soft on it. We're going to be utterly determined on it, because it's right."

923. In autumn 2003, the ISG faced increasing obstacles to its WMD investigations, caused mostly by the deteriorating security situation, including:

- constraints on ISG staff mobility;
- a reluctance among Iraqi experts to talk openly about Saddam Hussein's WMD programmes; and
- growing pressure from Washington to transfer resources from the search for WMD to counter-insurgency.

924. The diversion of resources from WMD to counter-insurgency was reported to have contributed to Dr Kay's decision in December to resign as Head of the ISG.

925. On 11 January 2004, in an interview with Sir David Frost, Mr Blair drew attention to emerging evidence from the ISG of "clandestine operations that should have been disclosed to the United Nations". Mr Blair still believed weapons would be found, but commented that "we just have to wait and see".

926. Points made in a Cabinet discussion on Iraq on 15 January included the observation that public opinion continued to focus on the absence of WMD, while the broader counter-proliferation story was inadequately covered.

927. Pressure for an independent inquiry in the UK continued to grow.

928. Secretary Powell's comment on 24 January that it was an "open question" whether Iraq held any stocks of WMD, widely reported in the UK media, caused the UK Government considerable difficulty.

929. The Government's response was to try to keep "in very close step" with the US. As late as 26 January, UK officials informed their US counterparts that the Government would continue to argue that, after the ISC, FAC and Hutton, there was no need for a further inquiry on intelligence.

930. Once President Bush made clear his decision to set up an independent inquiry, Mr Blair's resistance to a public inquiry became untenable.

931. By 29 January, the day after the publication of the Hutton Report, it was clear to Mr Blair that President Bush intended to set up an independent US inquiry into pre-conflict intelligence before he was forced to do so by Congress.

932. In his 'Note on WMD', sent to President Bush on 31 January, Mr Blair concluded that, if it proved necessary to accept that some of the intelligence on Iraqi WMD was wrong, it would be important not to "start pretending" that Iraq had nothing, or to allow inaccuracies in the intelligence to distract the UK and US from "confronting the WMD issue".

933. On 2 February, the same day as President Bush confirmed the imminent announcement of a "bipartisan independent commission", Mr Blair agreed to set up a committee of Privy Councillors with wider Terms of Reference than the ISC inquiry, looking at "intelligence on WMD in general, not just Iraq".

934. Mr Straw announced the creation of the Butler Review to Parliament on 3 February, three days before President Bush signed the Executive Order establishing the US Commission.

935. After the announcement of the Butler Review, the UK Government's focus shifted to the content of the next ISG report, the Status Report.

936. The Government, still concerned about the nature of the public debate on WMD in the UK, sought to ensure that the Status Report included existing ISG material highlighting the strategic intentions of Saddam Hussein's regime and breaches of Security Council resolutions.

937. Mr Duelfer began work on the ISG Status Report shortly after replacing Dr Kay as Head of the ISG on 23 January.

938. During his call on Mr Blair in London on 9 February, Mr Duelfer stated that it was his hypothesis that the regime's strategy had been to outlast UN sanctions. He did not believe that any judgements could be made until that was proven.

939. In his memoir, Mr Duelfer recorded that, at that meeting, Mr Blair had been "very well informed on the issue of WMD" and had given him the opportunity to go into the issue in more depth than had been possible with President Bush or Dr Rice. Mr Duelfer stated that Mr Blair had not made strong suggestions.

940. Sir Nigel Sheinwald reported to Mr Blair on 4 March that Mr Duelfer had made it clear that he would not accept "joint drafting" of his report. Sir Nigel had asked the FCO and SIS to press their US counterparts and said that he and Mr Blair and he should raise the issue with President Bush and Dr Rice.

941. Mr Scarlett sent Mr Duelfer "nuggets" from the September 2003 ISG Interim Report, including on strategic intent, explaining that they were not intended as drafting suggestions, but to identify existing ISG material worth highlighting. Many of Mr Scarlett's suggestions were incorporated into Mr Duelfer's testimony to Congress on 30 March.

942. Mr Duelfer's testimony received little publicity. Mr Blair was advised that, given the security situation in Iraq, it would be extremely difficult to get further coverage in anything other than negative terms.

943. Mr Blair remained concerned about continuing public and Parliamentary criticism of the pre-conflict intelligence, the failure to find WMD and the decision to invade Iraq. After the reports from the Hutton Inquiry, the ISG and the US Commission, he sought to demonstrate that, although "the exact basis for action was not as we thought", the invasion had still been justified.

944. Mr Blair told President Bush on 16 June that he remained "deeply concerned" about WMD. He expressed the wish that "if at all possible", the reports of the Senate Intelligence Committee, the Butler Review and the ISG "should have this issue dealt with and lanced all at the same time".

945. Mr Blair suggested to President Bush that the truth on Iraq's WMD was probably that Saddam Hussein:

> "… was developing long range ballistic missile capability in breach of UN resolutions; he probably had no or no large stockpiles of tactical CW or BW weapons; but he retained the capability and expertise to recommence production as soon as he could, again in breach of UN resolutions …
> "Such an explanation would mean that some of the intelligence upon which we acted was wrong; but that nonetheless the threat was there, as was the breach of UN resolutions. It would also explain why the picture was so confused and why, whilst the exact basis of action was not as we thought, the action was still justified."

946. Mr Blair suggested that it might make sense to publish the ISG Comprehensive Report at the same time as the Senate Intelligence Committee and Butler Reports to "provide the clear evidential basis for saying there was indeed a threat, even if it was not the threat that had been anticipated".

947. Immediately before and after the publication of the Senate Intelligence Committee and Butler Reports on 7 and 14 July respectively, Mr Blair restated his conviction that Iraq had posed a threat and that military action had been necessary to make progress in Libya and elsewhere.

948. On 6 July, Mr Blair told the Liaison Committee of the House of Commons that he had to accept that stockpiles of WMD "might not be found", but it was "absolutely clear" that Saddam Hussein had the "strategic capability, the intent" and that he had committed multiple breaches of UN sanctions.

949. Mr Blair said that he still believed that Saddam Hussein had posed a threat. Without military action against Iraq, there would not have been the progress there had been on Libya, AQ Khan, Iran and North Korea.

950. In his statement to the House of Commons after the publication of the Butler Report, Mr Blair said that Saddam Hussein "retained complete strategic intent on WMD and significant capability".

951. In July, Mr Blair told President Bush that the forthcoming ISG Comprehensive Report could be a powerful argument in support of the war.

952. Sir Nigel Sheinwald set out Mr Blair's views on handling to Dr Rice on 4 October: that the failure to find stockpiles of WMD should be presented as "yesterday's story" and the media encouraged to focus on new material about strategic intent, concealment and sanctions busting.

953. Mr Blair told President Bush on 5 October that the ISG Comprehensive Report "showed that Saddam Hussein had a clear strategic intent to develop WMD" and that "terrorists had chosen to make Iraq the battleground".

954. The ISG Comprehensive Report was published on 6 October. It stated that it had been Saddam Hussein's strategic intent to "end sanctions while preserving the capability to reconstitute his weapons of mass destruction (WMD) when sanctions were lifted", and that in seeking to preserve that capability his regime had breached UN sanctions.

955. Addressing the state of Iraq's WMD programmes in the years between the 1991 Gulf Conflict and the 2003 invasion of Iraq, the Report concluded that:

- Iraq's WMD capability had mostly been destroyed in 1991.
- There were "no credible indications" that Iraq had resumed production of chemical munitions after 1991.
- There was "no direct evidence" that, after 1996, Saddam Hussein had plans for a new BW programme or was conducting BW-specific work for military purposes.
- Iraq's ability to reconstitute a nuclear weapons programme had "progressively decayed" after 1991.
- The 1991 Gulf War and subsequent UN resolutions and inspections had brought many of Iraq's delivery programmes to a halt, but because the UN had permitted development and possession of delivery systems with a range of up to 150km, Iraq was "positioned … for a potential breakout capability".

956. Mr Blair told the House of Commons on 13 October that:

> "Those people who want to pray in aid the Iraq Survey Group in respect of stockpiles of weapons must also accept the other part of what the Iraq Survey Group said, which is that Saddam retained the intent and the capability – the teams of scientists and so on – and was in breach of United Nations resolutions. That is what Mr Duelfer expressly said. It was the breach of UN resolutions and their enforcement that was and is the reason for going to war."

957. The ISG's findings were significant, but did not support past statements by the UK and US Governments, which had focused on Iraq's current capabilities and an urgent and growing threat.

958. The explanation for military action put forward by Mr Blair in October 2004 was not the one given before the conflict.

Introduction and key findings

1. This section describes:

- how advice was sought from Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, regarding the interpretation of UN Security Council resolution 1441 (2002) and the manner in which that advice was provided;
- the events and other influences that affected the timing of the advice;
- the written advice provided by Lord Goldsmith in January 2003;
- Lord Goldsmith's discussions with Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, in January 2003, his exchanges with Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, in early February, and his meeting with US lawyers in February 2003;
- Lord Goldsmith's written advice of 7 March 2003;
- the legal basis on which the UK ultimately decided to participate in military action against Iraq; and
- the presentation of the Government's legal position to Cabinet and to Parliament on 17 March 2003.

2. Finally, this section sets out the Inquiry's conclusions regarding these events and the legal basis on which the UK decided to participate in military action against Iraq.

Key findings

- On 9 December, formal "instructions" to provide advice were sent to Lord Goldsmith. They were sent by the FCO on behalf of the FCO and the MOD as well as No.10. The instructions made clear that Lord Goldsmith should not provide an immediate response.
- Until 27 February, No.10 could not have been sure that Lord Goldsmith would advise that there was a basis on which military action against Iraq could be taken in the absence of a further decision of the Security Council.
- Lord Goldsmith's formal advice of 7 March set out alternative interpretations of the legal effect of resolution 1441. While Lord Goldsmith remained "of the opinion that the safest legal course would be to secure a second resolution", he concluded (paragraph 28) that "a reasonable case can be made that resolution 1441 was capable of reviving the authorisation in resolution 678 without a further resolution".
- Lord Goldsmith wrote that a reasonable case did not mean that if the matter ever came to court, he would be confident that the court would agree with this view. He judged a court might well conclude that OPs 4 and 12 required a further Security Council decision in order to revive the authorisation in resolution 678.
- At a meeting on 11 March, there was concern that the advice did not offer a clear indication that military action would be lawful. Lord Goldsmith was asked, after the meeting, by Admiral Boyce on behalf of the Armed Forces, and by the Treasury Solicitor, Ms Juliet Wheldon, in respect of the Civil Service, to give a clear-cut answer on whether military action would be lawful rather than unlawful.

- Lord Goldsmith concluded on 13 March that, on balance, the "better view" was that the conditions for the operation of the revival argument were met in this case, meaning that there was a lawful basis for the use of force without a further resolution beyond resolution 1441.
- Mr Brummell wrote to Mr Rycroft on 14 March:

  "It is an essential part of the legal basis for military action without a further resolution of the Security Council that there is strong evidence that Iraq has failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of resolution 1441 and has thus failed to take the final opportunity offered by the Security Council in that resolution. The Attorney General understands that it is unequivocally the Prime Minister's view that Iraq has committed further material breaches as specified in [operative] paragraph 4 of resolution 1441, but as this is a judgment for the Prime Minister, the Attorney would be grateful for confirmation that this is the case."

- Mr Rycroft replied to Mr Brummell on 15 March:

  "This is to confirm that it is indeed the Prime Minister's unequivocal view that Iraq is in further material breach of its obligations, as in OP4 [operative paragraph 4] of UNSCR 1441, because of 'false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq pursuant to this resolution and failure to comply with, and co-operate fully in the interpretation of, this resolution'."

- Senior Ministers should have considered the question posed in Mr Brummell's letter of 14 March, either in the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee or a "War Cabinet", on the basis of formal advice. Such a Committee should then have reported its conclusions to Cabinet before its Members were asked to endorse the Government's policy.
- Cabinet was provided with the text of Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer to Baroness Ramsey setting out the legal basis for military action.
- That document represented a statement of the Government's legal position – it did not explain the legal basis of the conclusion that Iraq had failed to take "the final opportunity" to comply with its disarmament obligations offered by resolution 1441.
- Cabinet was not provided with written advice which set out, as the advice of 7 March had done, the conflicting arguments regarding the legal effect of resolution 1441 and whether, in particular, it authorised military action without a further resolution of the Security Council.
- The advice should have been provided to Ministers and senior officials whose responsibilities were directly engaged and should have been made available to Cabinet.

UNSCR 1441

3. On 8 November the United Nations Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1441 (2002).

4. Section 3.5 includes:

- a description of the negotiation of the resolution;

- details of the legal advice offered by FCO Legal Advisers and by Lord Goldsmith during the course of those negotiations; and
- the provisions of the resolution and the statements made by Members of the Security Council on adoption.

Discussion, debate and advice, November to December 2002

Lord Goldsmith's conversations with Mr Powell and Mr Straw, November 2002

5. After resolution 1441 was adopted, Lord Goldsmith warned both No.10 and Mr Straw that he was "not optimistic" about the legal position for military action in response to an Iraqi breach without a second Security Council resolution. He offered to provide immediate advice.

6. Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, assured Lord Goldsmith that his views were known in No.10. The issue would be for consideration in the longer term in the event of a report to the Security Council of a serious breach. He suggested a meeting "some time before Christmas".

7. Lord Goldsmith telephoned Mr Powell on Monday, 11 November and conveyed his congratulations to No.10 for having secured such a tough resolution.[1] Lord Goldsmith "mentioned the possibility of Iraq finding itself in breach of resolution 1441 at some future stage but with no second Security Council resolution"; a "matter to which he had said he would give further consideration" following his meeting with Mr Blair on 22 October.

8. Lord Goldsmith also mentioned the "Chinese whispers" that had "come to his attention … which suggested that he took an optimistic view of the legal position that would obtain if such a situation arose". The "true position was that he was not at all optimistic".

9. Lord Goldsmith suggested that "against this background, it was desirable for him to provide advice on this issue now".

10. Mr Powell noted what Lord Goldsmith said, "but was at pains" to assure him that "No.10 were under no illusion as to the Attorney's views" on that point. Mr Powell thought that as "it was most unlikely that Iraq would not in the first instance accept resolution 1441, this was an issue for consideration in the longer term, in the event that at some stage in the future we are faced with a breach by Iraq of resolution 1441 and the matter is referred to the Security Council at that time".

11. Mr Powell proposed a meeting some time before Christmas to discuss the issue.

[1] Minute Brummell, 11 November 2002, 'Iraq: Note of telephone conversation between the Attorney General and Jonathan Powell – Monday, 11 November 2002'.

12. Lord Goldsmith told Mr Powell that, in the meantime, he would obtain and consider the statements made by members of the Security Council when resolution 1441 was adopted.

13. Asked whether he recollected Lord Goldsmith wishing to provide written advice and being discouraged from doing so, Mr Powell told the Inquiry:

> "No, he gave written advice – I don't know if you would call it written advice, he expressed his opinions …"
> "On a number of occasions before 1441 and after 1441, he set out his views in writing on it, yes."[2]

14. Lord Goldsmith told Mr Straw that the key question would be whether Iraq's non-compliance amounted to a material breach and who was to make that determination.

15. Lord Goldsmith's initial view was that, notwithstanding the deliberate ambiguity in the language of resolution 1441, the question of whether or not there was a serious breach was for the Security Council alone to answer.

16. Lord Goldsmith suggested that it would be desirable for him to provide advice on the position if, at some point in the future, Iraq "found itself" in material breach of resolution 1441 but the Security Council had not adopted a further resolution.

17. Mr Straw agreed that formal "instructions" should be prepared asking for Lord Goldsmith's advice.

18. Mr Straw telephoned Lord Goldsmith on 12 November, suggesting that resolution 1441 "made life easier" for the Government.[3]

19. Lord Goldsmith agreed that it was an excellent achievement but added that he would "need to study the resolution, together with the report of the debate and the statements made".

20. In relation to "the possibility of Iraq finding itself in breach of resolution 1441 at some future stage" but without a second resolution, Lord Goldsmith reported that he had told Mr Powell that he was "pessimistic as to whether there would be a sound legal basis … for the use of force". Mr Powell had suggested a meeting before Christmas to discuss the issues. Lord Goldsmith "indicated" to Mr Straw that "he would propose to give a more definitive view … at that stage".

[3] Minute Brummell, 12 November 2002, 'Iraq: Note of telephone conversation between the Foreign Secretary and the Attorney General'.

21. Mr Straw shared Mr Powell's view that it was unlikely that Iraq would refuse to accept resolution 1441. He suggested two particular issues warranted further consideration:

- First, both France and Russia had insisted that, in the event of an Iraqi breach, the matter should be referred back to the Security Council for further consideration before a decision on military action. The "UK's current understanding was that it was unlikely that, if it came to a vote, there would be any veto by France … If there were to be any veto … this was likely to be only by Russia."
- Secondly, Mr Straw would be "interested" in Lord Goldsmith's views on "the effect of a resolution being adopted by the House of Commons … following the contemplated debate on Iraq". Mr Straw identified two options: a resolution endorsing 1441 and one including "an acknowledgement that there would inevitably be military action if peaceful resolution of the issue were not possible". His preference was for the former.

22. Lord Goldsmith's initial view was that, leaving aside the political advantages, a resolution of the House of Commons:

> "… would not have any bearing on the position in international law as regards the lawfulness of using force against Iraq. It might be that a case could be constructed seeking to justify such action, if a number of other Parliaments in … countries who are members of the Security Council were also to adopt such a resolution. But he thought that … would be a rather subtle and speculative argument."

23. Mr Straw thought that military action was some way further down the track but, "if Iraq were to be found in breach" of resolution 1441, it would be "essential … we act pretty swiftly to take military action". One of the reasons "was that there might well be a need for less military force if action was swift".

24. Lord Goldsmith "commented that, from the point of view of legality, the key question would be whether Iraq's non-compliance with resolution 1441 amounted to a material breach and who was to make this determination".

25. Mr Straw "pointed out that it was clear to him that the US – despite its bellicose rhetoric – would not wish to go to war for nothing".

26. Mr Straw "mentioned that, reading resolution 1441 again as a layman, it was pretty clear that the Security Council were basically telling Iraq – 'Comply or else'." In response to Lord Goldsmith's observation that "the question was who was to decide the 'or else'", Mr Straw pointed out that resolution 1441 could have:

> "… said in terms that it was for the Security Council to decide whether there was a material breach and what action would then ensue. However … [it] did not … France and Russia had accepted the US/UK argument that this should be left open and that, while it was preferable, it was not essential for the Security Council to adopt a second resolution."

27. Lord Goldsmith told Mr Straw it "seemed implicit" in resolution 1441 that, in the event of non-compliance, "it would be for the Security Council to decide whether Iraq" was in "material breach".

28. Mr Straw suggested that "the reality was that members of the Security Council had had to agree and 'coalesce' around a particular form of words … to the effect that, if there were to be a breach, it would be for the Security Council to meet to discuss and consider what should be done". That "allowed for 'a range of possibilities', including:

- "the possibility that there would have to be a second resolution; and
- "the possibility that there might be a general consensus or desire [amongst the five Permanent Members of the Security Council] for military action, but a preference (in particular by Russia) that there should be no second resolution …"

29. Mr Straw again suggested that:

"… it was necessary to look at the negotiating background. For example … [President] Jaques Chirac had originally insisted on there being a 'lock' against the use of force unless this had been authorised by the Security Council by a second resolution. But this … did not appear in the resolution … [W]hat France and Russia were virtually saying was that they understood that there might well be a breach, but while they would in fact support the need for military action, they would not be able to support a resolution in terms authorising the use of force."

30. Lord Goldsmith responded that:

"… the position remained that only the Security Council could decide on whether there had been a material breach (and whether the breach was such as to undermine the conditions underpinning the cease-fire) and/or whether all necessary means were authorised. The question of whether there was a serious breach or not was for the Security Council alone. It was not possible to say that the unreasonable exercise of the veto by a particular member of the Security Council would be ineffectual …"

31. Mr Straw "said that there would be a danger in going for a second resolution" because, "if it were not obtained, then we would be in a worse position". He "wondered if there was any alternative option" between a general discussion in the Security Council and the adoption of a resolution determining a material breach.

32. Lord Goldsmith said that it "could be possible for a valid determination to be made by means of a Presidential Statement".

33. Mr Straw and Lord Goldsmith agreed that the "different options should be explored":

> "Mr Straw … would arrange for all the details of the negotiating history … to be sent to the Attorney General, so that the Attorney could consider further the legal position in the event that Iraq were (as expected) sooner or later to fail to comply with resolution 1441 and there were to be no second resolution."

34. On timing, Mr Straw "thought the crunch point" would come soon after 8 December, the deadline for Iraq to make its declaration on its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programmes. There was a "high likelihood/probability that Iraq would produce only a 'partial declaration', with the likelihood that soon after … a report of Iraq's inadequate/incomplete/inaccurate declaration would be made to the Security Council (pursuant to OP [operative paragraph] 4)".

35. Asked about the conversations with Mr Powell and Mr Straw on 11 and 12 November 2002, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "There is … I see this quite a lot in government … also the problem that sometimes the qualifications to what you have said don't seem to be heard as clearly as you intended them to be. I have heard the expression about the 'yes, but' and the 'but' is forgotten, in another context … [S]ometimes, therefore, you have to shout the 'but' rather harder than you would normally, to make sure it is not forgotten."[4]

36. Asked whether the Chinese whispers came from No.10, Lord Goldsmith replied:

> "Wherever the 'Chinese whispers' had been coming from, what mattered was their view, and each time I did say, 'I want this to be understood', the response I always got was, 'Yes, that is understood', and sometimes afterwards you wondered if that's the way everyone was acting."[5]

37. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that the conversation with Mr Straw on 12 November was the point when it was agreed that he would receive a formal request for advice:

> "I think there was an important moment after [resolution] 1441 when I had a conversation with Mr Straw and I hadn't at that stage received what I would call instructions."[6]

38. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that barristers work by receiving "instructions"; that is, a request to advise, including the detail of the question and the supporting materials, often with the instructing solicitor's views expressed. He said:

> "… until I had had that, particularly the Foreign Office Legal Adviser's point of view, and been able to analyse that, I wasn't really in a position to give a definitive point of view … So I think there then came this moment when it was agreed that I would receive this request for advice and that finally came at some stage in December. Until that had arrived, I couldn't actually start to form a definitive view anyway."[7]

39. The letter of instructions for Lord Goldsmith was not sent until 9 December and did not include the point of view of Mr Michael Wood, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) Legal Adviser.

Cabinet, 14 November 2002

40. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 14 November that, while the Security Council would need to be reconvened to discuss any breach in the event of Iraqi non-compliance, the key aspect of resolution 1441 was that military action could be taken without a further resolution.

41. That statement reflected the position Mr Straw had taken in his discussion with Lord Goldsmith on 12 November, but it did not fully reflect the advice Mr Straw had been given by the Mr Wood on 6 November or the concerns Lord Goldsmith had expressed on 12 November.

42. The advice given by Mr Wood is described in Section 3.5.

43. In the discussion of Iraq and the adoption of resolution 1441 in Cabinet on 14 November, Mr Straw stated that a "key aspect of the resolution was that there was no requirement for a second resolution before action was taken against Iraq in the event of its non-compliance, although reconvening the Security Council to discuss any breach was clearly stated".[8]

44. Lord Goldsmith was not present at that Cabinet meeting.

"Material breach" and the need for advice

45. Concerns about the differences between the UK and the US on what would constitute a material breach, the US stance of "zero tolerance" and the debate in the US on "triggers" for military action were already emerging.

46. Mr Blair and Mr Straw, and their most senior officials, were clearly aware that difficult and controversial questions had yet to be resolved in relation to:

- what would constitute a further material breach and how and by whom that would be determined;
- the issue of whether a further resolution would be needed to authorise force; and
- the implications of a veto.

[7] Public hearing, 27 January 2010, pages 55-56.
[8] Cabinet Conclusions, 14 November 2002.

47. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, did not regard the position that "we would know a material breach when we see it" as a suitable basis for planning. Mr Hoon's view was that agreement with the US on what constituted a trigger for military action was needed quickly.

48. The papers produced before Mr Straw's meeting held in his Private Office on 20 November recognised that Lord Goldsmith's advice would be needed to clarify those issues; and that it would be useful to seek Lord Goldsmith's advice sooner rather than later.

49. There is, however, no evidence of a discussion about the right timing for seeking Lord Goldsmith's views.

50. A debate on what might constitute a material breach and what actions by Iraq might trigger a military response had begun in the US before the adoption of resolution 1441.

The concept of "material breach"

The concept of "material breach" is central to the revival argument.

Material breach is a term derived from Article 60 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969. In that context a material breach is said to consist in a repudiation of the treaty or a violation of a provision essential to the accomplishment of the object or purpose of the treaty.

A material breach of a bilateral treaty by one of the parties entitles the other to invoke the breach as a ground for terminating the treaty or suspending its operation in whole or in part.

A material breach of a multilateral treaty by one of the parties entitles the other parties by unanimous agreement to suspend the operation of the treaty in whole or in part, or to terminate it either in relations between themselves and the defaulting State or entirely.

Resolution 707 (1991) was the first resolution in relation to Iraq to use the formulation, condemning:

> "Iraq's serious violation of a number of its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) and of its undertakings to cooperate with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency, which constitutes a material breach of the relevant provisions of that resolution 687 which established a cease-fire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region."

51. On 7 November, reporting conversations with senior officials in the US Administration, Mr Tony Brenton, Deputy Head of Mission at the British Embassy Washington, said that the hawks in Washington saw the resolution as a defeat and warned that they would be "looking for the least breach of its terms as a justification for resuming the countdown to war".[9]

[9] Minute Brenton to Gooderham, 7 November 2002, 'Iraq'.

52. Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), subsequently spoke to Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, on 15 November.[10] Sir David stated that the UK and the US should not be drawn on "hypothetical scenarios" about what would constitute a material breach. Reflecting Mr Blair's words to President Bush at Camp David on 7 September that, "If Saddam Hussein was obviously in breach we would know", Sir David added that "the Security Council would know a material breach when it saw it". He reported that the US Administration would continue to insist on "zero tolerance" to keep up the pressure on Saddam Hussein.

53. A paper on what might constitute a material breach, which highlighted "a number of difficult questions … on which we will need to consult the Attorney General", was prepared by the FCO and sent to Sir David Manning (and to Sir Jeremy Greenstock on 15 November.[11]

54. The paper stated that "Most, if not all members of the Council will be inclined" to take the view that a "material breach" should be interpreted in the light of the Vienna Convention. Dr Hans Blix, the Executive Chairman of the UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), had "made it clear" that he would "be using a similar definition for the purposes of reporting under OP11". The paper stated that it was not for Dr Blix to determine what constituted a material breach, "but his decision (or not) to report to the Council and the terms in which he reports" would "be influential".

55. The FCO paper stated that the US was "becoming more and more inclined to interpret the 1441 definition downwards" and that: "Although, some weeks ago, NSC [National Security Council] indicated that they would not regard trivial omissions in Iraq's declaration (or minor problems encountered by the UNMOVIC) as triggers for the use of force, more recently DoD [Department of Defense] have indicated that they want to test Saddam early." It also drew attention to President Bush's remarks on 8 November, which it described as "zero tolerance" and his warning against "unproductive debates" about what would constitute an Iraqi violation.

56. An examination of past practice on seven separate occasions since 1991 showed that the Council had determined Iraq to be in material breach of its obligations where there seemed "to have been a conviction that an Iraqi act would seriously impede inspectors in the fulfilment of their mandate and therefore undermine an essential condition of the cease-fire".

[11] Letter Sinclair to Manning, 15 November 2002, 'Iraq: Material Breach' attaching Paper, 'Iraq: A Material Breach'.

57. Against that background, the FCO listed the following incidents as ones which the UK would consider to be material breaches:

- "Any incident sufficiently serious to demonstrate that Iraq had no real intention of complying", such as "an Iraqi decision to expel UNMOVIC, or to refuse access to a particular site, parts of a site or important information", "discovery by UNMOVIC/IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency] of a concealed weapons programme, or of a cache of WMD material not declared …"
- "Efforts to constrain UNMOVIC/IAEA's operations in significant ways contrary to the provisions of SCR 1441 (2002) … and other relevant resolutions. Systematic efforts to deter, obstruct or intimidate the interview process would need to be particularly carefully watched."
- "Systematic Iraqi harassment of inspectors … which jeopardised their ability to fulfil their duties …"
- Failure to accept resolution 1441.
- "A pattern of relatively minor Iraqi obstructions of UNMOVIC/IAEA."

58. On the last point, the FCO paper added:

> "We would not take the view that a short (hours) delay in giving UNMOVIC access to a site would constitute a material breach unless there was clear evidence that the Iraqis used such a delay to smuggle information out of a site or to coach potential witnesses. But repeated incidents of such obstruction, even without evidence of accompanying Iraqi deception, would cumulatively indicate that the Iraqis were not fully co-operating, and thus cast doubt upon whether UNMOVIC would ever be able to implement its mandate properly."

59. The FCO stated that a similar US list would "probably … be even tougher". "Given the opportunity" in the resolution for the US to make its own report to the Council, the UK needed "to be clear in our own minds where the dividing lines" were. The paper recommended that the UK would need to work out "where to draw our red lines" with the US; and that "in the interests of maintaining maximum Council support for use of force, we should try to persuade the Americans to focus on the more serious possible violations, or to establish a pattern of minor obstruction".

60. The FCO did not address the issue of whether a Council decision would be needed "to determine that Iraq's actions justify the serious consequences referred to in OP13 of 1441". That would be "a matter on which we will need the Attorney's views".

61. An undated, unsigned document, headed 'Background on material breach' and received in No.10 around 20 November 2002, raised the need to address three, primarily legal, issues:

- the need to clarify whether OP4 "must be construed" in the light of the Vienna Convention and past practice as that suggested "a much higher bar than the US";
- the need to seek Lord Goldsmith's advice "on how OPs 1 and 2 (and 13) and the declaration of material breach they contain – affect the legal situation of Iraq and our authority to use force"; and specifically whether it could be argued that "1441 itself (especially OPs 1, 2 and 13 taken together) contains a conditional authority to use force … which will be fully uncovered once that Council discussion has taken place"; and
- "What happens if a second resolution is vetoed?"[12]

62. The document appears to have drawn on the analysis in the FCO paper of 15 November.

63. On the second issue, the author wrote:

> "If this [the argument that 1441 contains a conditional authority to use force] has merit (and the most we can hope for in the absence of an express Chapter VII authorisation is a reasonable argument) it would be helpful to know that now. We would not have to impale ourselves and Ministers on the difficult point of what happens if the US/UK try and fail to get an express authorisation.
> "… we think London seriously needs to consider revising its thinking on 1441.
> "… from the point of view of OP4 the question is 'What does Iraq have to do to put itself beyond the protection of the law? At what point does its conduct amount to material breach?' Innocent until proved guilty.
> "But if you come at it through OPs 1 and 2 the question is 'When has Iraq blown its last chance? (regardless of whether OP4 is ever breached)'. Compliance with OP4 is strictly irrelevant: Iraq is guilty but released on a suspended sentence/parole. This seems to us to have huge presentational angles – as well as whatever legal deductions can be made. If we are not careful, we are in danger of losing the key advantage of the resolution and turning a provision which we thought of deleting as unnecessary into the main operational paragraph of the text …"

64. Someone in No.10 wrote: "Is this, tho' a hidden trigger? (We and the US denied that there was one in 1441.)"[13]

[13] Manuscript comment on Paper [unattributed and undated], 'Background on material breach'.

65. On what would happen in the event of a veto, the author of the document wrote that it was:

> "… probably too difficult [to say] at this stage – everything depends on the circs … But knowing the answer to the legal implications of 1441 … would either (i) leave us no worse off than we are – if the AG [Attorney General] thinks the argument doesn't run or (ii) radically improve the situation if the AG thinks we have a case."

66. Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, commented to Sir David Manning that the document was:

> "… helpful. Of course a S[ecurity] C[ouncil] discussion is needed if there is a material breach. But as the PM has said all along that discussion must be in the context of an understanding that action must follow."[14]

67. On 15 November, Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, sent Sir David Manning an update on military discussions with the US setting out the themes which had emerged.[15] Mr Watkins registered a number of concerns including:

> "Lack of clarity in US thinking about possible triggers for military action needs to be resolved quickly …"

68. Mr Watkins added:

> "To some extent, triggers are now under Saddam's control and so cannot be slotted into any firm timetable. Moreover, what constitutes a 'violation' and/or 'material breach' remains undefined: many in the US are reduced to saying 'we'll know when we see it', which is not a suitable base for planning."

69. Mr Hoon believed that the UK response should include working "quickly to reach an agreed US/UK view on triggers … well before we are confronted with it in practice".

70. A copy of the letter was sent to Mr Straw's Private Office.

71. Mr Straw held a Private Office meeting on 20 November to discuss Iraq policy with Sir Michael Jay, the FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Sir David Manning and Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director.[16]

72. Sir Jeremy told Mr Straw that he "believed we could get a second resolution provided the Americans did not go for material breach too early". The "facts to convince nine members of the Security Council" would be needed. He thought that the Council "would not … need much persuading".

73. Sir Jeremy proposed that "When the time came", the UK should put down a draft resolution and, "if we could show that we had done everything possible, then we would be in the best possible position if – in the end – there were no resolution".

74. Sir David suggested that France should be invited to co-sponsor the resolution. Mr Straw agreed.

75. Sir Jeremy advised that "the real strength" of resolution 1441 lay in its first two operative paragraphs: OP1 reaffirming Iraq's material breach up to the adoption of 1441, and OP2 suspending that material breach to give Iraq a final opportunity. Sir Jeremy stated that OP4 (and 11 and 12) were, therefore, not needed to reach the "serious consequences" in OP13. He was already using that argument in the Security Council and cautioned Mr Straw that focusing too much on OP4 brought a danger of weakening OPs 1 and 2.

76. Sir Michael Jay took a different view, advising that the UK could use all the OPs in resolution 1441. Mr Straw agreed that it would be a mistake to focus exclusively on OPs 1 and 2.

77. Given the reference to "London" and the content of Sir Jeremy's advice to Mr Straw in the Private office meeting on 20 November, the unsigned and undated document 'Background on material breach' was most probably produced in the UK Mission in New York.

House of Commons debate on Iraq, 25 November 2002

78. When the House of Commons debated Iraq on 25 November, it voted to "support" resolution 1441 and agreed that if the Government of Iraq failed "to comply fully" with its provisions, "the Security Council should meet in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance".

79. Mr Straw assured Parliament that a material breach would need to be serious.

80. Mr Straw's interpretation was consistent with the advice given to him by FCO Legal Advisers, and properly recognised the need for a material breach to be sufficiently serious to undermine the basis for the cease-fire in resolution 687 (1991).

81. But Mr Straw explicitly did not address the role of the Security Council in assessing whether any report of non-compliance or obstruction would amount to a material breach.

82. Mr Straw's reference to a judgement having "to be made against the real circumstances that arise" highlighted the problem created by the drafting of that clause in OP4 of resolution 1441.

83. As Lord Goldsmith's subsequent advice confirmed, whether a specific failure to comply with the requirements placed upon Iraq by the resolution would amount to a material breach would have to be judged in the particular circumstances of Iraq's response.

84. On 25 November, the House of Commons debated resolution 1441 (2002) and the Government motion:

> "That this House supports UNSCR 1441 as unanimously adopted by the UN Security Council; agrees that the Government of Iraq must comply fully with all provisions of the resolution; and agrees that, if it fails to do so, the Security Council should meet in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance."[17]

85. Mr Straw's draft opening statement was sent to No.10 for comment. Mr Powell questioned two points in the text:

- a statement that the UK would prefer a second resolution, which Mr Powell described as "not our position up to now"; and
- that we didn't "absolutely need one [a second resolution]", which Mr Powell commented would "force the Attorney General to break cover".[18]

86. Mr Blair commented that he did not "see this as such a problem".[19]

87. In his opening speech, Mr Straw set out the inspection process and the answers to four "key questions" which arose from the resolution:

- What constituted a material breach? Mr Straw referred to operative paragraph 4 of the resolution, but went on to say: "As with any definition of that type, it is never possible to give an exhaustive list of all the conceivable behaviours that it covers. That judgement has to be made against the real circumstances that arise, but I reassure the House that material breach means something significant: some behaviour or pattern of behaviour that is serious. Among such breaches could be action by the Government of Iraq seriously to obstruct or impede the inspectors, to intimidate witnesses, or a pattern of behaviour where any single action appears relatively minor but the actions as a whole add up to something deliberate and more significant: something that shows Iraq's intention not to comply."[20]
- Who would decide what happened if there was a material breach? Mr Straw argued that if a "material breach" was reported to the Security Council, "the decision on whether there had been a material breach will effectively have been made by the Iraqis … there will be no decision to be made. The Security Council will undoubtedly then act."

- Would there be a second Security Council resolution if military action proved necessary? Mr Straw stated: "the moment there is any evidence of a material breach … there will be a meeting of the Security Council at which it is … open for any member to move any resolution … Our preference is for a Security Council resolution, and I hope we would move it."
- If military action was necessary, would the House of Commons be able to vote on it and, if so, when? Mr Straw stated: "No decision on military action has yet been taken … and I fervently hope that none will be necessary … Any decision … to take military action will be put to the House as soon as possible after it has been taken … the Government have no difficulty about the idea of a substantive motion on military action … at the appropriate time … [I]f we can and if it is safe to do so, we will propose a resolution seeking the House's approval of decisions … before military action takes place."[21]

FCO advice, 6 December 2002

88. The FCO advised on 6 December that there was no agreement in the Security Council on precise criteria for what would constitute a material breach. Each case would need to be considered in the light of the circumstances.

89. The UK position remained that deficiencies in Iraq's declaration on its WMD programmes could not constitute a casus belli but if an "audit" by the inspectors subsequently discovered significant discrepancies in the declaration, that could constitute a material breach.

90. The FCO position was, increasingly, shifting from a single specific incident demonstrating a material breach, to the need to establish a pattern of non-co-operation over time demonstrating that Iraq had no intention of complying with its obligations.

91. In response to a request from Sir David Manning on 29 November, Mr Straw's office provided advice on handling the Iraqi declaration.[22] The FCO also provided a refined version of the advice in its letter to Sir David of 15 November about what might comprise a material breach.

92. That was further refined in a letter from Mr Straw's office on 6 December responding to Sir David's request for further advice on what would constitute a "trigger" for action.[23]

93. The FCO stated that a material breach could not "be a minor violation but must be a violation of a provision essential to achieving the object or purpose of the original

Gulf War [1991] cease-fire". That position had been reflected in Mr Straw's remarks in the House of Commons on 25 November. The FCO expected most members of the Security Council to take a similar view.

94. Consistent with the advice sent to Sir David on 15 and 29 November, the FCO wrote that there were two broad areas where Iraqi behaviour could amount to a material breach:

- Non-compliance with its disarmament obligations – if Iraq concealed WMD. Evidence might take the form of discovery of WMD material not included in the declaration or evidence which Iraq could not satisfactorily explain which clearly pointed to a concealed WMD programme (e.g. a yellowcake receipt).
- Non-co-operation with UNMOVIC/IAEA – if Iraq's behaviour demonstrated that it had no intention of co-operating fully with UNMOVIC in fulfilling its mandate under resolution 1441 (2002) or other relevant resolutions. Evidence might comprise a single incident such as denying access to a particular site, information or personnel. Evidence of coaching witnesses or smuggling information out of potential sites would be "pretty damming". Attempts to impede the removal and destruction of WMD or related material would potentially be a material breach.

95. The FCO view was that there would be no need for "a single specific instance". A "pattern of lower level incidents" could amount to a demonstration of non-co-operation sufficiently serious to constitute a material breach. Indications of concealment could include "a series of unanswered questions identified by UNMOVIC/IAEA which suggested a concealed WMD programme" or "failure … to demonstrate convincingly that the WMD material identified by UNSCOM [United Nations Special Commission] in 1998 had been destroyed and properly accounted for"; "Much would depend on the circumstances and whether the incidents demonstrated deliberate non-co-operation rather than inefficiency or confusion."

96. The FCO concluded that there were:

> "… bound to be grey areas over whether Iraqi failures are sufficiently serious to constitute a material breach. There is no agreement in the Council on the precise criteria. We would need in each case to look at the particular circumstances. Moreover, some incidents of non-compliance may be susceptible to remedial action by UNMOVIC/IAEA (e.g. by destroying weapons etc). In such cases, those seeking to trigger enforcement action would need to explain how such action would be necessary to enforce Iraqi compliance."

Obtaining Lord Goldsmith's opinion

Instructions for Lord Goldsmith to advise

97. On 9 December, after receipt of the Iraqi declaration, the FCO issued a formal request seeking Lord Goldsmith's advice on whether a further decision by the Security Council would be required before force could be used to secure Iraq's compliance with its disarmament obligations.

98. Mr Wood set out the "two broad views" on the interpretation of resolution 1441 and whether a further decision was required by the Security Council to authorise the use of force.

99. Mr Straw asked Mr Wood to make clear to Lord Goldsmith that his advice was not needed "now".

100. Several drafts of the instructions for Lord Goldsmith were prepared and circulated within the FCO.

101. Mr Wood sought the views of senior FCO officials on 21 November, including Sir Michael Jay and Mr Iain Macleod, the Legal Counsellor in the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York (UKMIS New York). He also wrote that he planned to give Mr Straw the opportunity to comment on the draft the following week.[24]

102. Ms Cathy Adams, Legal Counsellor to Lord Goldsmith between 2002 and 2005, informed Lord Goldsmith on 29 November that the letter from Mr Wood had "been in gestation for a couple of weeks now and I understand the original draft has been subject to extensive comments from UKMIS New York".[25]

103. Mr Stephen Pattison, Head of FCO UN Department, told the Inquiry that all those people involved in Mr Ricketts' core group saw the draft instructions, but very few officials commented from a sense that it was for the lawyers to sort out, and that officials should not give the impression of interfering.[26]

104. Sir Michael Wood told the Inquiry:

> "… I received extensive comments from UKMIS New York, conveyed to me by Iain Macleod and as I understood it, reflecting Sir Jeremy Greenstock's views. These essentially concerned the alternative arguments to which they attached importance, based in part on the negotiating history of the resolution. As I recall, I incorporated all or virtually all of UKMIS's suggestions into my letter …
> "I do not recall receiving comments on the draft from other quarters."[27]

105. Mr Wood's letter incorporating instructions for Lord Goldsmith was sent to Ms Adams on 9 December 2002, with a copy to Mr Martin Hemming, the MOD Legal Adviser.[28] It briefly described the provisions of resolution 1441, the history of the negotiation and adoption of resolution 1441 and subsequent developments, and the legal background.

106. Mr Wood wrote:

> "The main legal issue raised by the resolution … is whether a further decision by the Security Council would be required before force could lawfully be used to ensure Iraqi compliance with its disarmament obligations. (This question is often put in the form 'Is a second resolution required?', but a further decision by the Council could take other forms, in particular it could be a statement made on behalf of the Council or its members.)"

107. Describing resolution 1441 as a "consensus text" and stating that, "as is often the case, the drafting leaves something to be desired", Mr Wood wrote (paragraph 5 of his letter) that there were two broad views of the interpretation of resolution 1441:

- the first was that resolution 1441 "does not authorise the use of force or revive the Council's earlier authorisation; a further Council decision is needed for that"; and
- the second was that "taking account of previous Council practice, the negotiating history and the statements made on adoption", resolution 1441 "can be read as meaning that the Council has already conditionally authorised the use of force against Iraq; the conditions being (a) that Iraq fails to take the final opportunity if it has been offered and (b) that there is Council discussion (not necessarily a decision) under paragraph 12 of the resolution. If these conditions are met, the material breach is uncovered and (on the 'revival of authorisation' argument based on Security Council resolutions 678 (1990) and 687 (1991)) force can be taken to be authorised under SCR 1441."

The revival argument

The UK justification for the use of military force against Iraq in 1993 and in December 1998 (Operation Desert Fox) relied on the concept that the use of force authorised in resolution 678 (1990) could be "revived" by a Security Council determination that Iraq was in "material breach" of the cease-fire provisions in resolution 687 (1991).

Resolution 678, adopted on 29 November 1990, demanded:

> "… that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) [which required its immediate withdrawal from Kuwait] and all subsequent resolutions"; and
> "unless Iraq on or before 15 January 1991 fully" implemented those resolutions, authorised:

[28] Letter Wood to Adams, 9 December 2002, 'Iraq: Security Council Resolution 1441 (2002)'.

> "… Member States co-operating with the Government of Kuwait … to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area."

The resolution stated that the Security Council was "acting under Chapter VII of the Charter". Chapter VII is the only part of the United Nations Charter governing the use of force, and it does so in the context of: "Action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression."

After the suspension of hostilities at the end of February 1991, resolutions 686 and 687 of 1991 contained a number of demands which Iraq had to fulfil in relation to the cessation of hostilities and the commencement of reparations.

The obligations included provisions in relation to:

- the Iraq/Kuwait border;
- repatriation of Kuwaiti nationals and property, and the payment of compensation by Iraq;
- sanctions; and
- disarmament of WMD, and inspections.

It was expressly stated that the authority to use force in resolution 678 (1990) remained valid during the period required for Iraq to comply with those demands.

In resolution 707 of August 1991 the Security Council condemned Iraq's serious violations of its disarmament obligations as a "material breach" of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991), "which established a cease-fire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region".

In January 1993, two further serious incidents arose in relation to Iraq's implementation of resolution 687 (1991). This led to the adoption of two further Presidential Statements, on 8 and 11 January, which contained a direct warning of serious consequences.[29] Within days the US, UK and France carried out air and missile strikes on Iraq.

In August 1992, Dr Carl-August Fleischhauer, then the UN Legal Counsel, provided advice to the UN Secretary-General on the legal and procedural basis for the use of force against Iraq.[30]

The key elements of Dr. Fleischhauer's advice included:

- The authorisation to use all necessary means in resolution 678 (1990) was limited to the achievement of the objectives in that resolution - "to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area" - but was not limited in time; it was not addressed to a defined group of states except for "the vague notion of 'states cooperating with Kuwait'", and it was clear by the words "all necessary means" that it was understood to include the use of armed force.

[30] Zacklin R, The United Nations Secretariat And The Use of Force In A Unipolar World, Hersch Lauterpacht Memorial Lectures, University of Cambridge, 22 January 2008. The advice of the UN Legal Counsel can be sought by the Secretary-General, and by the organs of the UN, but not by the Member States, who rely on their own legal advisers. It is not determinative and does not bind Member States.

- Resolution 687 (1991) permitted the conclusion that once the Security Council was satisfied that Iraq had complied with all its obligations under the resolution, the authorisation to use force would lapse. But resolution 687 (1991) did not itself terminate that authorisation, expressly or by inference. That followed from the fact that the preambular paragraphs (PPs) of resolution 687 (1991) affirmed all the Security Council's previous resolutions on Iraq, including resolution 678 (1990).
- A cease-fire is by its nature a transitory measure but, during its duration, the cease-fire superseded the ability to implement the authorisation to use force. The promise contained in the cease-fire to cease hostilities under certain conditions created an international obligation, which, as long as those conditions pertained, excluded the recourse to armed force. Under general international law the obligation created could be terminated only if the conditions on which it had been established were violated. In other words, the authority to use force had been suspended, but not terminated. A sufficiently serious violation of Iraq's obligations under resolution 687 (1991) could withdraw the basis for the cease-fire and re-open the way to a renewed use of force. That possibility was not limited by the passage of time that had then elapsed.
- Authority to use force could be revived in circumstances where a two-part pre-condition was met: the Security Council should be in agreement that there was a violation of the obligations undertaken by Iraq; and the Security Council considered the violation sufficiently serious to destroy the basis of the cease-fire.
- Those findings need not be in the form of a resolution, but could be recorded in the form of a Presidential Statement. But the content must make clear that the Council considered that the violation of resolution 687 (1991) was such that all means deemed appropriate by Member States were justified in order to bring Iraq back into compliance with resolution 687 (1991). Under no circumstances should the assessment of that condition be left to individual Member States; since the original authorisation came from the Council, the return to it should also come from that source and not be left to the subjective evaluation made by individual Member States and their Governments.

In January 1993, two further serious incidents arose in relation to Iraq's implementation of resolution 687 (1991), which led to the adoption of two further Presidential Statements on 8 and 11 January.[31]

Unlike resolution 707 (1991) and the Presidential Statements in 1992, in which the warning of serious consequences had been conveyed in indirect language, the statements in 1993 contained a direct warning of serious consequences. Within days the US, UK and France carried out air and missile strikes on Iraq.

On 14 January 1993, in relation to military action on the previous day, the UN Secretary-General was reported as having said:

> "The raid yesterday, and the forces which carried out the raid, have received a mandate from the Security Council, according to resolution 678 and the cause of the raid was the violation by Iraq of resolution 687 concerning the cease-fire. So, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, I can say that this action was taken and conforms to the resolutions of the Security Council and conforms to the Charter of the United Nations."[32]

[32] Paper FCO, 17 March 2003, 'Iraq: Legal Basis for the Use of Force'.

In essence, the statement was an explicit acknowledgement that the authority to use force in resolution 678 (1990) had been "revived".

From June 1997, Iraq had begun to interfere with the activities of the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM), which had been established to monitor Iraq's WMD. Reports of Iraqi failures to comply with the obligations in resolution 687 (1991) were made by UNSCOM to the UN Security Council (see Section 2.2). Several resolutions were adopted and Presidential Statements were issued condemning Iraqi actions.

In March 1998, the Security Council adopted resolution 1154, stating that the Council was acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, and stressing the need for Iraq to comply with its obligations to provide access to UNSCOM in order to implement resolution 687 (1991). It stated that "any violation would have severest consequences for Iraq". That resolution did not, however, make a finding that Iraq was in breach of its obligations.

In October 1998, Dr Richard Butler, UNSCOM's Executive Chairman, reported to the Security Council that Iraq had suspended its co-operation; Iraq's decision to suspend co-operation made it "impossible for the Commission to implement its disarmament and monitoring rights and responsibilities".[33]

On 5 November, the Security Council adopted resolution 1205, condemning Iraq's decision to cease co-operation with UNSCOM as a "flagrant violation" of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions. In the final paragraph of the resolution the Security Council decided "in accordance with its primary responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security, to remain actively seized of the matter".

Diplomatic contact between the UN and Iraq continued, as did discussions within the Security Council, but on 16 December 1998, the US and UK launched air attacks against Iraq, Operation Desert Fox.

Mr John Morris (Attorney General from 1997 to 1999), supported by Lord Falconer (as Solicitor General), advised Mr Blair in November 1997:

> "Charles [Lord Falconer] and I remain of the view that, in the circumstances presently prevailing, an essential precondition of the renewed use of force to compel compliance with the cease-fire conditions is that the Security Council has, in whatever language – whether expressly or impliedly – stated that there has been a breach of the cease-fire conditions and that the Council considers the breach sufficiently grave to undermine the basis or effective operation of the cease-fire."[34]

108. Recognising that "final decisions" could "only be made in the light of circumstances at the time (including what transpires in the Council)", Mr Wood addressed the provisions of the resolution and the rules for their interpretation. As regards the latter, he wrote:

> "The rules for treaty interpretation set out in Articles 31 to 33 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties are a useful starting point, but these have to be applied in a way that takes into account the different nature of resolutions of the Security Council. The basic principle to be derived from the Vienna Convention is that a Security Council resolution is to be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning given to its terms in their context and in the light of its object and purpose."

The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties Articles 31-33

"ARTICLE 31: GENERAL RULE OF INTERPRETATION

1. A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.
2. The context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes:
   (a) any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty;
   (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty.
3. There shall be taken into account, together with the context:
   (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions;
   (b) any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation;
   (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties.
4. A special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the parties so intended.

"ARTICLE 32: SUPPLEMENTARY MEANS OF INTERPRETATION

Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of article 31, or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to article 31:

(a) leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure; or
(b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd.

> "ARTICLE 33: INTERPRETATION OF TREATIES AUTHENTICATED IN TWO OR MORE LANGUAGES
> When a treaty has been authenticated in two or more languages the text of each version is equally authoritative unless the parties to the treaty have agreed otherwise.
> The terms of each version are presumed to have the same meaning.
> If a difference in meaning should emerge, the meaning which best reconciles the texts, having regard to the objects of the treaty, shall be the meaning adopted."

109. Referring to a number of telegrams describing the formal and informal negotiation of the resolution, Mr Wood cautioned:

> "If the matter were ever brought to court, none of these records would be likely to be acceptable as travaux preparatoires[35] of the resolution, since they are not independent or agreed records, and the meetings themselves were behind closed doors."

110. Mr Wood set out the arguments relevant to the two broad views of the interpretation of resolution 1441. For the first, Mr Wood identified the considerations which suggested that, taken as a whole, the resolution meant that, in the event of non-compliance, the Council itself would decide what action was needed.

111. In relation to the second, Mr Wood wrote: "UKMIS New York are of the view that this argument is consistent with the negotiating history, and requires serious consideration". He set out four supporting points for the second view before identifying a number of "possible difficulties".

112. Mr Wood concluded: "Whichever line of argument is adopted" it would "still be necessary" to address what "type of Iraqi non-compliance" would be "of a magnitude which would undermine the cease-fire". He also re-stated the governing principles of necessity and proportionality for the use of force.

113. On receipt of Mr Wood's letter of 9 December, Ms Adams prepared advice for Lord Goldsmith, including a full set of background papers.[36]

114. Addressing the "two alternative views" on the legal effect of resolution 1441, Ms Adams wrote that, while Mr Wood did not "say so expressly", she understood Mr Wood believed the first view, that resolution 1441 "does not authorise the use of force expressly or revive the authorisation in resolution 678 (1990)", to be "the better analysis of the resolution".

115. Commenting on the way in which Mr Wood had addressed the "second view", that resolution 1441 had conditionally authorised the use of force, Ms Adams wrote: "I am not convinced that he puts the arguments in support of this view at their strongest."

116. Setting out an alternative analysis, Ms Adams wrote that "one thing is clearer following adoption" of resolution 1441:

> "… the existence of the 'revival argument' did not seem to be doubted within the Security Council. The whole basis of the negotiation … was that the words 'material breach' and 'serious consequences' were code for authorising the use of force. There is now therefore a much sounder basis for relying on the revival argument than previously.
> "… [T]he question of whether resolution 1441 alone satisfies the conditions for reviving the authorisation in resolution 678 without a further decision of the Council is far from clear from the text … It is therefore not easy to ascertain the intention of the Security Council."

117. Ms Adams continued:

> "What advice you give … may therefore depend on the view you take as to your role in advising on use of force issues. For example, you might give a different answer to the question: what is the better interpretation of resolution 1441? than to the question: can it reasonably be argued that resolution 1441 is capable of authorising the use of force without a further Council decision?
> "You have previously indicated that you are not entirely comfortable with advising that 'there is a respectable argument' that the use of force is lawful, given your quasi-judicial role in this area. Previous Law Officers have of course advised in these terms …"

118. Ms Adams concluded:

> "For my own part, I think that the first view is the better interpretation, but that the arguments in favour of the second view are probably as strong as the legal case for relying on the revival argument in December 1998 when the UK participated in Operation Desert Fox."

119. Ms Adams wrote that she understood the statement that Lord Goldsmith's advice was not "required now" reflected Mr Straw's views, and:

> "While it is certainly true that definitive advice could not be given at this stage on whether a further Council decision is required (because such advice would need to take account of all the circumstances at the time, including further discussions in the Council), there is no reason why advice could not be given now on whether resolution 1441 is capable in any circumstances of being interpreted as authorising the use of force without a further Security Council decision."

120. Ms Adams added:

"… I think a serious issue for consideration is whether, if you were to reach the view that resolution 1441 was under no circumstances capable of being interpreted as authorising force without a further Council decision … this should be relayed to the Foreign Office and No.10."

121. Observing that "the Foreign Secretary (and other Ministers) have gone beyond the neutral line suggested … stating that resolution 1441 does not 'necessarily' require a further Council decision", Ms Adams suggested that if Lord Goldsmith was "not minded" to give advice: "An alternative option … might be for me to reply to Michael [Wood]'s letter confirming that you do not propose to advise at this stage, but stressing the need for neutrality in HMG's public line for so long as you have not advised on the interpretation of the resolution."

122. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that the instructions set out both arguments "without expressing a view between them, although I think I knew what view Sir Michael took about it".[37]

123. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that he had asked Mr Wood to ensure Lord Goldsmith was given a balanced view.[38]

124. Mr Straw added that, if Sir Michael had thought there was only one view, that was "what he would have written" to Lord Goldsmith. Mr Straw stated that he:

"… had no input, as far as I recall – and we have been through the records – whatsoever in what he [Sir Michael] wrote to the Attorney General. Quite properly. I don't think I, so far as I recall, ever saw the letter until after it had been written, and that's entirely proper.

"If his view had been, 'There is no doubt we require a second resolution' … then that's what he should have written, but he didn't."[39]

125. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr Pattison wrote:

"With hindsight, the letter … probably steered [Lord Goldsmith] in a particular direction: although it set out competing interpretations of SCR 1441, it was loaded in favour of one."[40]

[40] Statement, January 2011, paragraph 35.

126. Sir Michael Wood disagreed with Mr Pattison's conclusion:

> "This is not so. I set out the arguments as fairly as I could, taking full account of extensive comments from UKMIS New York."[41]

127. Sir Michael wrote in his statement:

> "I was instructed … that the Foreign Secretary was content for me to send the letter provided I did not include in the letter a statement of my own view of the law; and provided that I made it clear in the letter that no advice was needed at present. I was not happy with these instructions …
> "There are broadly two ways for a departmental lawyer to consult the Attorney: by setting out the different possibilities, without expressing a view; or, and this is much more common and usually more helpful, by setting out the differing possibilities and giving a view. In the present case, I was instructed to do the former, though the Attorney was anyway well aware of my views."

128. In the final version of the "instructions" for Lord Goldsmith, Mr Wood wrote:

> "No advice is required now. Any decisions in the future would clearly need to take account of all the circumstances, including any further deliberation in the Security Council."[42]

129. In his statement for the Inquiry, Lord Goldsmith wrote that he had been told that it was the view of Mr Straw that the instructions of 9 December should make clear that no advice was needed at that time.[43]

130. The Inquiry sought the views of a number of witnesses about whether Lord Goldsmith's advice should have been available at an earlier stage.

131. In his statement to the Inquiry, Sir Michael Wood wrote that he did not agree with Mr Straw's view that advice was not needed until later:

> "While it may not have been essential to have advice at that time, it was in my view highly desirable … FCO Legal Advisers were in a very uncomfortable position … We were having to advise on whether SCR 1441 authorised the use of force without a further decision of the Security Council without the benefit of the Attorney's advice. It would have been possible for the Attorney to have given advice on the meaning of SCR 1441 soon after its adoption, since all the relevant considerations were then known, though that advice would no doubt have had to be kept under review in the light of developments."[44]

132. Sir Michael added that he had explained in a meeting with Lord Goldsmith "as late as January 2003" that his "position within the FCO was becoming very difficult" since he was still having to advise Mr Straw and others "without being able to refer to" Lord Goldsmith's advice, even though he was "aware of his [Lord Goldsmith's] thinking at that time".

133. Sir Michael told the Inquiry:

> "… it was certainly a problem for me within the Foreign Office, because I was having to react to public statements by Ministers, to prepare briefings for people, on the basis of my views, without having a definitive view from the Attorney, although I think I know what his thinking was at that time.
> "So I think it was a problem in terms of giving legal advice within the Foreign Office … in the broader sense … it was a problem for government as a whole, because they really needed advice, even if they didn't want it at that stage, in order to develop their policy in the weeks leading up to the failure to get the second resolution."[45]

134. Asked what he meant, Sir Michael added:

> "I think it was clear to me that the Attorney would give advice when he was asked for it, and there were various stages when he was not asked for it … [M]y impression was that there was a reluctance in some quarters to seek the Attorney's advice too early."[46]

135. Asked whether it would have helped if his advice had been provided earlier, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he did not think so. He said he had:

> "… been at pains, as you have seen, to try to make sure that those who were moulding the policy didn't have a misunderstanding about, at least, what my view might be and I had been involved …"[47]

136. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "My view was, if I thought it was necessary for a Minister to know, I would tell them, whether they wanted to hear it or not."

137. Asked if he had been involved at the right time in terms of policy development, Lord Goldsmith stated:

> "I don't know. I don't know what difference, if any, it would have made. My own view is that it is right that the Senior Legal Adviser, and all Legal Advisers, should be involved in the policy development, because that helps Ministers, once you understand what their objectives are, to reach a way of achieving those which is lawful …"[48]

138. Asked about whether the legal issues were folded into the developing policy questions, Lord Goldsmith replied:

"I think in the event that did happen. As you have heard, on two occasions I insisted on offering a view, even though it wasn't being asked for, to make sure the policy, as it were, took account of that."[49]

139. Ms Elizabeth Wilmshurst, a Deputy FCO Legal Adviser, identified a particular risk that arose from the lateness of the definitive advice:

"… on the process of obtaining the Law Officers' advice, it was clearly far from satisfactory, and it seemed to have been left right until the end, the request to him for his formal opinion, as if it was simply an impediment that had to be got over before the policy could be implemented, and perhaps a lesson to be learned is that, if the Law Officers' advice needs to be obtained, as it always does for the use of force issues, then it should be obtained before the deployment of substantial forces. For the Attorney to have advised that the conflict would have been unlawful without a second resolution would have been very difficult at that stage without handing Saddam Hussein a massive public relations advantage. It was extraordinary, frankly, to leave the request to him so late in the day."[50]

140. Asked if it would have been useful to have had the formal advice of the Attorney General during the period after resolution 1441 when the Armed Forces were preparing for military action, Mr Blair replied:

"No. I think what was important for him to do was to explain to us what his concerns were … Peter was quite rightly saying to us, 'These are my concerns. This is why I don't think 1441 in itself is enough'.

"… [W]e had begun military preparations even before we got the … 1441 resolution. We had to do that otherwise we would never have been in a position to take military action. But let me make it absolutely clear, if Peter in the end had said, 'This cannot be justified lawfully', we would have been unable to take action."[51]

141. Asked if he had any observations on the process by which Lord Goldsmith's advice had been obtained, Lord Turnbull, Cabinet Secretary between September 2002 and September 2005, said: "I can see that it would have been better if this had been done earlier, but the list of things for which that is true runs to many pages."[52]

Lord Goldsmith's meeting with No.10 officials, 19 December 2002

142. In a meeting held at his request with No.10 officials on 19 December, Lord Goldsmith was again told that he was not at that stage being asked for advice; and that the UK was pushing for a second resolution.

143. Lord Goldsmith was also told that, when he was asked for advice, it would be helpful if he were to discuss a draft with Mr Blair.

144. As requested by Lord Goldsmith, Ms Adams set up a meeting with Mr Powell.[53]

145. The meeting took place on 19 December.

146. A minute produced by Mr David Brummell, the Legal Secretary to the Law Officers from August 2000 to November 2004, stated that Sir David Manning and Baroness Sally Morgan, the No.10 Director of Political and Government Relations, were also present, as well as Mr Powell, and that the meeting's purpose was to provide Lord Goldsmith "with an update on developments and likely timings for any future action, rather than for the AG to provide specific legal advice".[54]

147. Mr Brummell recorded that Mr Powell had sketched out three "possible scenarios":

- "Saddam Hussein does something very stupid and the weapons inspectors find some WMD, which leads to a UN … resolution finding material breach and authorising the use of force."
- "The inspectors catch out Saddam Hussein in some way but the response of members of the Security Council is such that there is no second resolution."
- "… [T]he US become frustrated with the UN process and decide to take military action regardless, i.e. without UN support."

148. Mr Brummell wrote that Mr Powell had commented:

- "if the US and UK were to decide that military action was justified, the British Cabinet would be unanimous in their support";
- "There would be no question of the UK supporting military action" in the third scenario; and "it was unlikely that the US would proceed" in the "absence of UK support"; and
- military action could start as early as mid-February.

149. Mr Brummell reported that Sir David Manning had confirmed that the UK was pushing for a second resolution and he thought there was a "reasonably good prospect (i.e. a 50:50 or so chance)" of success. Iraq had also made the "mistake of alienating Russia" by cancelling an oil contract which "would change the political weather".

[54] Minute Brummell, 19 December 2002, 'Iraq: Note of Meeting at No. 10 Downing Street – 4.00 pm, 19 December 2002'.

150. Sir David had also confirmed that the "basic assumption" was that Dr Blix would report any evidence of breaches to the Security Council and:

> "The SC would then debate whether the reported breaches were serious or trivial. It would then be for the Security Council, in the light of that debate, to decide what action should be taken. It was noted that this would suggest that it was expected that the SC would have to express its view."

151. Mr Brummell recorded that Lord Goldsmith had agreed that the adoption of resolution 1441:

> "… which represented a 'complex compromise' had been a considerable achievement. He thought that a key question arose in relation to the interpretation of OP4 … What could the phrase 'for assessment' mean if it did not mean an assessment as to whether the breach was sufficiently material to justify resort to use of force?"

152. Mr Brummell also recorded that there would be "a full Cabinet discussion on Iraq some time in the middle of January, i.e. before the Security Council met at the end of January". It had been agreed that:

- Lord Goldsmith would be invited to attend Cabinet "for this purpose";
- it would be useful for him to speak to Sir Jeremy Greenstock "to get a fuller picture of the history of the negotiation of resolution 1441";
- Lord Goldsmith "was not being called on to give advice at this stage. But he would be giving further consideration to all these issues"; and
- it "might be helpful" if Lord Goldsmith "were to discuss a legal advice paper in draft with the Prime Minister".

153. There is no No.10 record of the meeting.

154. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he was concerned about what was meant by the expression "for assessment" in OP 4, which seemed "to be an essential issue".[55]

155. Lord Goldsmith said:

> "I wanted to understand principally what was meant by 'for assessment', and I also wanted to know what were the – what the answers to a number of other textual points that I raised as giving rise to questions about what was meant by 1441."[56]

---

[55] Public hearing, 27 January 2010, page 65.
[56] Public hearing, 27 January 2010, pages 65-66.

156. Asked if this request could have been channelled through Ms Adams to the Foreign Office Legal Advisers, Lord Goldsmith explained:

> "There are a number of ways it could have been done, and I'm not sure that the Foreign Office would have been able to deal ultimately with the US side, but it could have been."[57]

157. Lord Goldsmith said:

> "I wasn't expecting to discuss it with Jonathan Powell. That wasn't the point. I did want to discuss that with the Prime Minister, with the Foreign Secretary, who had been very closely involved in the negotiations, and this was a channel."[58]

158. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he wanted to have "from the client, you know, 'What do you say in relation to certain of these arguments?'"[59]

159. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he viewed Mr Blair as "ultimately" the client for his advice.[60]

160. Asked whether the client was, at that stage, "expressing a view on how soon" the advice would be required, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "I don't recall. Certainly there wasn't … any request at that stage for final advice, but given what I said about needing to understand certain further matters … it obviously wasn't going to be then and there."[61]

161. Asked whether the client was concerned that he should not "come in too soon" with his advice, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that that question would need to be put to Mr Blair; and that Mr Powell and his very close advisers knew what Mr Blair's mind was.[62]

162. Asked what indications he had been given about the timing of his replies, Lord Goldsmith stated:

> "I don't recall …
> "All I was saying was I wasn't actually in a position to provide my advice at that stage – because I hadn't completed my researches and my enquiries – and it was agreed that I would provide a draft advice which would be something that would then enable me to raise questions which were causing me concern, so I could understand what the response to them was."[63]

163. Lord Turnbull told the Inquiry that he, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), the diplomatic service and others were all clients for Lord Goldsmith's advice.[64] The characterisation of Mr Blair as the client was not "a very good description of the importance of this advice".

164. In his written statement, Lord Goldsmith cited his telephone call with Mr Powell on 11 November and the meeting on 19 December as occasions when he had been "discouraged from providing" his advice.[65]

165. Asked if he was aware that Lord Goldsmith felt he was being discouraged, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "I think it was more that we knew obviously when we came to the point of decision we were going to need formal advice. We knew also this was a very tricky and difficult question. It was important actually that he gave this advice. I think the only concern, and I am speaking from memory here; generating bits of paper the entire time on it, but, I mean, it was obviously important that he was involved."[66]

Lord Goldsmith's provisional view

Lord Goldsmith's draft advice of 14 January 2003

166. As agreed with Mr Powell on 19 December 2002, Lord Goldsmith handed his draft advice to Mr Blair on 14 January 2003.

167. The draft advice stated that a further decision by the Security Council would be required to revive the authorisation to use force contained in resolution 678 (1990) although that decision did not need to be in the form of a further resolution.

168. Lord Goldsmith saw no grounds for self-defence or humanitarian intervention providing the legal basis for military action in Iraq.

169. Lord Goldsmith's draft advice did not explicitly address the possibility, identified by the Law Officers in 1997, of other "exceptional circumstances" arising if the international community "as a whole" had accepted that Iraq had repudiated the cease-fire, but the Security Council was "unable to act".

170. The advice did, however, address both the precedent of Kosovo and the question of whether a veto exercised by a Permanent Member of the Security Council might be deemed to be unreasonable, stating that the Kosovo precedent did not apply in the prevailing circumstances of Iraq; and that there was no "room for arguing that a condition of reasonableness [could] be implied as a precondition for the exercise of a veto".

[66] Public hearing, 21 January 2011, page 59.

171. Ms Adams informed Lord Goldsmith on 10 January that a meeting with Mr Blair had been arranged, at No.10's request, for noon on 14 January. There would be a full Cabinet discussion on 16 January and arrangements were being made for Lord Goldsmith to attend.

172. Ms Adams told the Inquiry she had prepared a submission analysing the arguments as she saw them and including her own view, which was essentially the same as that of Mr Wood. Lord Goldsmith then made comments on it which she adopted to produce a draft advice.[67]

173. Lord Goldsmith's draft advice stated that it was "clear that resolution 1441" contained "no express authorisation by the Security Council for the use of force".[68]

174. The revival argument had been relied on by the UK in the past but it would:

> "… not be defensible if the Council has made it clear either that action short of the use of force should be taken to ensure compliance with the cease-fire or that it intends to decide subsequently what action is required …"[69]

175. Lord Goldsmith wrote that OP1 contained a finding that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations, but it was accepted that the effect of the "firebreak" in OP 2 was that resolution 1441 did not immediately revive the authorisation to use force in resolution 678. In his view:

> "The key question in relation to the interpretation of resolution 1441 is whether the terms of [operative] paragraph 12 … indicate that the Council has reserved to itself the power to decide on what further action is required to enforce the cease-fire in the event of a further material breach by Iraq.
> "… to answer this question, it is necessary to analyse the terms of resolution 1441 as a whole …"

176. In his analysis, Lord Goldsmith made the following observations:

- The references to resolution 678 (1990) and resolution 687 (1991) in preambular paragraphs 4, 5 and 10 of the resolution suggested "that the Council had the revival argument in mind" when it adopted the resolution.
- The reference to "material breach" in OP1 signified "a finding by the Council of a sufficiently serious breach of the cease-fire conditions to revive the authorisation in resolution 678".
- The "final opportunity" in OP2 implied that the Council had "determined that compliance with resolution 1441" was Iraq's "last chance before the cease-fire resolution will be enforced".

[69] Minute [Draft] [Goldsmith to Prime Minister], 14 January 2003, 'Iraq: Interpretation of Resolution 1441'.

- The first part of OP4, that false statements or omissions in the Iraqi declaration and failure to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of resolution 1441 would "constitute a further material breach", suggested that the Council had "determined that any failure by Iraq to comply with or co-operate in the implementation of the resolution will be a material breach".
- The later reference in OP4 to a requirement to report that breach "to the Council for assessment under paragraphs 11 and 12" raised the "key question" as to whether that was "merely a procedural requirement for a Council discussion (the stated US/UK position)" or whether it indicated "the need for a determination of some sort … that force was now justified".
- It appeared "to be accepted that only serious cases of non-compliance would constitute a material breach, on the basis that it would be difficult to justify the use of force in relation to a very minor infringement of the terms of the resolution".
- Mr Straw had told Parliament on 25 November that a material breach would need "as a whole to add up to something deliberate and more significant: something that shows Iraq's intention not to comply".
- If that was the case, "then any Iraqi misconduct must be assessed to determine whether it is sufficiently serious as to constitute a material breach".
- The question then was "who is to make that assessment".
- In the event of a reported breach, OP12 stated that the Council would "consider the situation and the need for compliance with all relevant resolutions in order to secure international peace and security".
- Proposals to amend OP12 "which would have made clear that a further decision was required were rejected".
- "The previous practice of the Council and statements made during the negotiation" of resolution 1441 demonstrated that the phrase "serious consequences" in OP13 was "accepted as indicating the use of force".

177. In the light of that examination, Lord Goldsmith identified two critical questions:

"(a) whether it would be legitimate to rely on the revival argument; and

(b) what are the conditions for revival."

178. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

- He considered "in relation to OP1" that "a finding of 'material breach'" constituted a "determination of a sufficiently serious breach of the terms of the cease-fire resolution [resolution 687] to revive the authorisation to use for[ce] in resolution 678".
- If OP4 had stopped after the words "breach of Iraq's obligations", there "would have been a good argument that the Security Council was authorising the use of force in advance if there was a failure by Iraq to comply and co-operate fully with the implementation of the resolution".

179. Considering the words "for assessment under paragraphs 11 and 12", which had been added at the end of OP4, Lord Goldsmith observed that they "must mean something". He wrote that it was "hard not to read these words as indicating that it is for the Council [to] assess if an Iraqi breach is sufficiently significant in light of all the circumstances".

180. Lord Goldsmith explained that "three principal factors" had led him to that conclusion:

- The words "for assessment" implied the "need for a substantive assessment". The view that OP12 required "merely a Council discussion … would reduce the Council's role to a procedural formality, so that even if the majority of the Council's members expressed themselves opposed to the use of force this would have no effect".
- It was "accepted that" OP4 did "not mean that every Iraqi breach would trigger the use of force, so someone must assess whether or not the breach is 'material'". It was "more consistent with the underlying basis of the revival argument" to interpret OP4 as meaning that it was "for the Council to carry out that assessment".
- He did not find the "contrary arguments concerning the meaning of 'for assessment' sufficiently convincing".

181. While Lord Goldsmith described the fact that French and Russian attempts to "make it plain" that a further breach would "only be 'material' when assessed as such by the Council" had not been accepted as the "strongest" point in favour of the view that a determination by the Council was not required, he cautioned:

> "But what matters principally in interpreting a resolution is what the text actually says, not the negotiation which preceded its adoption."

182. Lord Goldsmith added that he did "not find much difference" between the French proposals and the final text of the resolution.

183. Addressing the Explanations of Vote (EOVs) provided when resolution 1441 was adopted on 8 November 2002, Lord Goldsmith wrote that they "did not assist greatly in determining the correct interpretation of the text of OPs 4 and 12".

184. Lord Goldsmith concluded:

> "… my opinion is that resolution 1441 does not revive the authorisation to use of [sic] force contained in resolution 678 in the absence of a further decision of the Security Council. The difference between this view of the resolution and the approach which argues that no further decision is required is narrow, but key.

"The further decision need not be in the form of a further resolution. It is possible that following a discussion under OP12 of the resolution, the Council could make clear by other means, e.g. a Presidential statement, that it believes force is now justified to enforce the cease-fire."

185. Addressing the principle of proportionality, Lord Goldsmith emphasised that:

"Any force used pursuant to the authorisation in resolution 678:

- must have as its objective the enforcement of the terms of the cease-fire contained in resolution 687 (1990) [sic] and subsequent relevant resolutions;
- be limited to what is necessary to achieve that objective; and
- must be proportionate to that objective, i.e. securing compliance with Iraq's disarmament objectives.

"That is not to say that action may not be taken to remove Saddam Hussein from power if it can be shown that such action is necessary to secure the disarmament of Iraq and that it is a proportionate response to that objective. But regime change cannot be the objective of military action. This should be borne in mind in making public statements about any campaign."

186. As he had promised following the meeting on 22 October, when Mr Blair had asked about the consequences of a perverse or unreasonable veto "of a second resolution intended to authorise the use of force", Lord Goldsmith also addressed other legal bases for military action.

187. In her minute of 14 October 2002, Ms Adams had drawn Lord Goldsmith's attention to the Law Officers' advice to Mr Blair in 1997 which identified the possibility that there could be:

"… exceptional circumstances in which although the Council had not made a determination of material breach it was evident to and generally accepted by the international community as a whole that Iraq had in effect repudiated the cease-fire and that a resort to military force to deal with the consequences of Iraq's conduct was the only way to ensure compliance with the cease-fire conditions."[70]

188. Ms Adams added:

"I understand this passage was included in the advice to cover the sort of situation where the Council was unable to act. But of course the counter view would be that if the Council has rejected a resolution authorising the use of force, then under the scheme of the Charter, it cannot be said that force is legally justified."

[70] Minute Adams to Attorney General, 14 October 2002, 'Iraq: Meeting with David Manning, 14 October'.

189. In the "lines to take" provided for Lord Goldsmith's meeting with Mr Blair, Ms Adams wrote:

> "It is impossible to give a firm view on this now. We should certainly not plan on being able to rely on such a justification. There does not seem to [be] wide support for military action among the wider international community at present."[71]

190. In his draft advice of 14 January 2003, Lord Goldsmith wrote that:

> "In ruling out the use of force without a further decision of the Council, I am not saying that other circumstances may not arise in which the use of force may be justified on other legal grounds, eg if the conditions for self-defence or humanitarian intervention were met. However, at present, I have seen nothing to suggest there would be a legal justification on either of these bases."[72]

191. In relation to the "Kosovo Option", Lord Goldsmith wrote that the UK had been "able to take action … because there was an alternative legal base which could be relied on which did not depend on Council authorisation, namely intervention to avert an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe".

192. Lord Goldsmith did not, however, address whether any other "exceptional circumstances" could arise which might provide the basis for action against Iraq.

193. Lord Goldsmith also addressed the question of whether, in the event that, "following a flagrant violation by Iraq", one of the five Permanent Members (P5) of the Council "perversely or unreasonably vetoed [a] further Council decision intended to authorise the use of force", the Coalition would be justified in acting without Security Council authorisation.

194. Lord Goldsmith wrote that the scheme of the UN Charter clearly envisaged "the possibility of a P5 veto" and did "not provide that such vetoes may only be exercised on 'reasonable grounds'". In those circumstances, he did not believe that there was:

> "… room for arguing that a condition of reasonableness can be implied as a precondition for the lawful exercise of a veto. Thus, if one of the P5 were to veto a further Council decision pursuant to OPs 4 and 12 of resolution 1441, there would be no Council authorisation for military action."

[72] Minute [Draft] [Goldsmith to Prime Minister], 14 January 2003, 'Iraq: Interpretation of Resolution 1441'.

195. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he had handed the draft paper to Mr Blair and there was some discussion, but he did not think there had been a long discussion:

> "The one thing I do recall was that he [Mr Blair] said … 'I do understand that your advice is your advice'. In other words, the Prime Minister made it clear he accepted that it was for me to reach a judgement and that he had to accept that."[73]

196. No.10 did not seek Lord Goldsmith's further views about the legal basis for the use of force until the end of February, and he did not discuss the issues again with Mr Blair until 11 March.

No.10's reaction to Lord Goldsmith's advice

197. Mr Powell proposed that Sir Jeremy Greenstock should be asked to suggest alternatives to Lord Goldsmith.

198. Mr Blair's response to Mr Powell indicated that he himself was not confident that resolution 1441, of itself, provided a legal basis for the use of force. Mr Blair's response suggested a readiness to seek any ground on which Lord Goldsmith would be able to conclude that there was a legal basis for military action.

199. Given the consistent and unambiguous advice of the FCO Legal Advisers from March 2002 onwards and Lord Goldsmith's advice from 30 July 2002, that self-defence could not provide a basis for military action in Iraq, the Inquiry has seen nothing to support Mr Blair's idea that a self-defence argument might be "revived".

200. Lord Goldsmith's draft advice stated that:

> "It was proposed before Christmas that it would be worthwhile to discuss the negotiation of the resolution and particularly the genesis of the words 'for assessment' with Sir Jeremy Greenstock. It is not clear if and when he will be able to come to London for such a meeting."[74]

201. Mr Powell sent an undated note to Mr Blair advising: "We should get Jeremy Greenstock over to suggest alternatives to him."[75]

202. Mr Blair replied to Mr Powell:

> "We need to explore, especially (a) whether we c[oul]d revive the self-defence etc arguments or (b) whether the UNSCR [sic] c[oul]d have a discussion, no resolution authorising force but nonetheless the terms of the discussion and/or decision, make it plain there is a breach."[76]

[76] Note [handwritten] [Blair to Powell], [undated and untitled].

203. Asked whether his response to Mr Powell's manuscript note on Lord Goldsmith's draft advice of 14 January was mostly about Lord Goldsmith understanding the negotiating history, or whether he was keen to find an alternative that might persuade Lord Goldsmith that there was a basis for military action, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he thought it was "both".[77]

204. Mr Blair added that he thought Lord Goldsmith himself had suggested meeting Sir Jeremy:

> "So in a sense he had already raised that issue … I think I was simply casting about … I was saying 'Have a look at this point. Have a look at that', but the key thing was indeed that he was to speak to Jeremy."

205. Mr Brummell's record of Lord Goldsmith's meeting with No.10 officials on 19 December records only that it would be "useful" for Lord Goldsmith to "speak to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, to get a fuller picture of the history of the negotiation of resolution 1441".[78]

206. Despite Lord Goldsmith's draft advice, Mr Blair continued to say in public that he would not rule out military action if a further resolution in response to an Iraqi breach was vetoed.

207. He did so in his statement to Parliament on 15 January and when he gave evidence to the Liaison Committee on 21 January about taking action in the event of an "unreasonable veto".

208. These statements were at odds with the draft advice he had received and discussed with Lord Goldsmith.

209. During Prime Minister's Questions on 15 January, Mr Blair was asked a series of questions by the Leader of the Opposition, Mr Iain Duncan Smith.[79]

210. Asked whether the Government's position was that a second resolution was preferable or, as Ms Clare Short, the Development Secretary, had said, essential. Mr Blair replied:

> "… we want a UN resolution. I have set out continually, not least in the House on 18 December [2002], that in circumstances where there was a breach we went back to the UN and the spirit of the UN resolution was broken because an unreasonable veto was put down, we would not rule out action. That is the same position that everybody has expressed, and I think it is the right position. However … it is not merely preferable to have a second resolution. I believe that we will get one."

211. Mr Blair emphasised that the UN route had been chosen "very deliberately" because it was "important" that Saddam Hussein was "disarmed with the support of the international community". He hoped that the House would unite around the position that if the UN resolution was breached, "action must follow, because the UN mandate has to be upheld". The Government's position was that a "second UN resolution" was "preferable", but it had:

> "… also said that there are circumstances in which a UN resolution is not necessary, because it is necessary to be able to say in circumstances where an unreasonable veto is put down that we would still act."[80]

212. In his evidence to the Liaison Committee on 21 January, Mr Blair was asked about the impact of taking action without a second resolution.[81]

213. In his responses, Mr Blair emphasised a second resolution would be highly desirable, but argued that action should not be "unreasonably blocked".

- It would be "easier in every respect" if there was a second resolution, but there could not be "a situation where there is a material breach recognised by everybody and yet action is unreasonably blocked". Without that "qualification", the discussion in the Security Council was "not likely to be as productive as it should be".
- It would be "highly desirable" to have a second resolution.
- It would be "more difficult" to act without one, but if the inspectors said that they could not do their job properly or they made a finding that there were weapons of mass destruction, it would "be wrong" in the face of a veto "if we said 'Right, well there is nothing we can do, he can carry on and develop these weapons.' … We must not give a signal to Saddam that there is a way out of this … [It] is best done with the maximum international support but it will not be done at all if Saddam thinks there is any weakness …" That "would be disastrous".

214. Lord Goldsmith was asked by the Inquiry about the timing and substance of his advice to Mr Blair on the impact of a veto.[82]

215. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "… I do not think that there was any doubt about my view. I had been clear at the meeting with the Prime Minister on 22 October 2002, and I provided a written record of my view in David Brummell's letter of 23 October 2002. Although I said I would consider the issue further, the sense that I conveyed was that I would look at the issue again to see if anything changed my mind. To that end, I did have a discussion > with John Grainger [FCO Legal Counsellor] and Michael Wood on 5 November 2002 and asked for further information … but after this further consideration my view remained the same. If I had reached a different view, I am sure that I would have made this known, but I didn't. I decided therefore to wrap the issue up … in my draft advice of 14 January 2003."

216. Lord Goldsmith's meeting with Mr Blair on 22 October 2002 is described in Section 3.5.

217. Asked whether that advice was draft or definitive, Lord Goldsmith wrote: "In one sense the whole of the advice of 14 January 2003 was draft", but he "was clear" that, in relation to the exercise of a veto, "that must have been understood by the Prime Minister".

218. Asked whether that was clear to Mr Blair, Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "I believe so."

219. Asked whether Mr Blair's words that it was "necessary to be able to say in circumstances where an unreasonable veto is put down that we would still act", and Mr Blair's later comments[83] during a BBC Newsnight interview on 6 February, were compatible with his advice, Lord Goldsmith replied: "No."

220. Asked if he was aware of Mr Blair's statements at the time, and, if so, what he thought of them, and what action he had taken, Lord Goldsmith replied:

> "I became aware at some stage of the statements the Prime Minister made, though I cannot recall precisely when. I was uncomfortable about them, and I believe that I discussed my concerns with Jack Straw and my own staff, though I can find no record of a formal note of any such conversations. I understood entirely the need to make public statements which left Saddam Hussein in no doubt about our firmness of purpose. It was more likely that he would co-operate if he thought that there was a real likelihood of conflict. My concern was that we should not box ourselves in by the public statements that were made, and create a situation which might then have to be unravelled."[84]

221. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair:

- whether he considered that what he said on 15 January and 6 February was compatible with Lord Goldsmith's advice;
- whether he had received any other legal advice on the issue;
- whether his view that action could be taken was derived from the use of force without a UNSCR in relation to Kosovo; and

[83] "If the inspectors do report that they can't do their work properly because Iraq is not co-operating there's no doubt … that is a breach of the resolution. - given that the need to prevent an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe would not provide the basis for action in Iraq, the legal basis on which he thought the UK would act.[85]

222. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr Blair did not address the substance of Lord Goldsmith's advice that, in the event of a veto, there would be no Security Council authorisation for the use of force.[86] He wrote:

> "I never believed that action in Iraq could be on the same legal basis as Kosovo … So I never raised Kosovo as a direct precedent. However in Kosovo, we had had to accept we could not get a UN resolution even though we wanted one because Russia had made it clear it would wield a political veto. So we, not the UNSC, made the judgement that the humanitarian catastrophe was overwhelming.
> "… [I]f it were clear and accepted by a UNSC member that there was a breach of [resolution] 1441, but nonetheless they still vetoed, surely that must have some relevance as to whether a breach had occurred, and thus to revival of resolution 678 authorising force … I was not suggesting that we, subjectively and without more, could say: this is unreasonable, but that a veto in circumstances where [a] breach was accepted, surely could not override the consequences of such a breach set out in 1441 ie they could not make a bad faith assessment."

223. Mr Blair added:

> "I was aware … of Peter Goldsmith's advice on 14 January … but … I was also aware that he had not yet had the opportunity to speak to Sir Jeremy Greenstock or to the US counterparty.
> "I had not yet got to the stage of a formal request for advice and neither had he got to the point of formally giving it. So I was continuing to hold to the position that another resolution was not necessary. I knew that the language of 1441 had represented a political compromise. But I also knew it had to have a meaning and that meaning, in circumstances where lack of clarity was the outcome of a political negotiation, must depend on what was understood by the parties to the negotiation.
> "I knew that the US had been crystal clear and explicit throughout. This was the cardinal importance of not just including the phrase 'final opportunity' which to me meant 'last chance'; but also the designation in advance of a failure to comply fully and unconditionally, as a 'material breach' – words with a plain and legally defined meaning.
> "Peter's view at that time was, because of the word 'assessment' in OP4 of 1441, there should be a further decision. But I was aware that … had been precisely and openly rejected by the US and UK when negotiating the text. That is why his provisional advice was always going to be influenced by what was said and meant during the course of the negotiation of 1441. So I asked that he speak to Sir Jeremy Greenstock and later to the US."

224. Asked if he had understood that his answer in Parliament was inconsistent with the legal advice he had been given, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

"I was making basically a political point. However I accept entirely that there was an inconsistency between what he was saying and what I was saying … but I was saying it not … as a lawyer, but politically."[87]

225. Asked if he could really distinguish between making a political point and a legal point when presenting a legal interpretation to the House of Commons, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

"I understand that … I was trying to hold that line … I was less making a legal declaration … because I could not do that, but a political point, if there was a breach we had to be able to act … throughout this period of time … we were going for this second resolution. It was always going to be difficult to get it, but we thought we might …"[88]

226. Mr Blair added:

"I tried to choose my words carefully all the way through. In the two quotes you have, I chose them less carefully …"[89]

227. Mr Blair made similar points justifying the position he had taken in his discussion with President Bush on 31 January and his interview on the BBC Newsnight programme on 6 February.

Cabinet, 16 January 2003

228. As promised by Mr Blair on 19 December, Cabinet discussed Iraq on 16 January 2003.

229. Mr Blair told Cabinet that the strategy remained to pursue the UN course. The inspectors needed time to achieve results. If Iraq was not complying with the demands of the Security Council, a second resolution would be agreed.

230. Mr Straw stated that the UK should not rule out the possibility of military action without a second resolution. Mr Blair repeated that statement in his concluding remarks.

[89] Public hearing, 21 January 2011, page 75.

231. Mr Blair's decision to ask for Lord Goldsmith's draft advice and his invitation to Lord Goldsmith to attend Cabinet suggest that he intended the advice to inform discussion in Cabinet on 16 January.

232. But Mr Blair did not reveal that he had received Lord Goldsmith's draft advice which indicated that a further determination by the Security Council that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations would be required to authorise the revival of the authority to take military action in resolution 678.

233. As the Attorney General, Lord Goldsmith was the Government's Legal Adviser not just the Legal Adviser to Mr Blair.

234. There is no evidence that Mr Straw was aware of Lord Goldsmith's draft advice before Cabinet on 16 January, although he was aware of Lord Goldsmith's position.

235. There is no evidence that Lord Goldsmith had communicated his concerns to Mr Hoon or to any other member of Cabinet.

236. Mr Blair's decision not to invite Lord Goldsmith to speak meant that Cabinet Ministers, including those whose responsibilities were directly engaged, were not informed of the doubts expressed in Lord Goldsmith's draft advice about the legal basis of the UK's policy.

237. It may not have been appropriate for Lord Goldsmith to challenge the assertions made by Mr Blair and Mr Straw, which repeated their previous public statements, during Cabinet.

238. Notwithstanding the draft nature of his advice, it would have been advisable for Lord Goldsmith to have told Mr Straw and Mr Hoon of his concerns.

239. Lord Goldsmith could also have expressed his concerns subsequently in private. Other than his conversations with Mr Straw in early February, there is no evidence that he did so.

240. Ms Adams' brief for Lord Goldsmith for Cabinet on 16 January stated:

> "In the light of our discussion yesterday, if asked for your views on the interpretation of resolution 1441, you might say that:
> - "you have not given advice";
> - "you are waiting for further briefing from the FCO before finalising your views (alluding to the proposed Greenstock discussion)";
> - "it is therefore premature to express a view"; and

- "in any event, interpretation of resolution [1441] may be influenced by subsequent Council discussion following further Iraqi non-compliance".[90]

241. Lord Goldsmith's manuscript comments indicated that he had reservations about the first bullet point in Ms Adams' proposed "lines to take".[91]

242. At Cabinet on 16 January, Mr Blair said that:

> "… he wanted to make the United Nations route work. The inspectors were doing their job inside Iraq and he was optimistic that they would discover weapons of mass destruction and their associated programmes which had been concealed. They needed time to achieve results, including from better co-ordinated intelligence. If Iraq was not complying with the demands of the United Nations, he believed the … Security Council would pass a second resolution."[92]

243. Mr Blair told his colleagues that evidence from the inspectors would make a veto of a second resolution by other Permanent Members of the Security Council "less likely":

> "Meanwhile, British and American forces were being built up in the Gulf. If it came to conflict, it would be important for success to be achieved quickly. The [military] build up was having an effect on the Iraqi regime, with internal support dwindling for President Saddam Hussein … The strategy remained to pursue the United Nations course."

244. Mr Blair concluded by telling Cabinet that he would be meeting President Bush at the end of the month to discuss Iraq, after Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 27 January.

245. Mr Straw said:

> "… he was aware of anxieties about the possibility of having to diverge from the United Nations path. There was a good prospect of achieving a second resolution. Many had been doubtful about achieving the first resolution; in the event, the … Security Council vote had been unanimous. While sticking with the United Nations route we should not rule out the possibility of military action without a second resolution. Voting decisions in the Security Council could be driven by domestic politics, not the demands of the international situation."

246. Mr Straw added that:

> "In his recent contacts with the Muslim and Arab world, all could see the benefit of Saddam Hussein's demise. He had utterly rejected the notion that we were hostile to Islam … Saddam Hussein had attacked his own people and his neighbours – all of whom were Muslims."

247. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said:

"… the strategy based on the United Nations route was clear, although the uncertainties loomed large and there was a natural reluctance to go to war. It was to be expected that the public would want the inspectors to find the evidence before military action was taken. Pursuing the United Nations route was the right policy, but we should not rule out the possibility of military action without a second resolution. The priorities for the immediate future were:

- improved communications, which would set out the Government's strategy and be promoted by the whole Cabinet;
- preparatory work on planning the aftermath of any military action and the role of the United Nations in that, which should in turn be conveyed to the Iraqi people so that they had a vision of a better life in prospect; and
- contingency work on the unintended consequences which could arise from the Iraqi use of weapons of mass destruction, environmental catastrophe or internecine strife within Iraq."

Lord Goldsmith's meeting with Sir Jeremy Greenstock, 23 January 2003

248. Ms Adams sent Sir Jeremy Greenstock a copy of Lord Goldsmith's draft advice, stating that it indicated the view he had "provisionally formed regarding the interpretation of the resolution"; and that:

"The Attorney would welcome your comments on the view he has reached. In particular, he would be interested to know if you feel that there are any significant arguments which he has overlooked which would point to a different conclusion. The note has been passed by the Attorney to No.10, but has not been circulated more widely. I have been asked to stress that the note should not be copied further."[93]

249. In preparation for a meeting between Sir Jeremy and Mr Blair on 23 January to discuss negotiation of a second resolution and related issues, Mr Rycroft told Mr Blair that Sir Jeremy would explore Mr Blair's "ideas" with Lord Goldsmith later that day.[94]

250. There is no mention of the issues to be discussed with Lord Goldsmith in the No.10 record of the meeting with Sir Jeremy.[95]

251. Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote to Sir David Manning on 24 January with his perspective on the discussion with Lord Goldsmith.[96]

252. Sir Jeremy recorded that the "central issue" debated was whether the wording of OP4 "meant that the Council had something substantive to do in the second stage (viz determining that a breach was material and deciding on consequent action) before action could be taken on the further material breach; or whether further discussion/ consideration in the Council … sufficed".

253. Sir Jeremy said he had told Lord Goldsmith that:

- the negotiations had "settled the wording of OPs 11-13 before a draft OP4 was ever proposed";
- in that "tussle", the "French/Russians/ Chinese lost (their … EOVs were indicative in this respect) an explicit requirement for a new decision by the Council";
- France "wanted 'further material breach, when assessed', and accepted with difficulty the final wording. This suggested they saw the difference between the two";
- the US had come to the UN "to give the Security Council a further opportunity to be the channel for action"; and
- the "intention of the sponsors was that the fact of a further material breach would be established in a report from the inspectors".

254. Sir Jeremy had argued that Lord Goldsmith's draft advice "took insufficient account of the alternative routes to OP12 … The fact that OP4 was a late addition was an indication that the route through OPs 1, 2, 11, 12 and 13 had separate validity." There was "no question in the co-sponsors' minds of … conceding that the Council had to assess what was a breach".

255. Sir Jeremy's view was that "the natural interpretation of 'assessment' … was that the Council would assess the options for the next steps … after a material breach had occurred".

256. Lord Goldsmith's position had been to argue "the opposite case, that the late addition of 'assessment' … must add something significant".

257. Sir Jeremy identified "an intermediate interpretation, whereby the fact of the material breach particularly if reported by the inspectors as directed in OP11, automatically brought the final opportunity to an end". Sir Jeremy suggested that "interpretation was … given weight by the absence of clear wording in OP12 on the need for a further decision. And it had a close precedent in the US/UK action on 16 December 1998 …"

[96] Letter Greenstock to Manning, 24 January 2003, [untitled].

258. Sir David Manning submitted the letter to Mr Blair, commenting: "To be aware that Jeremy G[reenstock] is in debate with the AG."[97]

259. A copy of Sir Jeremy's letter was sent only to Lord Goldsmith's office.

260. In a minute to Lord Goldsmith on 24 January, Ms Adams addressed the points made by Sir Jeremy on the textual arguments; the history of the negotiations; the precedent provided by resolution 1205 (1998); and references that had been made by Sir Jeremy to a paper submitted by Professor Christopher Greenwood Q.C., Professor of International Law, LSE, to the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) in October 2002.[98]

261. Ms Adams concluded:

> "Overall, although I don't believe that the arguments can all be taken without challenge, I certainly think they strengthen the case for the second view and make the balance of view as to which is the better of the two alternative interpretations rather closer."

262. Ms Adams suggested that Lord Goldsmith "might want to consider" whether he "would like to put these arguments to Michael Wood". Although that would "probably mean disclosing to him your provisional view of the resolution and perhaps even the draft advice".

263. Ms Adams commented to Lord Goldsmith that Sir Jeremy's letter to Sir David Manning "helpfully sets out his view of the arguments, although I don't think there are any points which are not covered in my minute of 24 January".[99]

264. Lord Goldsmith's undated minute to Ms Adams, inviting her to draft a note setting out his views, suggested that he did not share Sir Jeremy's view that the wording of OP4 was the "central issue".[100]

265. Lord Goldsmith wrote that Sir Jeremy's main argument had been that there was "no need to focus on the words 'for assessment' in OP4 because there is a trigger in OP1 suspended by OP2 but which suspension will be lifted if Iraq 'fails to take the final opportunity'".

266. Lord Goldsmith wrote that he did "not consider that this argument can in fact work to create a form of automaticity if the final opportunity is not taken". He focused on the fact that OPs 4 and 11 both led to OP12 and the need for the Security Council to meet "to consider the situation … and the need for full compliance with all the relevant Security Council resolutions in order to secure international peace and security"; and that the resolution had to be read as a whole. In his view, that meant the Council had to "consider what is needed in order to secure international peace and security and, in particular, whether full compliance is necessary". OP12 required "a determination by the Security Council of what is now required".

267. Lord Goldsmith also addressed Sir Jeremy's argument that resolution 1205 (1998) provided a precedent. Lord Goldsmith wrote that the point was not that the resolution validated the revival argument; he did not regard the fact that there was "strong evidence of disagreement of other States with the proposition" as "a matter of concern". The question was "not whether such an argument exists but what are the conditions which attach to its existence".

Mr Blair's interview on BBC Breakfast with Frost, 26 January 2003

268. In an interview on 26 January, Mr Blair stated explicitly that failure to co-operate with the inspectors would be a material breach of resolution 1441.

269. In an extended interview on BBC TV's Breakfast with Frost on 26 January, Mr Blair set out in detail his position on Iraq.[101]

270. Pressed as to whether non-compliance rather than evidence of weapons of mass destruction justified "a war", Mr Blair replied that he "profoundly" disagreed with the idea that a refusal to co-operate was of a "lesser order":

> "… if he fails to co-operate in being honest and he is pursuing a programme of concealment, that is every bit as much a breach as finding, for example, a missile or chemical agent."

271. Asked whether a second resolution was needed, required or preferred, Mr Blair replied:

> "Of course we want a second resolution and there is only one set of circumstances in which I've said that we would move without one … all this stuff that … we're indifferent … is nonsense. We're very focused on getting a UN resolution.
> "… [Y]ou damage the UN if the UN inspectors say he's not co-operating, he's in breach, and the world does nothing about it. But I don't believe that will happen …"

Options for a second resolution

272. Intensive discussions on a second resolution took place at the end of January.

273. Ms Wilmshurst wrote to Ms Adams on 27 January with draft texts for two options for a second resolution, one expressly authorising the use of force, the other containing implicit authority.[102] Ms Wilmshurst wrote that no decisions had been taken on the drafts and no discussions had begun with the US, but the FCO would welcome any comments Lord Goldsmith might wish to make on the options.

274. Ms Adams replied that, having regard to the terms of resolution 1441 and the previous practice of the Council, Lord Goldsmith considered that "where the Security Council determines that Iraq had committed a sufficiently serious breach of the conditions of the cease-fire imposed by resolution 687 (1991)" to revive the authorisation in resolution 678(1990), an implicit resolution would be sufficient to revive the authorisation to use force in resolution 678.[103]

275. The "critical element" was that "there has been a finding, in whatever form, by the Security Council itself", and that "A Presidential Statement would also be sufficient".

276. Ms Adams wrote that Lord Goldsmith did not at that stage intend to offer any detailed drafting comments on the proposed text, "given that it is likely that they will change in discussions with the US".

277. In relation to the possibility of issuing an "ultimatum", Lord Goldsmith's view was that "would need to be expressed in very clear terms so there is no room for doubt whether or not Iraq had met the Council's demands. Otherwise there is a risk of opening up a debate about whether there is a need for a further determination by the Council that Iraq had failed to comply with the new ultimatum."

278. Ms Adams recorded that Lord Goldsmith wished to make clear that a second resolution authorising the use of force "would not give an unlimited right to use force against Iraq". Lord Goldsmith considered that any use of force would have to be directed towards the objective of securing compliance with the disarmament obligations, which the Security Council had already determined in resolution 687(1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions were "necessary requirements for restoring international peace and security in the area". The use of force would, moreover, have to be limited to what was "necessary to enforce those obligations, and be a proportionate response to Iraq's breach".

279. Ms Adams explicitly stated that Lord Goldsmith's comments were "made without prejudice to the separate question … of whether a second resolution is legally required". He had also asked to be "kept closely informed of developments" and wished "to have the opportunity to comment on any draft which is to be tabled for discussion with other members of the Council".

280. Mr Grainger wrote to Mr Macleod, to convey the substance of the advice in Ms Adams' letter.[104]

Lord Goldsmith's advice, 30 January 2003

281. Ms Adams had written to Sir David Manning on 28 January, recording that Lord Goldsmith had found Sir Jeremy Greenstock's letter of 24 January "a useful record of Sir Jeremy's arguments on which the Attorney is reflecting"; but that Lord Goldsmith:

> "… would like to make clear, in order to avoid any doubt about his position, that the purpose of the meeting was to allow the Attorney to hear the best arguments which could be made in support of the view that resolution 1441 can be interpreted as authorising the use of force, under certain conditions, without a further Council decision. The Attorney was therefore principally in listening mode …"[105]

282. Ms Adams wrote that there was "one point on which Lord Goldsmith would find it helpful to have further information". Sir Jeremy's arguments had relied "heavily on the negotiating history … and the fact that other delegations sought, but failed to obtain, certain language in OPs 4 and 12". Lord Goldsmith wanted to know "if possible, to what extent other members of the Council were aware of these bilateral discussions and therefore the significance of the language". Lord Goldsmith also wished to take up Sir Jeremy's suggestion to meet US counterparts, including to "hear their views on what is necessary in practice to trigger the authorisation to use force".

283. Ms Adams concluded that Lord Goldsmith was conscious that Mr Blair was due to meet President Bush later that week. The letter stated:

> "The Prime Minister is aware of the Attorney's provisional view of the interpretation of the resolution. However, if the Attorney is to consider the arguments of his US counterparts before reaching a definitive view, he will not be in a position to finalise his advice this week. The Attorney would therefore like to know whether you see any difficulty with this and whether the Prime Minister would wish to have the Attorney's considered advice before he departs for the US."

284. Sir David Manning wrote on Ms Adams' letter that someone should respond to Lord Goldsmith's question about advice for Mr Blair in his absence.[106]

285. Baroness Morgan commented: "not necessary before w/end".[107]

286. Mr Rycroft recorded: "I replied by phone as Sally said."[108]

287. A copy of Ms Adams' letter was sent to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, who responded to Lord Goldsmith's question on 29 January.[109]

288. The points made by Sir Jeremy included:

- the early drafts of what became resolution 1441 "were discussed among members of the P5, bilaterally, and in extensive and frequent conversations at Ministerial level";
- a text was not finally "agreed by" all members of the P5 until 7 November; and
- he had "convened meetings with the non-Permanent Members during the drafting process to make sure they were aware of developments. The significance of the proposals for what became OP 4, 11 and 12 were fully discussed on these occasions."

289. Despite being told that advice was not needed for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush on 31 January, Lord Goldsmith wrote on 30 January to emphasise that his view remained that resolution 1441 did not authorise the use of military force without a further determination by the Security Council.

290. That was the third time Lord Goldsmith had felt it necessary to put his advice to Mr Blair in writing without having been asked to do so; and on this occasion he had been explicitly informed that it was not needed.

291. Lord Goldsmith had made only a "provisional" interpretation of resolution 1441, but his position was firmly and clearly expressed.

292. It was also consistent with the advice given by Mr Wood to Mr Straw.

293. Despite the message that his advice was not needed before the meeting with President Bush, Lord Goldsmith decided to write to Mr Blair on 30 January, stating:

> "I thought you might wish to know where I stand on the question of whether a further decision of the Security Council is legally required in order to authorise the use of force against Iraq."[110]

294. Lord Goldsmith informed Mr Blair that the meeting with Sir Jeremy Greenstock had been "extremely useful", and that "it was in fact the first time that the arguments in support of the case that there is no need for a further Council decision had been put to me in detail". He had "considered carefully" the "important points" Sir Jeremy had made. Lord Goldsmith wrote that he was "preparing a more detailed note of advice" which would set out his "conclusions in relation to those arguments".

295. Lord Goldsmith added that he had "indicated to Sir David Manning" that he "would welcome the opportunity, if arrangements can be made in time, to hear the views of my US counterparts on the interpretation of resolution 1441". He was "not convinced" that it would "make any difference to my view", but he remained "ready to hear any arguments".

296. Lord Goldsmith concluded:

> "… notwithstanding the additional arguments put to me since our last discussion, I remain of the view that the correct legal interpretation of resolution 1441 is that it does not authorise the use of military force without a further determination by the Security Council, pursuant to paragraph 12 of the resolution, that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity granted by the Council. I recognise that arguments can be made to support the view that paragraph 12 of the resolution merely requires a Council discussion rather than a further decision. But having considered the arguments on both sides, my view remains that a further decision is required."

297. Sir David Manning commented: "Clear advice from Attorney on need for further resolution."[111]

298. Mr Rycroft wrote: "I specifically said that we did not need further advice this week."[112]

299. The underlining of Lord Goldsmith's concluding paragraph quoted above is Mr Blair's and he wrote alongside the paragraph: "I just don't understand this."[113]

300. Asked by the Inquiry why he had written to Mr Blair at that point, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "I discovered that Mr Blair was going to see President Bush again at the end of January and there was concern again about views being expressed that I had now been persuaded by Sir Jeremy, so I did send a short minute to the Prime Minister to make sure that he didn't think that was the case. I hadn't been asked for it, but I sent it."[114]

301. Asked to explain what it was he did not understand about Lord Goldsmith's advice, Mr Blair wrote:

> "When I received the advice on 30 January – which again was provisional – I did not understand how he could reach the conclusion that a further decision was required, when expressly we had refused such language in 1441."[115]

302. Although Mr Blair commented that he did not understand Lord Goldsmith's conclusion, it was consistent with the views Lord Goldsmith had set out in his meeting with Mr Blair on 22 October 2002, and subsequently in his conversations with Mr Powell on 11 November and 19 December and in his draft advice given to Mr Blair and discussed with him on 14 January 2003.

303. The issue that Lord Goldsmith was addressing in his advice to Mr Blair was not what the UK's objective had been in negotiating resolution 1441 but its legal effect in the circumstances of early 2003.

304. Mr Blair referred again to this manuscript comment in his oral evidence when recalling the No.10 meeting which had taken place on 17 October 2002, "which we then minuted out, including to Peter"; and his meeting with Lord Goldsmith on 22 October 2002.

305. Mr Blair said:

> "… we had agreed on 17 October that there were clear objectives for the resolution and those objectives were, I think we actually say this very plainly, the ultimatum goes into 1441. If he breaches the ultimatum action follows. So this was the instruction given. I mean, I can't remember exactly what I said after the 22 October, but I should imagine I said "Well, you had better make sure it does meet our objectives …"[116]

306. Mr Blair added:

> "… the thing that was problematic for me throughout, and it is why I wrote … 'I just don't understand this' is that the whole point about our instructions to our negotiators was, 'Make sure that this resolution is sufficient because we can't guarantee we are going to go back into a further iteration of this or a second resolution'."

307. Mr Blair's meeting on 17 October and the meeting between Lord Goldsmith and Mr Blair on 22 October are described in Section 3.5.

US agreement to pursue a second resolution

308. In the meeting on 31 January, President Bush agreed to support a second resolution to help Mr Blair.

309. A briefing paper prepared by the FCO Middle East Department on 30 January described the objectives for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush as:

> "to convince President Bush that:
> - our strategy, though working, needs more time;
> - the military campaign will be very shocking in many parts of the world, especially in its opening phase (five times the bombing of the Gulf war);
> - a second UN Security Council resolution (i) would greatly strengthen the US's position, (ii) is politically essential for the UK, and almost certainly legally essential as well;

[116] Public hearing, 21 January 2011, pages 55-56.

- we should support Saudi ideas for disarmament and regime change with UN blessing; and
- the US needs to pay much more attention, quickly, to planning on 'day after' issues; and that the UN needs to be central to it."[117]

310. On the legal position, a background note stated:

> "There are concerns that a second resolution authorising the use of force is needed before force may lawfully be employed against Iraq to enforce the WMD obligations in the UNSCRs. If a draft resolution fails because of a veto (or indeed because it does not receive nine positive votes), the fact that the veto is judged 'unreasonable' is immaterial from a legal point of view."

311. In the meeting on 31 January, Mr Blair confirmed that he was:

> "… solidly with the President and ready do whatever it took to disarm Saddam."[118]

312. Mr Blair said he firmly believed that it was essential that we tackle the threats posed by WMD and terrorism. He wanted a second resolution if we could possibly get one because it would make it much easier politically to deal with Saddam Hussein. He believed that a second resolution was in reach. A second resolution was an insurance policy against the unexpected.

313. Mr Blair set out his position that the key argument in support of a second resolution must rest on the requirement in 1441 that Saddam Hussein must co-operate with the inspectors. Dr Blix had already said on 27 January that this was not happening; he needed to repeat that message when he reported to the Security Council in mid-February and at the end of February/early March. That would help to build the case for a second resolution.

314. Mr Blair added that there were various uncertainties:

- Saddam Hussein might claim at the eleventh hour to have had a change of heart; and
- we could not be sure that Dr Blix's second and third reports would be as helpful as his first.

315. Mr Blair was, therefore, flexible about the timing of the second resolution. The key was to ensure that we secured it. We had taken the UN route in the expectation that the UN would deal with the Iraq problem, not provide an alibi for avoiding the tough decisions. The resolution was clear that this was Saddam Hussein's final opportunity. We had been very patient. Now we should be saying that the crisis must be resolved in weeks, not months. The international community had to confront the challenges of WMD and terrorism now.

[118] Letter Manning to McDonald, 31 January 2003, 'Prime Minister's Conversation with President Bush on 31 January'.

316. Mr Blair argued that the second resolution:

> "… was not code for delay or hesitation. It was a clear statement that Saddam was not co-operating and that the international community was determined to do whatever it took to disarm him. We needed to put the debate in a wider context. The international community had to confront the challenges of WMD and terrorism now, whether in Iraq or North Korea, otherwise the risks would only increase."

Public statements by Mr Blair, February 2003

317. In early February, Mr Blair made public statements implying that the UK could take part in military action if a second resolution was vetoed.

318. In the House of Commons on 5 February, Mr Chris Mullin (Labour) told Mr Blair that he:

> "… could not support an attack on Iraq unless it was specifically endorsed by a second resolution of the United Nations Security Council."[119]

319. Mr Blair responded:

> "I have set out my position … on many occasions. Surely, the position has to be this: if there is a breach of the original United Nations resolution 1441, a second resolution should issue.
> "That was the anticipated outcome. What resolution 1441 says is that the inspectors go into Iraq, and if they notify the facts that amount to a material breach, a second resolution should issue. That is why I believe that if the inspectors continue to say, as they are now, that Iraq is not co-operating, there will be a second resolution. The only circumstances in which I have left room for us to manoeuvre are those in which it is clear that the inspectors are finding that Iraq is not co-operating, so it is clear that Iraq is in material breach, but for some reason someone puts down what I would describe as an unreasonable and capricious use of the veto.
> "I do not believe that that will happen and I hope that it will not, but I do not think that it is right to restrict our freedom of manoeuvre in those circumstances because otherwise, the original spirit and letter of resolution 1441 would itself be breached. I believe and hope that we will resolve this issue through the United Nations."[120]

320. Mr Blair gave an extended interview about Iraq and public services on BBC TV's Newsnight on 6 February.[121]

[120] House of Commons, Official Report, 5 February 2003, column 270.

321. During the interview Mr Jeremy Paxman challenged Mr Blair on a number of issues, including whether Mr Blair would "give an undertaking" that he would "seek another UN resolution specifically authorising the use of force".

322. Explaining his position on a second resolution, Mr Blair stated that "the only circumstances in which we would agree to use force" would be with a further resolution, "except for one caveat". That was:

> "If the inspectors do report that they can't do their work properly because Iraq is not co-operating, there's no doubt that under the terms of the existing United Nations resolution that that's a breach of the resolution. In those circumstances there should be a further resolution.
> "… If a country unreasonably in those circumstances put down a veto then I would consider action outside of that."

323. Pressed whether he considered he was "absolutely free to defy the express will of the Security Council", Mr Blair responded that he could not "just do it with America", there would have to be "a majority in the Security Council", and:

> "… the issue of a veto doesn't even arise unless you get a majority in the Security Council. Secondly, the choice … is … If the will of the UN is the thing that is most important and I agree that it is, if there is a breach of resolution 1441 … and we do nothing then we have flouted the will of the UN."

324. Asked if he was saying that there was already an authorisation for war, Mr Blair responded:

> "No, what I am saying is … In the resolution [1441] … we said that Iraq … had … a final opportunity to comply.
> "The duty of compliance was defined as full co-operation with the UN inspectors. The resolution … say[s] 'any failure to co-operate fully is a breach of this resolution and serious consequences i.e. action, would follow' … [W]e then also put in that resolution that there will be a further discussion in the Security Council. But the clear understanding was that if the inspectors say that Iraq is not complying and there is a breach … then we have to act.
> "… [I]f someone … says … I accept there's a breach … but I'm issuing a veto, I think that would be unreasonable … I don't think that's what will happen. I think that … if the inspectors do end up in a situation where they're saying there is not compliance by Iraq, then I think a second resolution will issue."

325. Asked whether he agreed it was "important to get France, Russia and Germany on board", Mr Blair replied, "Yes … That's what I am trying to get."

326. Asked if he would "give an undertaking that he wouldn't go to war without their agreement", Mr Blair replied:

> "… supposing in circumstances where there plainly was [a] breach … and everyone else wished to take action, one of them put down a veto. In those circumstances it would be unreasonable.
> "Then I think it [not to act] would be wrong because otherwise you couldn't uphold the UN. Because you would have passed your resolution and then you'd have failed to act on it."

327. Asked whether it was for the UK to judge what was "unreasonable", Mr Blair envisaged that would be in circumstances where the inspectors, not the UK, had reported to the Council that they could not do their job.

328. Asked if the US and UK went ahead without a UN resolution would any other country listen to the UN in the future, Mr Blair replied that there was "only one set of circumstances" in which that would happen. Resolution 1441 "effectively" said that if the inspectors said they could not do their job, a second resolution would issue: "If someone then … vetoes wrongly, what do we do?"

329. In his evidence to the Inquiry Mr Blair explained the position he had adopted in his meeting with President Bush and subsequent public statements. He drew the Inquiry's attention to the political implications of acknowledging publicly the legal advice he had been given while there was still an unresolved debate within the UK Government.

330. Mr Blair also emphasised that he had specifically said that action would be taken only in circumstances where the inspectors had reported that they could no longer do their job.

331. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the main objective of the meeting on 31 January was to convince President Bush that it was necessary to get a second resolution.[122] That "was obviously going to make life a lot easier politically in every respect". Mr Blair added: "we took the view that that was not necessary, but, obviously, politically, it would have been far easier".

332. Asked why he had not told President Bush that he had been advised that a further determination of the Security Council would be necessary to authorise the use of force, Mr Blair wrote in his witness statement:

> "In speaking to President Bush on 31 January 2003 I was not going to go into this continuing legal debate, internal to the UK Government. I repeated my strong commitment, given publicly and privately to do what it took to disarm Saddam."[123]

---

[122] Public hearing, 29 January 2010, pages 95-96.
[123] Statement, 14 January 2011, page 10.

333. Mr Blair subsequently told the Inquiry that, in the context of trying to sustain an international coalition:

> "My desire was to keep the maximum pressure on Saddam because I hoped we could get a second resolution with an ultimatum because that meant we could avoid the conflict altogether, or then have a clear consensus for removing Saddam. So I was having to carry on whilst this internal legal debate was continuing and try to hope we could overcome it."[124]

334. Asked if he had felt constrained in making a commitment to President Bush by the advice Lord Goldsmith was continuing to give him, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "No. I was going to take the view, and I did right throughout that period, there might come a point at which I had to say to the President of the United States, to all the other allies, 'I can't be with you.' I might have said that on legal grounds if Peter's advice had not, having seen what the Americans told him about the negotiating process, come down on the other side. I might have had to do that politically. I was in a very, very difficult situation politically. It was by no means certain that we would get this thing through the House of Commons.
> "… I was going to continue giving absolute and firm commitment until the point at which definitively I couldn't …"[125]

335. Mr Blair added he had taken that position:

> "… because had I raised any doubt at that time, if I had suddenly said 'Well, I can't be sure we have got the right legal basis'. If I started to say that to President Bush, if I had said that publicly, when I was being pressed the whole time 'Do you need a second resolution, is it essential …?' … but I wasn't going to be in a position where I stepped back until I knew I had to, because I believed that if I started to articulate this, in a sense saying 'Look, I can't be sure', the effect of that both on the Americans, on the coalition and most importantly on Saddam, would have been dramatic."

336. Mr Blair acknowledged that holding that line was uncomfortable, "especially in the light of what Peter [Goldsmith] had said".

337. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that President Bush:

> "… knew perfectly well that we needed a second resolution. We had been saying that to him throughout … [W]e had not had the final advice yet …
> "… I was not going to … start putting the problem before the President … until I was in a position where I knew definitely that I had to."[126]

338. Mr Blair added:

> "If I had started raising legal issues at that point with the President, I think it would have started to make him concerned as to whether we were really going to be there or not and what was really going to happen.
> "Now I would have had to have done that because in the end whatever I thought about the legal position, the person whose thoughts mattered most and definitively were Peter's, but I wasn't going to do that until I was sure about it."[127]

339. Subsequently, Mr Blair added that it had been "very, very difficult". He was answering questions in the House of Commons and giving interviews and:

> "… having to hold the political line in circumstances where there was this unresolved … debate within the UK Government …
> "If I had … in January and February said anything that indicated there was a breach in the British position … it would have been a political catastrophe for us."[128]

340. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that these difficulties explained why he had wanted to get Lord Goldsmith "together with the Americans and resolve this once and for all".[129]

A disagreement between Mr Straw and Mr Wood

341. Mr Straw had visited Washington on 23 January and had repeated the political arguments for trying to get a second resolution.

342. In a meeting on 23 January, Mr Straw and Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, discussed the inspectors' reports due to be presented to the Security Council on 27 January, the need to "shift the burden of proof to Iraq", and the need to ensure that there were no differences between the US and UK.[130]

343. In his subsequent meeting with Vice President Dick Cheney, Mr Straw said that "the key question was how to navigate the shoals between where we were today and a possible decision to take military action".[131] The UK would be "fine" if there was a second resolution; and that it would be "ok if we tried and failed (a la Kosovo). But we would need bullet-proof jackets if we did not even try". In response to Vice President Cheney's question whether it would be better to try and fail than not to try at all, Mr Straw said the former.

344. Mr Wood had warned Mr Straw on 24 January that "without a further decision by the Council, and absent extraordinary circumstances", the UK would not be able lawfully to use force against Iraq.

345. Mr Wood wrote to Mr Straw on 22 and 24 January about the terms of the discussions on a second resolution.

346. Commenting on advice to Mr Straw for his visit to Washington, Mr Wood wrote:

> "The Foreign Secretary will know that the legal advice is that a second resolution authorising the use of force is needed before any force may lawfully be employed against Iraq to enforce the WMD obligations in the SCRs. If a draft resolution fails because of a veto (or indeed because it does not receive nine positive votes), the fact that the veto (or failure to vote in favour) is 'unreasonable' is neither here nor there from a legal point of view. Further, who is to judge what is 'unreasonable'?"[132]

347. In his second minute, Mr Wood expressed concern about Mr Straw's reported remarks to Vice President Cheney.[133]

348. Mr Wood wrote that Kosovo was "no precedent": the legal basis was the need to avert an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe; no draft resolution had been put to the Security Council; and no draft had been vetoed. He hoped there was:

> "… no doubt in anyone's mind that without a further decision of the Council, and absent extraordinary circumstances (of which at present there is no sign), the United Kingdom cannot lawfully use force against Iraq to ensure compliance with its SCR WMD obligations. To use force without Security Council authority would amount to the crime of aggression."

349. Mr Straw told Mr Wood he did not accept that view and that there was a strong case for a different view.

350. Mr Straw discussed the advice with Mr Wood on 28 January.[134]

351. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Wood the following day: "I note your advice, but I do not accept it."[135]

352. Quoting his experiences as Home Secretary, Mr Straw stated that, "even on apparently open and shut issues", he had been advised: "there could be a different view, honestly and reasonably held. And so it turned out to be time and again."

353. Mr Straw concluded:

> "I am as committed as anyone to international law and its obligations, but it is an uncertain field. There is no international court for resolving such questions in the manner of a domestic court. Moreover, in this case, the issue is an arguable one … I hope (for political reasons) we can get a second resolution. But there is a strong case to be made that UNSCR 678, and everything which has happened since (assuming Iraq continues not to comply), provides a sufficient basis in international law to justify military action."

354. Mr Straw sent copies of his letter to Lord Goldsmith and to Sir David Manning as well as to senior officials in the FCO.

355. Lord Goldsmith reminded Mr Straw of the duties of Legal Advisers and that the principal mechanism for resolving an issue when a Minister challenged the legal advice he or she had received was to seek an opinion from the Law Officers.

356. Lord Goldsmith wrote to Mr Straw on 3 February stating that he was not commenting "on the substance of the legal advice in relation to Iraq", which he would "deal with separately", but on the points Mr Straw had made in his letter to Mr Wood of 29 January about the role of Government Legal Advisers. They had already discussed that issue, but Lord Goldsmith thought it right to record his views.

357. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "It is important for the Government that its lawyers give advice which they honestly consider to be correct … they should give the advice they believe in, not the advice which they think others want to hear. To do otherwise would undermine their function … in giving independent objective and impartial advice. This is not to say … that lawyers should not be positive and constructive in helping the Government achieve its policy objectives through lawful means and be open-minded in considering other points of view.
> "But if a Government legal adviser genuinely believes that a course of action would be unlawful, then it is his or her right and duty to say so. I support this right regardless of whether I agree with the substance of the advice which has been given. Where a Minister challenges the legal advice he or she has received, there are established mechanisms to deal with this. The principal such mechanism is to seek an opinion from the Law Officers."[136]

[136] Minute Goldsmith to Foreign Secretary, 3 February 2003, [untitled].

358. Mr Straw responded on 20 February to Lord Goldsmith's letter of 3 February, acknowledging that the substantive issue – Iraq – was being dealt with separately, and stating:

> "For the record, I want to make it completely clear that I fully respect the integrity of Michael Wood and his colleague legal advisers. I believe that officials always offer their best advice. At the same time Ministers must be able to raise legitimate questions about the advice they receive. As far as the implementation of Iraq UNSCRs is concerned, this is an uncertain area of law. The US, Netherlands and Australian Government legal advisers all, I understand, take the view that SCR 1441 provides legal sanction for military operations. The full range of views ought to be reflected in the advice offered by our Legal Advisers."[137]

359. Mr Straw, Lord Goldsmith and Sir Michael Wood all conceded that this correspondence was unusual.

360. Sir Michael Wood told the Inquiry why he had felt it necessary to send his note of 24 January:

> "It is something I didn't normally have to do, but I did it quite frequently during this period. It was because of the statement that he was recorded as saying to the [US] Vice President [about Kosovo]. That was so completely wrong, from a legal point of view, that I felt it was important to draw that to his attention … [W]e had a bilateral meeting at which he took the view that I was being very dogmatic and that international law was pretty vague and that he wasn't used to people taking such a firm position."[138]

361. Sir Michael emphasised that the meeting had been very amicable and that although it was quite unusual to receive a minute like the one from Mr Straw, he had not taken it amiss.

362. Ms Wilmshurst told the Inquiry that Sir Michael's view that 1441 did not authorise the use of force and that a second resolution was required was shared by all the FCO Legal Advisers dealing with the matter.[139]

363. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "I was unhappy when I saw that [Mr Straw's minute of 29 January], not because I thought it followed that Sir Michael was right and Mr Straw was wrong about the legal issue … but I didn't like, to be honest, the sort of tone of what appeared to be a rebuke to a senior legal adviser for expressing his or her view. I have always taken the view in Government – indeed I told Government lawyers – that they should express their views, however unwelcome they might be."[140]

364. Mr Straw submitted a 'Supplementary Memorandum' addressing this exchange before his hearing on 8 February 2010.[141]

365. Mr Straw wrote that following a "private meeting in mid-January" with Vice President Cheney:

> "… the usual rather cryptic summary of my conversation was issued in a confidential FCO telegram … Reading this Sir Michael sent me his minute of 24 January which, with my response, has been the subject of considerable interest by the Inquiry, and publicly.
> "Far from ignoring this advice, as has been suggested publicly, I read Sir Michael's minute with great care, and gave it the serious attention it deserved. So much so that I thought I owed him a formal and personal written response, rather than simply having a conversation with him."

366. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that he had "never sent a minute like that before or since".[142]

367. Mr Straw also acknowledged that Lord Goldsmith's letter of 3 February was "very unusual".[143] In his view, it had been sent because Lord Goldsmith thought Mr Straw was "questioning the right of legal advisers to offer me advice". Mr Straw had told Lord Goldsmith that he was not, and had subsequently put that in writing.

368. Mr Straw explained that his comment to Vice President Cheney about Kosovo was about military action in the absence of a Security Council resolution.

369. Mr Straw's minute did not address the substance of Mr Wood's advice on the Kosovo issue.

370. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that Kosovo itself was not a precedent and he fully accepted the legal basis was different.[144] It was relevant "only to this extent, that … there was an effort made to gain Security Council agreement and that failed, but the military action went ahead".

371. In his 'Supplementary Memorandum', Mr Straw wrote that he had reached the view that he needed to respond to Mr Wood in writing because he had been "struck by the categorical nature of the advice … and its contrast with the very balanced and detailed advice the same Legal Adviser had proffered to the Attorney General".[145] It was "incorrect to claim that there was 'no doubt' about the position" because two views had been set out in Mr Wood's letter of instructions to Lord Goldsmith on 9 December 2002 and the issue "was at the heart of the debate on lawfulness". That, "In turn and in part … depended on the 'negotiating history'", of the resolution.

372. Mr Straw subsequently told the Inquiry that, if Mr Wood had thought there was "no doubt", that was what he should have written in the instructions to Lord Goldsmith of 9 December.[146] The purposes of that document and Mr Wood's minute of 24 January "were the same, to offer legal advice and … the legal advice he had offered … was contradictory". In Mr Straw's view he was "entitled to raise that".

373. The evidence set out in this Report demonstrates that Mr Wood fully understood that Lord Goldsmith's response to the letter of instruction of 9 December 2002 would provide the determinative view on the points at issue and he was not seeking to usurp that position.

374. Mr Wood had referred to the need to seek Lord Goldsmith's advice on several previous occasions and it should not have been necessary to reiterate the point in every minute to Mr Straw.

375. Until Lord Goldsmith had reached his definitive view, FCO Legal Advisers had a duty to draw the attention of Ministers to potential legal risks; and Lord Goldsmith's minute of 3 February confirmed that duty.

376. Mr Wood's advice to Mr Straw was fully consistent with views previously expressed by Lord Goldsmith.

377. Lord Goldsmith's response, insisting on the duty of Government lawyers to provide frank, honest and, if necessary, unwelcome legal advice without fear of rebuke from Ministers, was timely and justified.

378. In his 'Supplementary Memorandum', Mr Straw wrote that the:

> "… decision was one for the Attorney General alone – a fact to which no reference was made nor qualification offered in the Legal Adviser's minute to me …"[147]

379. Mr Straw added:

> "It would surely be a novel, and fundamentally flawed, constitutional doctrine that a Minister was bound to accept any advice offered … by a Departmental Legal Adviser as determinative of an issue, if there were reasonable grounds for taking a contrary view. Such a doctrine would wholly undermine the principles of personal Ministerial responsibility and give inappropriate power to a Department's Legal Advisers."

[146] Public hearing, 8 February 2010, page 16.
[147] Statement, February 2010, 'Supplementary Memorandum by the Rt Hon Jack Straw MP'.

380. In the subsequent hearing, Mr Straw told the Inquiry he had responded to Mr Wood because:

> "… where I disagreed with him was that he had the right over and above the Attorney General to say what was or was not unlawful … it is a most extraordinary constitutional doctrine that, in the absence of a decision by the Attorney General about what was or was not lawful, that a Departmental Legal Adviser is able to say what is or is not unlawful."[148]

381. Mr Straw added:

> "But in the absence of a decision by the Attorney General … there has to be doubt. That was what I thought was strange, and, as I say, he is fully entitled to send me the note. I never challenged his right to do that, and if I may say so, there is some suggestion in the notes that I ignored the advice. I never ignore advice. I gave it the most careful attention."[149]

382. Sir Franklin Berman, Sir Michael Wood's predecessor as the FCO Legal Adviser, wrote:

> "I have to confess (once again) to some astonishment at seeing a former Foreign Secretary implying in recent evidence to the Inquiry that he was not bound by legal advice given to him at the highest level, but was entitled to weigh it off against other legal views as the basis for policy formulation. If Ministers begin to think that they can shop around until they discover the most convenient legal view, without regard to its authority, that is a recipe for chaos."[150]

383. As Lord Goldsmith remarked in his letter of 3 February, the remedy in case of dispute was to ask for his opinion, but he did not at that stage have Mr Blair's agreement to share his draft views.

384. Mr Straw's evidence makes clear his concern that Lord Goldsmith should not at that stage take a definitive view without fully considering the alternative interpretation advocated by Mr Straw and set out in his letter of 6 February 2003.

385. The balance of the evidence set out later in this Section suggests that neither Mr Straw nor Mr Wood had, by 29 January, seen Lord Goldsmith's draft advice of 14 January.

386. In his 'Supplementary Memorandum' Mr Straw pointed out "the huge difference between the normal run of the mill legal advice on usual issues and legal advice on whether it was legal for the United Kingdom to take military action".[151] That was "why, on all sides, this issue was so sensitive".

[150] Statement, 7 March 2011, paragraph 8.
[151] Statement, February 2010, 'Supplementary Memorandum by the Rt Hon Jack Straw MP'.

387. Mr Straw added that he "had an intense appreciation" of the negotiating history of resolution 1441 and "an acute understanding" of what France, Russia and China had said in their EOVs and the subsequent Ministerial meetings of the Security Council and "crucially – what they had not said". That needed to be "weighed in the balance before a decision".

388. Mr Straw wrote:

> "Once the Attorney General had uttered on this question, that would have been the end of the matter; as on any other similar legal question. It would be wholly improper of any Minister to challenge, or not accept, such an Attorney General decision, whatever it was. But we were not at that stage."

389. The Inquiry asked a number of witnesses to comment on Mr Straw's assertion that international law was an uncertain field and there was no international court to decide matters.

390. Mr Straw emphasised that it meant the responsibility rested on Lord Goldsmith's shoulders.

391. Addressing that point, Sir Michael Wood told the Inquiry:

> "… he is somehow implying that one can therefore be more flexible, and that I think is probably the opposite of the case … because there is no court, the Legal Adviser and those taking decisions based on legal advice have to be all the more scrupulous in adhering to the law … It is one thing for a lawyer to say, 'Well, there is an argument here. Have a go. A court, a judge, will decide in the end'. It is quite different in the international system where that's usually not the case. You have a duty to the law, a duty to the system. You are setting precedents by the very fact of saying and doing things."[152]

392. Ms Wilmshurst took a similar view: "I think that, simply because there are no courts, it ought to make one more cautious about trying to keep within the law, not less."[153]

393. On the question of whether international law was an uncertain field, Lord Goldsmith stated:

> "I didn't really agree with what he was saying about that. There obviously are areas of international law which are uncertain, but this particular issue, at the end of the day, was: what does this resolution mean?"[154]

[153] Public hearing, 26 January 2010, page 9.

394. In his 'Supplementary Memorandum', Mr Straw wrote:

> "In this area of international law, recourse to the courts is not available. This means that international law must be inherently less certain, and that, given the seriousness of the issues, great care has to be taken in coming to a view. But the absence of an external tribunal means that a view has in the end to be taken by the Attorney General, on whose shoulders rests a great weight of responsibility."[155]

395. Asked whether there was a responsibility to be "all the more scrupulous in adhering to the law" in circumstances where there was no court with jurisdiction to rule on the use of force in Iraq, Mr Straw replied:

> "Yes, of course. You have to be extremely scrupulous because it is a decision which is made internally without external determination … but that's a very separate point from saying that … the correct view is on one side rather than the other. The correct view was the correct view."[156]

Mr Straw's letter to Lord Goldsmith, 6 February 2003

396. In a letter of 6 February, Mr Straw took issue with a number of the provisional conclusions in Lord Goldsmith's draft advice of 14 January.

397. Mr Straw attached great importance to concessions made by France, Russia and China (which he described as a defeat for them).

398. But Mr Straw dismissed concessions made by the UK and the US as a trade-off which merely offered other members of the Security Council "some procedural comfort".

399. That considerably understated the importance of the concessions by all members of the P5 to create sufficient ambiguity about the meaning of the resolution to command consensus in the Security Council.

400. The UK had explicitly recognised during the negotiation of resolution 1441 that the inclusion of a provision for the Security Council to "consider" a report would create the opportunity for France and others to argue that a further decision would be required to determine whether Iraq was in material breach of resolution 1441.

401. In his letter Mr Straw did not refer to Lord Goldsmith's minute to Mr Blair of 30 January.

[155] Statement, February 2010, 'Supplementary Memorandum by the Rt Hon Jack Straw MP'.
[156] Public hearing, 8 February 2010, pages 26-27.

402. A minute from Ms Adams to Lord Goldsmith, in preparation for a meeting with Mr Straw on 3 February, makes clear that Lord Goldsmith planned to give Mr Straw a copy of his draft advice of 14 January and his minute to Mr Blair of 30 January.[157]

403. Ms Adams also wrote:

> "David [Brummell] has not yet been able to get hold of Jonathan Powell, despite several attempts. We do not therefore know whether No.10 is content for you to pass your draft advice to the Foreign Secretary."

404. There is no record of the meeting on 3 February. There was no copy of Lord Goldsmith's minute to Mr Blair of 30 January in the papers provided by the FCO to the Inquiry or anything to indicate that Mr Straw received a copy.

405. Mr Straw's Private Office sent Mr Brummell, "as promised", the draft of a letter from Mr Straw to Lord Goldsmith on 4 February.[158] The letter was also sent to Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US, Sir David Manning and Mr Powell.

406. In his letter of 6 February, which was unchanged from the draft, Mr Straw wrote that he had been asked by Lord Goldsmith in the last week of January if he had seen Lord Goldsmith's draft "opinion" on Iraq.[159]

407. Mr Straw had seen Lord Goldsmith's draft advice, but he:

> "… had not had a chance to study it in detail. This I have now done. I would be very grateful if you would carefully consider my comments below before coming to a final conclusion and I would appreciate a conversation with you as well. As you will be aware I was immersed in the line-by-line negotiations of the resolution, much of which was conducted capital to capital with P5 Foreign Ministers."

408. Mr Straw continued:

> "It goes without saying that a unanimous and express Security Council authorisation would be the safest basis for the use of force against Iraq. But I have doubts about the negotiability of this in current circumstances. We are likely to have to go for something less. You will know the UK attaches high priority to achieving a second resolution for domestic policy reasons and to ensure wide international support for any military action. This was the case the Prime Minister was making in Washington [on 31 January]. We are working hard to achieve it."

409. Referring to his minute to Mr Wood of 29 January, Mr Straw stated that he "had been very forcefully struck by a paradox in the culture of Government lawyers, which is that the less certain the law is, the more certain in their views they become".

410. Mr Straw wrote:

> "Jeremy Greenstock has given you the negotiating history of OP4 and of how the words 'for assessment' were included. It is crucial to emphasise, as Jeremy spelt out, that the overwhelming issue between US/UK and the French/Russians/Chinese (F/R/C) was whether a second resolution was required to authorise any use of force or not. As Jeremy told you the F/R/C lost on this, and they knew they had lost. To achieve this, however, we had to show that the discussions on the first resolution would not be the end of the matter. So the trade-off … for the F/R/C defeat on the substantive issue of a second resolution was some procedural comfort – provided in OPs 4, 11 and 12. If there were a further material breach this would be "reported to the Council for assessment in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12 below …"

411. Addressing Lord Goldsmith's view that he did not "find much difference" between the French text and the final wording of OP4, Mr Straw stated that there was "all the difference in the world". The French text[160] "would have given the Security Council … the exclusive right to determine whether there had been an OP4 further material breach". The US and UK had resisted that.

412. Mr Straw also challenged Lord Goldsmith's view that the Council "must" assess whether a breach was material. That was "to ignore both the negotiating history and the wording. We were deliberate in not specifying who would determine that there had been a material breach."

413. Addressing the meaning of the term "for assessment", Mr Straw wrote that OP4 itself offered "meaning by the following words 'in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12 below'." OP12 provided that the Council would "consider the situation", which Mr Straw argued stopped short of "decide". Assessment was not, as Lord Goldsmith had characterised it, "a procedural 'formality'". That would be "to parody what we had in mind; but certainly a process in which the outcome was quite deliberately at large". The resolution had given the F/R/C:

> "… further discussions and time, further reports – and an ability to influence events, in return for no automatic second resolution being necessary. And in return – a major US concession – the US/UK agreed not to rely on 1441 as an authorisation for the use of force immediately after its adoption (so called automaticity)."

414. Mr Straw concluded:

> "Putting all this together, I think the better interpretation of the scheme laid out in 1441 is that (i) the fact of the material breach, (ii) (possibly) a further UNMOVIC report and (iii) 'consideration' in the Council together revive 678. At the very least, this interpretation, which coincides with our firm policy intention and that of our co-sponsors, deserves to be given the same weight as a view which in effect hands the F/R/C the very legal prize they failed to achieve in the negotiation of 1441."

415. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that he had "spent some time drafting" his letter to Lord Goldsmith, and that:

> "Obviously I'm pretty certain that Sir Jeremy Greenstock would have seen the draft and his legal adviser Iain Macleod, certainly Peter Ricketts … But … I then put it together from the negotiating history …"[161]

Further advice on a second resolution

416. Lord Goldsmith was asked on 4 February for urgent advice on a second resolution determining that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered in resolution 1441.

417. Following a number of bilateral contacts about the nature of the second resolution, Mr Grainger wrote to Ms Adams on 4 February warning that the indications were that some key Security Council members, "such as France", might not be persuaded that the Council should adopt even an "implicit" resolution that mentioned material breach. Mr Grainger sought Lord Goldsmith's views "as soon as possible" on the elements of a second resolution necessary to make clear that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity provided in resolution 1441 and that serious consequences would follow.[162]

418. After rehearsing the key provisions of OPs 1, 2, 4, 11, 12 and 13, Mr Grainger wrote:

> "… the relationship between these various paragraphs is a matter of some complexity. It is however clear that the serious consequences which the Council has repeatedly warned Iraq it will face as a result of its continued violations of its obligations … are to occur in the context of paragraph 12 – that is following consideration of the situation by the Council in accordance with that paragraph. The consideration … can take place only when a report – either of a material breach under paragraph 4, or of the interference or failure to comply mentioned in paragraph 11 – has been made.
> "In our view once Council consideration has taken place, a specific reference to material breach is not required in any decision by the Council: what is necessary is that the Council should conclude that the serious consequences for Iraq referred to in paragraph 13 are triggered. If the Council has considered a report under paragraph 4, the finding of material breach will be implicit. If … the Council has considered a report under paragraph 11, it will be clear that the new enhanced inspections regime has not worked and therefore the material breach finding in paragraph 1 is still operative."

[162] Letter Grainger to Adams, 4 February 2003, 'Iraq: Second Resolution'.

419. Ms Adams responded on 6 February that Lord Goldsmith had agreed that:

> "Provided the new resolution is linked back sufficiently to resolution 1441 so that it is clear that the Council has concluded that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity granted by resolution 1441, it should be possible to rely on the finding of material breach in that resolution in order to revive the use of force in resolution 678."[163]

420. Addressing draft text suggested by Mr Grainger, Ms Adams also recorded that Lord Goldsmith:

> "… has some doubts about the generality of the wording 'Iraq has still not complied' because not every incident of non-compliance will constitute a further material breach under OP4 of resolution 1441 (see for example statements by the Foreign Secretary to Parliament[164]). Moreover, the Attorney recalls that Blix has indicated that only serious cases of non-compliance would be reported to the Council under OP11."

421. Ms Adams suggested that a better minimalist version for a resolution would be one which:

> "… stated simply that the Council has concluded that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441. This would indicate that the finding of material breach in OP1 of resolution 1441 is no longer suspended, thus reviving the authorisation to use force in resolution 678. In this case there would be no need for an operative paragraph on 'serious consequences' because this would follow from the terms of resolution 1441."[165]

Lord Goldsmith's visit to Washington, 10 February 2003

422. Lord Goldsmith's discussions in Washington on 10 February confirmed that the US position was that Iraq was in material breach of resolution 1441 and the conditions for the cease-fire were, therefore, no longer in place.

423. The US maintained that the Security Council had already considered that fact as required by OP12.

424. The US Administration attached importance to helping the UK find a way to join them in action against Iraq.

425. As discussed with No.10, Lord Goldsmith travelled to Washington, accompanied by Ms Adams, to meet leading US lawyers involved in the negotiation of resolution 1441 on 10 February 2003.

[164] House of Commons, Official Report, 25 November 2002, column 51.
[165] Letter Adams to Grainger, 6 February 2003, 'Iraq: Second Resolution'.

426. Lord Goldsmith met Mr John Bellinger III (the NSC Legal Adviser), Judge Alberto Gonzales (Counsel to the President), Dr Rice, Mr William Taft IV (Legal Adviser at the State Department), Mr Marc Grossman (Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs) and Mr William Haynes II (General Counsel at the DoD).[166]

427. Ms Adams' record of the discussions set out the questions which had been addressed and the US responses, including:

- Resolution 1441 contained two determinations of material breach (in OPs 1 and 4) and the US view was that the conditions of OP4 had already been met. There was, therefore, a Security Council determination of material breach by Iraq, meaning that the conditions for the cease-fire were no longer in place.
- The use of the term "material breach" had been avoided in 1998. Its use in resolution 1441 strengthened the argument that the Council intended to revive resolution 678.
- The use of the term "co-operate fully" had been retained in the resolution in order to ensure that any instances of non-co-operation would be material. In the US view, "any" Iraqi non-compliance was sufficient to constitute a material breach.
- The US recognised the UK's concerns about de minimis breaches (eg an hour's delay in getting access to a site), but considered that the situation was "well past" that point.
- The inspectors were "reporters not assessors".
- The US would not have accepted a resolution implying that a further decision was required.
- OP12 was not a "purely procedural requirement". The members of the Council were "under a good faith obligation to participate in the further consideration of the matter within the meaning of OP12".
- The US had satisfied that requirement by the actions they had already taken, for example Secretary Powell's report to the Council on 5 February.[167]

428. Mr Brenton commented that there had been "no problem lining up a good range of senior interlocutors" for Lord Goldsmith to meet, "underlining how important the Administration consider it to help the UK to be in a position to join them in action against Iraq".[168]

[168] Letter Brenton to Goldsmith, 11 February 2003, 'Visit to Washington, January [sic] 10; Iraq'.

429. Mr Brenton subsequently reported on 6 March that the US "had also gained the impression that we need the resolution for legal reasons: I explained the real situation".[169]

430. Asked by the Inquiry what he had understood "the real situation" to be, Mr Brenton said that Lord Goldsmith had not told him anything, but he had sat in on Lord Goldsmith's conversations with the US Attorney General and "got the impression from him [Lord Goldsmith] that there was a legal case for our involvement, even if we didn't get the second resolution".[170]

431. Ms Adams produced a revised draft for Lord Goldsmith on 12 February, which for the first time concluded:

> "… having regard to the arguments of our co-sponsors which I heard in Washington, I am prepared to accept that a reasonable case can be made that resolution 1441 revives the authorisation to use force in resolution 678."[171]

Agreement on a second resolution

432. Following discussion between Mr Blair and President Bush on 19 February, the UK agreed a "light draft resolution" with the US.

433. Lord Goldsmith subsequently advised that draft would be "sufficient" to authorise the use of force if it was all that would be negotiable.

434. Lord Goldsmith did not, however, accept the underpinning legal analysis offered by Sir Jeremy Greenstock.

435. Reflecting the seriousness of his concerns about the implications of recent developments, Mr Blair sent President Bush a Note on 19 February about the need for a second resolution (see Section 3.7).

436. Mr Blair proposed focusing on the absence of full co-operation and a "simple" resolution stating that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity, with a side statement defining tough tests of co-operation and a vote on 14 March to provide a deadline for action.

437. Sir Jeremy gave Ambassador John Negroponte, US Permanent Representative to the UN, a revised "light draft resolution" on 19 February which:

- noted [draft preambular paragraph (PP) 5] that Iraq had "submitted a declaration … containing false statements and omissions and has failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of that resolution [1441]"; and

- decided [draft OP1] that Iraq had "failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it in resolution 1441 (2002)".[172]

438. Sir Jeremy reported that he had told Ambassador Negroponte that the draft "was thin on anything with which Council members could argue and would be less frightening to the middle ground". It did not refer to "serious consequences" and that "instead of relying on OP4 of 1441", the draft resolution "relied on OP1 of 1441, re-establishing the material breach suspended in OP2".[173]

439. Sir Jeremy added that issuing the draft would signal the intent to move to a final debate, which they should seek to focus "not on individual elements of co-operation but on the failure by Iraq to voluntarily disarm" and avoid being "thrown off course by individual benchmarks or judgement by Blix". It should be accompanied by a "powerful statement about what 1441 had asked for" which had "been twisted into partial, procedural, and grudging co-operation from Iraq"; and that "substantive, active and voluntary co-operation was not happening".

440. In response to a question from the US about whether the "central premise", that the final opportunity was "now over", would be disputed, Sir Jeremy said that:

> "… was where we would have to define our terms carefully: voluntary disarmament was not happening."

441. Ms Adams wrote to Mr Grainger on 20 February. She thanked him for drawing her attention to the telegrams from Sir Jeremy Greenstock.[174] She pointed out that Lord Goldsmith did "not agree with the legal analysis" in Sir Jeremy Greenstock's first telegram. Lord Goldsmith considered:

> "… that OP4 of resolution 1441 is highly relevant to determining whether or not Iraq has taken the final opportunity granted by OP2 … Moreover, PP5 of the draft text uses language drawn from OP4 to establish the fact that Iraq has failed to comply … the Attorney does not consider that it is accurate to say that the draft text relies on OP1 … rather than OP4."

442. On the draft text, Ms Adams wrote that Lord Goldsmith considered:

> "… it would be preferable for any resolution to indicate as clearly as possible that the resolution is intended to authorise the use of force. The clearer the resolution, the easier it will be to defend legally the reliance on the 'revival argument', which … is … controversial. A resolution which included the terms 'material breach' and 'serious consequences' … would therefore be desirable … However, the Attorney has previously advised that it is not essential in legal terms for a second resolution to include this language. Therefore, if a resolution in the form contained … [in the advice from UKMIS New York] is all that is likely to be negotiable, he considers it would be sufficient …"

A second resolution is tabled

443. Sir Jeremy Greenstock remained concerned about the lack of support in the Security Council and the implications, including the legal implications, of putting the resolution to a vote and failing to get it adopted.

444. A draft of a second resolution was tabled by the UK, US and Spain on 24 February. The draft operative paragraphs stated simply that the Security Council:

- "Decides that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it by resolution 1441."
- "Decides to remain seized of the matter."[175]

445. France, Russia and Germany responded by tabling a memorandum which proposed strengthening inspections and bringing forward the work programme specified in resolution 1284 (1999) and accelerating its timetable.[176]

446. Canada also circulated ideas for a process based on key tasks identified by UNMOVIC.[177]

447. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that in circumstances where there were fewer than nine positive votes but everyone else abstained, the resolution would not be adopted and it would have no legal effect.[178] He found it:

> "… hard to see how we could draw much legal comfort from such an outcome; but an authoritative determination would be a matter for the Law Officers. (Kosovo was different: in that case a Russian draft condemning the NATO action as illegal was heavily defeated, leaving open the claim that the action was lawful … (or at least was so regarded by the majority of the Council).
> "Furthermore, in the current climate … the political mandate to be drawn from a draft which failed to achieve nine positive votes seems to me likely to be (at best) weak … The stark reality would remain that the US and UK had tried and failed to persuade the Council to endorse the use of force against Iraq. And the French

(and the Russians and Chinese) would no doubt be sitting comfortably among the abstainers …

"My feeling … is that our interests are better served by not putting a draft to a vote unless we were sure that it had sufficient votes to be adopted … But we should revisit this issue later – a lot still had to be played out in the Council."

448. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 27 February that he would continue to push for a further Security Council resolution.

449. Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications between May 1997 and August 2003, wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair had had a meeting with Mr Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister, and Mr Straw, "at which we went over the distinct possibility of no second resolution because the majority was not there for it". Mr Blair "knew that meant real problems, but he remained determined on this, and convinced it was the right course".[179]

450. Mr Blair told Cabinet that he would continue to push for a further Security Council resolution.[180] He described the debate in the UK and Parliament as "open":

"Feelings were running high and the concerns expressed were genuine. But decisions had to be made. The central arguments remained the threat posed by weapons of mass destruction in the hands of Iraq; the brutal nature of the Iraqi regime; and the importance of maintaining the authority of the UN in the international order. Failure to achieve a further Security Council resolution would reinforce the hand of the unilateralists in the American Administration."

A "reasonable case"

Lord Goldsmith's meeting with No.10 officials, 27 February 2003

451. When Lord Goldsmith met No.10 officials on 27 February he advised that the safest legal course would be to secure a further Security Council resolution.

452. Lord Goldsmith told them, however, that he had reached the view that a "reasonable case" could be made that resolution 1441 was capable of reviving the authorisation to use force in resolution 678 (1990) without a further resolution, if there were strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441.

453. Lord Goldsmith advised that, to avoid undermining the case for reliance on resolution 1441, it would be important to avoid giving any impression that the UK believed a second resolution was legally required.

[180] Cabinet Conclusions, 27 February 2003.

454. Mr Powell confirmed that No.10 did not wish the Attorney General's advice to "become public".

455. Lord Goldsmith did not inform Mr Straw or Mr Hoon of his change of view.

456. As their responsibilities were directly engaged, they should have been told of Lord Goldsmith's change of position.

457. At the request of No.10, Lord Goldsmith met Mr Powell, Baroness Morgan and Sir David Manning on 27 February.[181]

458. Ms Adams advised Lord Goldsmith that the purpose of the meeting was to "discuss the French veto", which she interpreted as meaning "the scope for action in the absence of a second resolution".

459. Ms Adams provided a speaking note for Lord Goldsmith, setting out the legal arguments in detail, including:

- the discussions with Mr Straw, Sir Jeremy Greenstock and the US Administration "were valuable" and had given Lord Goldsmith "background information on the negotiating history" which he had "not previously had";
- the US discussions were "particularly useful" as they gave "a clearer insight into the important US/French bilateral discussions over the terms of OP12 of resolution 1441";
- that was "relevant to the interpretation of the resolution";
- while the revival argument was "controversial", Lord Goldsmith had "already made clear" that he agreed with the advice of his predecessors that it provided "a valid legal basis for the use of force provided that the conditions for revival" were "satisfied";
- the "arguments in support of the revival argument" were "stronger following adoption of resolution 1441";
- "elements" of resolution 1441 indicated that the Security Council "intended to revive the authorisation in [resolution] 678";
- but the Council "clearly … did not intend 678 to revive immediately";
- the procedure set out in OPs 4,11 and 12 "for determining whether or not Iraq has taken the final opportunity" were "somewhat ambiguous";
- it was "clear" that if Iraq did not comply there would be "a further Council discussion" but it was "not clear what happens next";
- it was "arguable" that OPs 4 and 12 indicated that "a further Council decision" was "required";
- Lord Goldsmith had been "impressed" by the "strength and sincerity" of the US view that they had "conceded a Council discussion and no more";

[181] Minute Adams to Attorney General, 26 February 2003, 'Iraq: Meeting at No.10, 27 February'.

- the difficulty of relying on the assertions of US officials that the French knew and accepted what they were voting for when there was little "hard evidence beyond a couple of telegrams recording admissions by French negotiators that they knew the US would not accept a resolution which required a further Council decision";
- "the possibility remains that the French and others accepted OP12 because in their view it gave them a sufficient basis on which to argue that a second resolution was required (even if that was not made expressly clear)"; and
- the statements made on adoption of the resolution indicated that "there were differing views within the Council as to the legal effect of the resolution".[182]

460. Lord Goldsmith was advised to state that he remained "of the view that the safest legal course would be to secure a further Security Council resolution" which, as he had advised the FCO, need not explicitly authorise the use of force as long as it made clear that the Council had "concluded that Iraq has not taken its final opportunity".

461. Ms Adams advised that he should further state:

> "Nevertheless, having regard to the further information on the negotiating history which I have been given and to the arguments of the US administration which I heard in Washington, I am prepared to accept – and I am choosing my words carefully here – that a reasonable case can be made that resolution 1441 is capable of reviving the authorisation in 678 without a further resolution if there are strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity. In other words we would need to demonstrate hard evidence of non-compliance and non-co-operation."

462. Lord Goldsmith was also advised:

- that a court "might well conclude" that OPs 4 and 12 did "require a further Council decision", but that "the counter view can reasonably be maintained";
- that the analysis applied "whether a second resolution fails to be adopted because of a lack of votes or because it is vetoed. I do not see any difference between the two cases"; and
- it was "important that in the course of negotiations on the second resolution we do not give the impression that we believe it is legally required. That would undermine our case for reliance on resolution 1441".

463. There is no No.10 record of the 27 February meeting.

464. In his record of a telephone call from Lord Goldsmith reporting the meeting, Mr Brummell wrote that Lord Goldsmith "confirmed that he had deployed in full" the lines prepared by Ms Adams, with the exception of the reference to the fact that "on a number of previous occasions" the Government had engaged in military action on a legal basis that was no more than "reasonably arguable".[183]

---

[182] Minute Adams to Attorney General, 27 February 2003, 'Iraq: Lines to Take for No 10 Meeting'.

465. Mr Brummell also wrote:

> "Jonathan Powell said that he understood the Attorney's advice in summary to mean that by far the safest way forward is to obtain a second resolution, but that, if we are unable to obtain one, it might be arguable that we do not need one, although we could not be confident that a court would agree with this.
> "The No.10 representatives confirmed that the US and UK Governments were continuing with their intensive efforts to secure the passage of a second resolution, if at all possible.
> "Jonathan Powell confirmed that No.10 did not wish the Attorney's advice to become public."

466. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that he did not really remember the meeting.[184]

467. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he did not know why he had not informed No.10 that there was a reasonable case before 27 February. He said:

> "After I came back from the United States … I had taken the view there was a reasonable case. A draft was produced which reflected that. I don't know why it took me until 27 February, but that may have been the first time there was a meeting. I met with Jonathan Powell, Sir David Manning and Baroness Morgan and told them that I had been very much assisted in my considerations by Jeremy Greenstock, the Americans – I may have mentioned Jack Straw as well, and I was able to tell them that it was my view that there was a reasonable case."[185]

468. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "Obviously, I had prepared what I was going to say. Then – so I told them – and I had given them, therefore, as I saw it, and as I believe they saw it … the green light, if you will, that it was lawful to take military action, should there not be a second resolution and should it be politically decided that that was the right course to take."

469. Lord Goldsmith identified three main influences on his thinking which contributed to the change in his position by the end of February that a reasonable case could be made that resolution 1441 authorised the use of force without the requirement for a further resolution:

- the meeting with Sir Jeremy Greenstock on 23 January;

[183] Minute Brummell, 27 February 2003, 'Iraq: Attorney General's Meeting at No. 10 on 27th February 2003'.
[184] Public hearing, 18 January 2010, page 104.
[185] Public hearing, 27 January 2010, pages 130-131.

- the views of Mr Straw as expressed in his letter of 6 February 2003; and
- meetings in the US on 10 February.

470. Lord Goldsmith described the purpose of his meeting with Sir Jeremy as:

> "… to get first-hand from our principal negotiator at the United Nations his observations on the negotiating history and on the text which had been agreed and his understanding of what it meant, particularly to get his comments on the textual arguments we had raised.
> " … It doesn't mean I follow it, but it is helpful to me … because if you understand what somebody is trying to achieve, you can then often look at the document with that in mind, and then the words which are used become clearer to you."[186]

471. Lord Goldsmith also told the Inquiry that Sir Jeremy:

> "… was very clear in saying the French, Russians lost and they knew they had lost … and his argument was – that's why the resolution is worded the way that it is.
> "… It was a compromise, but compromise in this sense: that the United States had conceded a Council discussion but no more."[187]

472. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "Sir Jeremy had made some good points and he had made some headway with me, but, frankly there was still work for me to do and he hadn't got me there, if you like, yet."[188]

473. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that his letter of 6 February to Lord Goldsmith, was "really the sum" of what he had said.[189]

474. Following his meetings in the US on 10 February, Lord Goldsmith was impressed by the fact that, in negotiating 1441, the US had a single red line which was not to lose the freedom of action to use force that they believed they had before 1441, and their certainty that they had not done so.

475. Asked to explain how the US belief that it had preserved its "red line" had influenced his considerations, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that all his US interlocutors had spoken with one voice on the issue of the interpretation of 1441:

> "The discussion involved some detailed textual questions … On one point they were absolutely speaking with one voice, which is they were very clear that what mattered to them, what mattered to President Bush, is whether they would … concede a veto … that the red line was that they shouldn't do that, and they were confident that they had not …

"… [T]he red line was 'We believe' they were saying 'that we have a right to go without this resolution. We have been persuaded to come to the United Nations' … 'but the one thing that mustn't happen is that by going down this route, we then find we lose the freedom of action we think we now have' and if the resolution had said there must be a further decision by the Security Council, that's what it would have done, and the United States would have been tied into that.

"They were all very, very clear that was the most important point to them and that they hadn't conceded that, and they were very clear that the French understood that, that they said that they had discussed this with other members of the Security Council as well and they all understood that was the position."[190]

476. Lord Goldsmith stated:

"It was frankly, quite hard to believe, given what I had been told about the one red line that President Bush had, that all these experienced lawyers and negotiators in the United States could actually have stumbled into doing the one thing that they had been told mustn't happen … a red line means a red line. It was the only one, I was told, that mattered. They didn't mind what else went into the resolution, so long as it did not provide a veto, and if it required a decision then one of the Security Council members, perhaps the French, could then have vetoed action by the United States, which, up to that point, they believed they could take in any event."[191]

477. Asked whether his US interlocutors had been able to provide him with any evidence that France had acknowledged the US position, Lord Goldsmith replied:

"I wish they had presented me with more. That was one of the difficulties, and I make reference to this, that, at the end of the day we were sort of dependent upon their view in relation to that … I looked very carefully at all the negotiating telegrams and I had seen that there were some acknowledgements of that, acknowledgements that the French understood the United States' position, at least, in telegrams that I had seen, and I was told of occasions when this had been clearly stated to the French."[192]

478. Correspondence between Ms Adams and the British Embassy Washington recorded that Lord Goldsmith had asked the US lawyers if they had any evidence that the French had acknowledged that no second resolution was needed, and the US lawyers had offered to check. The subsequent reply was that, although they had made their position abundantly clear to the French, the US lawyers had been unable to find a statement from the French acknowledging that a second resolution would not be needed.[193]

479. Asked if he should also have sought the views of the French, Lord Goldsmith replied:

> "No I couldn't do that. I plainly could not have done that … because, there we were, plainly by this stage, in a major diplomatic stand-off between the United States and France … you couldn't have had the British Attorney General being seen to go to the French to ask them 'What do you think?' The message that that would have given Saddam Hussein about the degree of our commitment would have been huge."[194]

480. Others had a different view.

481. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that if Lord Goldsmith "had asked to talk to the French, of course, we would have facilitated that … I have no recollection of that ever being raised with me at all".[195]

482. Asked about Lord Goldsmith's evidence that he could not speak to French officials about the interpretation of resolution 1441, Sir John Holmes, British Ambassador to France from 2002 to 2007, replied:

> "I don't see why he couldn't have done, or at least somebody else ask the question on his behalf. But I think what is true is that the French were, again, very wary about ever saying what their own legal position was. They took a very strong political position about no automaticity … but they were very careful, I don't remember them ever actually saying what their own legal position was."[196]

483. Asked whether the legal position would have mattered as much to the French as it did to us, Sir John responded: "No because the automatic assumption increasingly was that they weren't going to be part of it."[197]

Mr Straw's evidence to the Foreign Affairs Committee, 4 March 2003

484. Mr Straw told the Foreign Affairs Committee on 4 March that it was "a matter of fact" that Iraq had been in material breach "for some weeks" and resolution 1441 provided sufficient legal authority to justify military action against Iraq if it was "in further material breach".

485. Mr Straw also stated that a majority of members of the Security Council had been opposed to the suggestion that resolution 1441 should state explicitly that military action could be taken only if there were a second resolution.

486. In his evidence to the FAC on 4 March, Mr Straw was asked a series of questions by Mr Donald Anderson, the Chairman of the Committee, about the legality of military action without a second resolution.[198]

487. Asked about Mr Blair's "escape clause" and that the Government "would not feel bound to await" a second resolution "or to abide by it if it were to be vetoed unreasonably", Mr Straw replied:

> "The reason why we have drawn a parallel with Kosovo is … it was not possible to get a direct Security Council resolution and instead the Government and those that participated in the action had to fall back on previous … resolutions and general international law … to justify the action that was taken … We are satisfied that we have sufficient legal authority in 1441 back to the originating resolution 660 [1990] … to justify military action against Iraq if they are in further material breach."

488. Mr Straw added that that was "clearly laid down and it was anticipated when we put 1441 together". The Government would "much prefer" military action, if that proved necessary, "to be backed by a second resolution", but it had had to reserve its options if such a second resolution did not prove possible. That was what Mr Blair had "spelt out".

489. Asked if the Government should proceed without the express authority of the UN, Mr Straw replied:

> "We believe there is express authority … There was a … a very intensive debate – about whether … 1441 should say explicitly … that military action to enforce this resolution could only be taken if there were a second resolution. That … was not acceptable to a majority of members of the Security Council, it was never put before the … Council. Instead … what the Council has to do … is to consider the situation …"

490. Mr Straw told Sir Patrick Cormack (Conservative) that Iraq had "been in material breach as a matter of fact for some weeks now because they were told they had to co-operate immediately, unconditionally and actively". He added:

> "… we are anxious to gain a political consensus, if that can be achieved … which recognises the state of Iraq's flagrant violation of its obligations. As far as … the British Government is concerned, that is a matter of fact; the facts speak for themselves."[199]

[199] Minutes, 4 March 2003, Foreign Affairs Committee (House of Commons), [Evidence Session], Q 154.

491. Asked by Mr Andrew Mackinley (Labour) how there was going to be "proper conscious decision-making" about whether Iraq was complying, Mr Straw replied:

> "… we make our judgement on the basis of the best evidence. I have to say it was on the basis of the best evidence that the international community made its judgement on 8 November. They had hundreds of pages of reports …"[200]

Sir Jeremy Greenstock's advice on "end game options", 4 March 2003

492. In his advice "on the end game options", Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that there was little chance of bridging the gap with the French – "senior politicians were dug in too deep"; and that a French veto appeared "more of a danger than failure to get nine votes".[201]

493. Sir Jeremy identified the options as:

- "stay firm … and go with the US military campaign in the second half of March with the best arguments we can muster if a second resolution … is unobtainable, we fall back on 1441 and regret that the UN was not up to it …";
- "make some small concessions that might just be enough to get, e.g. Chile and Mexico on board". The "most obvious step" might be "ultimatum language" making military action the default if the Council did not agree that Iraq had come into compliance with resolution 1441;
- "try something on benchmarks, probably building on Blix's cluster document". That "would be better done outside the draft resolution" to "avoid diluting 1441 (and avoid placing too much weight on Blix's shoulders)"; and
- "putting forward a second resolution not authorising force", although it was clear that Sir Jeremy envisaged there would be an "eventual use of force".

494. Sir Jeremy commented: "In the end, it may be best just to forge ahead on present lines."

495. Mr Ricketts told Mr Straw that he and Sir David Manning had discussed Sir Jeremy's advice and believed that the "best package" might comprise:

- adding a deadline to the draft resolution requiring "a bit more time". A US suggestion "that Iraq should have 'unconditionally disarmed' in ten days" would be "seen as unreasonable";
- a small number of carefully chosen benchmarks "set out separately from the resolution, ideally by the Chileans and Mexicans … We could then use the clusters document to illustrate how little compliance there had been across the board"; and

- the US to make clear that it "accepted a significant UN role in post-conflict Iraq".[202]

496. Mr Grainger sent a copy of Mr Ricketts' advice to Mr Straw to Ms Adams, setting out the ultimatum language under consideration which he thought "would be entirely consistent with the advice previously given by the Attorney", including the need for any ultimatum to be expressed in very clear terms so that there was no room for doubt about whether Iraq had met the Council's demands.[203]

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 5 March 2003

497. In the light of the failure to secure support for the draft resolution of 24 February , Mr Blair proposed a revised strategy to President Bush on 5 March.

498. Despite Lord Goldsmith's previous advice that, if a further resolution was vetoed, there would be no Council authorisation for military action, Mr Blair told President Bush that, if nine votes could be secured, military action in the face of a veto would be "politically and legally … acceptable".

499. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on 5 March proposing further amendment to the draft resolution to give members of the Security Council a reason to support the US/UK approaches.[204]

500. Mr Blair said that an ultimatum should include a deadline of 10 days from the date of the resolution for the Security Council to decide that: "Unless … Iraq is complying by [no date specified], then Iraq is in material breach."

501. Mr Blair stated that if there were nine votes but a French veto, he thought that "politically and legally" UK participation in military action would be acceptable. "But if we did not get nine votes, such participation might be legal", but he would face major obstacles. It would be "touch and go".

Advice on the effect of a "veto"

502. In response to a request from Mr Straw about "whether it was possible for a Permanent Member of the Security Council to vote against a resolution while making it clear that this negative vote shall not be regarded as a 'veto'", Mr Wood advised that the "short answer is 'no'".[205]

503. Lord Goldsmith's draft advice of 14 January stated explicitly that the exercise of a veto in relation to a further Security Council decision would mean "no Council authorisation for military action".[206]

504. Ms Adams described the purpose of the meeting between Lord Goldsmith and No.10 officials on 27 February as to "discuss the French veto", and her advice dismissed the concept of an "unreasonable" veto. The advice and Lord Goldsmith's subsequent account to Mr Brummell of the discussion did not address the question of the legality of action in the face of a veto.

505. Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary, raised the absence of an agreed legal basis for military action with Sir Andrew Turnbull on 5 March.

506. Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Sir Andrew Turnbull on 5 March stating:

> "I am sure you have this in hand already, but in case it might help, I should like to offer you my thoughts on the procedure for handling the legal basis for any offensive operations … in Iraq – a subject touching on my responsibilities since it is the CDS [Chief of the Defence Staff] who will need to be assured that he will be acting on the basis of a lawful instruction from the Prime Minister and the Defence Secretary.
> "It is not possible to be certain about the precise circumstances in which this would arise because we cannot be sure about the UN scenario involved … Clearly full UN cover is devoutly to be desired – and not just for the military operation itself …
> "My purpose in writing, however, is not to argue the legal merits of the case … but to flag up … that the call to action from President Bush could come at quite short notice and that we need to be prepared to handle the legalities so we can deliver …
> "In these circumstances, I suggest that the Prime Minister should be prepared to convene a special meeting of the inner 'war' Cabinet (Defence and Foreign Secretaries certainly, Chancellor, DPM [Deputy Prime Minister], Home Secretary possibly, Attorney General, crucially) at which CDS effectively receives his legal and constitutional authorisation. We have already given the Attorney General information and MOD briefings on objectives and rationale, and I understand that John Scarlett [Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC)] is conducting further briefing on the basis of the intelligence material.

> "While it is not possible to predict the timing of the event precisely … [it] could conceivably be as early as 10 March … in the event, albeit unlikely, that the Americans lost hope in the UN and move fast. Michael Jay may have a better fix on this, but I guess the more likely timing would be for Security Council action around the weekend of 15/16 March, and therefore for a meeting after that."[207]

507. Copies of the letter were sent to Sir Michael Jay and Sir David Manning.

508. Sir Michael commented that both Adml Boyce and General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff, had told him that they would need "explicit legal authorisation". Sir Kevin's proposal "would be one way of achieving this: though the timetable looks a bit leisurely".[208]

509. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair, through Mr Powell, that he should have an early meeting to discuss the issues.[209]

510. Mr Blair agreed.[210]

Cabinet, 6 March 2003

511. At Cabinet on 6 March, Mr Blair concluded that it was for the Security Council to determine whether Iraq was co-operating fully.

512. Summing up the discussion at Cabinet on 6 March, Mr Blair said it was "the responsibility of the Chief Inspectors to present the truth about Saddam Hussein's co-operation with the United Nations, so that the Security Council could discharge its responsibilities in making the necessary political decisions". The UK was "lobbying hard in favour of the draft Security Council resolution". It was the duty of Saddam Hussein to co-operate fully, "and it was for the Security Council to determine whether that had been the case".[211]

513. A revised resolution was tabled in the Security Council on 7 March (See the Box below).

514. Mr Straw asked, on behalf of the UK, US and Spain as co-sponsors, for a revised draft of the second resolution to be circulated.[212]

UK/US/Spanish draft resolution, 7 March 2003

The draft resolution recalled the provisions of previous Security Council resolutions on Iraq and noted that:

- The Council had "repeatedly warned Iraq that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations"; and
- Iraq had "submitted a declaration … containing false statements and omissions and has failed to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, that resolution".

The draft stated that the Council:

- "Mindful of its primary responsibility under the Charter … for the maintenance of international peace and stability;

Lord Goldsmith's advice, 7 March 2003

515. Lord Goldsmith submitted formal advice to Mr Blair on 7 March, in which he noted that he had been asked for advice on the legality of military action against Iraq without another resolution of the Security Council, further to resolution 1441.[213]

516. Lord Goldsmith identified three possible bases for the use of military force. He explained that neither self-defence nor the use of force to avert overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe applied in this case.

517. As regards the third basis, he wrote that force may be used:

> "… where this is authorised by the UN Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. The key question is whether resolution 1441 has the effect of providing such authorisation …"

518. He wrote:

> "As you are aware, the argument that resolution 1441 itself provides the authorisation to use force depends on the revival of the express authorisation to use force given in 1990 by Security Council Resolution 678."

[213] Minute Goldsmith to Prime Minister, 7 March 2003, 'Iraq: Resolution 1441'.

519. Lord Goldsmith posed and answered two questions. First, he considered whether the revival argument was a sound legal basis in principle. Second, he considered the question of whether resolution 1441 had the effect of reviving the authority to use military force in resolution 678 (1990).

The revival argument – a sound basis "in principle"

520. Lord Goldsmith set out the basic principles of the revival argument and described how, in January 1993 (following UN Presidential Statements condemning particular failures by Iraq to observe the terms of the cease-fire resolution) and again in December 1998 (for Operation Desert Fox), following a series of Security Council resolutions, notably 1205 (1998), the use of force had relied on the revival argument.

521. He wrote:

> "Law Officers have advised in the past that, provided the conditions are made out, the revival argument does provide a sufficient justification in international law for the use of force against Iraq."

522. Having referred to the opinion, expressed in August 1992, by then UN Legal Counsel, Carl-August Fleischauer, as supportive of the UK view, Lord Goldsmith continued:

> "However, the UK has consistently taken the view (as did the Fleischauer opinion) that as the cease-fire conditions were set by the Security Council in resolution 687, it is for the Council to assess whether any such breach of those obligations has occurred.
> "The US have a rather different view: they maintain that the fact of whether Iraq is in breach is a matter of objective fact which may therefore be assessed by individual Member States. I am not aware of any other state which supports this view. This is an issue of critical importance when considering the effect of resolution 1441."

523. Lord Goldsmith concluded:

> "The revival argument is controversial. It is not widely accepted among academic commentators. However, I agree with my predecessors' advice on this issue. Further, I believe that the arguments in support of the revival argument are stronger following adoption of resolution 1441."

524. Lord Goldsmith explained that this was because of the terms of the resolution and the negotiations which led to its adoption. He noted that PPs 4, 5 and 10 of the resolution recalled "the authorisation to use force in resolution 678 and that resolution 687 imposed obligations on Iraq as a necessary condition of the cease-fire"; that OP 1 provided that Iraq had been and remained in material breach of relevant resolutions including resolution 687; and that OP13 recalled that Iraq had been "warned repeatedly" that "serious consequences" would "result from continued violations of its obligations".

525. Lord Goldsmith noted:

> "… Previous practice of the Council and statements made by Council members during the negotiation of resolution 1441 demonstrate that the phrase 'material breach' signifies a finding by the Council of a sufficiently serious breach of the cease-fire conditions to revive the authorisation in resolution 678 and that 'serious consequences' is accepted as indicating the use of force."

526. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> " … I disagree, therefore, with those commentators and lawyers who assert that nothing less than an explicit authorisation to use force in a Security Council resolution will be sufficient."

The revival argument – the effect of resolution 1441 (2002)

527. Having accepted the validity of the revival argument Lord Goldsmith addressed the question of whether resolution 1441 was sufficient to revive the authorisation in resolution 678 without an assessment by the Security Council that the basis of the cease-fire established in resolution 687 had been destroyed.

528. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "In order for the authorisation to use force in resolution 678 to be revived, there needs to be a determination by the Security Council that there is a violation of the conditions of the cease-fire and that the Security Council considers it sufficiently serious to destroy the basis of the cease-fire. Revival will not, however, take place, notwithstanding a finding of violation, if the Security Council has made clear either that action short of the use of force should be taken to ensure compliance with the terms of the cease-fire, or that it intends to decide subsequently what action is required to ensure compliance."

529. He continued:

> "Notwithstanding the determination of material breach in OP1 of resolution 1441, it is clear that the Council did not intend that the authorisation in resolution 678 should revive immediately following the adoption of resolution 1441, since OP2 of the resolution affords Iraq a 'final opportunity' to comply with its disarmament obligations under previous resolutions by co-operating with the enhanced inspection regime described in OPs 3 and 5-9. But OP2 also states that the Council has determined that compliance with resolution 1441 is Iraq's last chance before the cease-fire resolution will be enforced."

530. On that basis, Lord Goldsmith expressed the view that:

> "OP2 has the effect therefore of suspending the legal consequences of the OP1 determination of material breach which would otherwise have triggered the revival of the authorisation in resolution 678. The narrow but key question is: on the true interpretation of resolution 1441, what has the Security Council decided will be the consequences of Iraq's failure to comply with the enhanced regime."

531. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

"… without a firebreak, they [members of the Security Council] understood from past practice, from what happened in 1998 after resolution 1205, that the United States and the United Kingdom, and perhaps other states, would have then taken that as saying 'We now have the authority of the United Nations to move today'."[214]

532. Lord Goldsmith identified OPs 4, 11 and 12 as the provisions relevant to the question of whether or not Iraq had taken the final opportunity:

"It is clear from the text of the resolution, and is apparent from the negotiating history, that if Iraq fails to comply, there will be a further Security Council discussion. The text is, however, ambiguous and unclear on what happens next."

533. On that question, Lord Goldsmith identified and summarised the "two competing arguments":

- "that provided there is a Council discussion, if it does not reach a conclusion, there remains an authorisation to use force"; or
- "that nothing short of a further Council decision will be a legitimate basis for the use of force".

The first line of argument

534. The first line of argument maintained that, provided there was a Council discussion, whether conclusive or not, there remained an authorisation to use force.

535. It relied on the following steps:

- Iraq had been found to be in material breach of relevant resolutions including resolutions 678 and 687. Its violations were therefore, in principle, sufficient to revive the authorisation to use force in resolution 678.
- Iraq had been given a final opportunity to comply and had been warned that it would face serious consequences if it did not do so.
- OP4 of resolution 1441 had the effect of determining in advance that any false statements by Iraq in its declaration and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of the resolution would constitute a further material breach and would thus revive the authority which had been suspended without any further determination by the Security Council.

- It was necessary, however, for the Security Council to meet "to consider the situation.
- As the resolution had not specified that the Security Council should "decide" what action should be taken, such a meeting would provide an opportunity for further action by the Security Council, but it was not essential that it reach a decision. Once the procedural requirement was satisfied, the authority to take military action in resolution 678 was, once again, fully revived.

The second line of argument

536. The second line of argument focused, by contrast, on the words in OP4 ("and will be reported to the Council for assessment in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12 below") and on the requirement in OP12 for the Security Council to "consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all of the relevant Council resolutions in order to secure international peace and security". According to the second line of argument, these provisions implied a return to the Security Council for a decision.

537. Lord Goldsmith wrote that one view in support of the second line of argument was that the wording of OP4 "indicated the need for an assessment by the Security Council of how serious any Iraqi breaches [were] and whether any Iraqi breaches [were] sufficiently serious to destroy the basis of the cease-fire". He pointed out that this had been the position taken by Mr Straw when he told Parliament on 25 November that "material breach means something significant; some behaviour or pattern of behaviour where any single action appears relatively minor but the action as a whole adds up to something more deliberate and significant: something that shows Iraq's intention not to comply". If that was so, the question was by whom such an assessment was to be carried out. Lord Goldsmith noted that, according to the UK view of the revival argument, it could only be the Security Council.

538. Lord Goldsmith set out the counter position as:

> "If OP4 means what it says: the words 'co-operate fully' were included specifically to ensure that any instances of non-co-operation would amount to material breach. This is the US analysis of OP4 and is undoubtedly more consistent with the view that no further decision of the Council is necessary to authorise force, because it can be argued that the Council has determined in advance that any failure will be a material breach."

539. Lord Goldsmith advised that the critical issue was, nonetheless, what was to happen when a report came to the Security Council under OP4 or OP11. "In other words", he wrote, "what does OP12 require".

The significance of OP12

540. Lord Goldsmith noted that the language of OP12 was a compromise and was unclear. But it did provide that there should be a meeting of the Council "to consider the situation and the need for compliance in order to secure international peace and security".

541. Thus, Lord Goldsmith observed, the Security Council was provided with an opportunity to take a further decision expressly authorising the use of force or, "conceivably, to decide that other enforcement measures should be used". If it did not do so, however, he stated that the "clear US view" was that "the determination" of material breach in OPs 1 and 4 would remain valid, thus authorising the use of force without a further decision.

542. Lord Goldsmith wrote that his view was:

> "… that different considerations apply in different circumstances. The OP12 discussion might make clear that the Council view is that military action is appropriate but that no further decision is required because of the terms of resolution 1441. In such a case, there would be good grounds for relying on the existing resolution as the legal basis for any subsequent military action. The more difficult scenario is if the views of Council members are divided and a further resolution is not adopted either because it fails to attract 9 votes or because it is vetoed."

543. Lord Goldsmith rehearsed the arguments for and against the view that, in those circumstances, no further decision of the Security Council was needed to authorise the use of force.

544. He identified the principal argument in favour of this interpretation to be that the word "consider" had been chosen deliberately and that French and Russian proposals to amend this provision so that the Security Council should be required to "decide" what was to happen had not been accepted.

545. Lord Goldsmith wrote that he had been impressed by the strength and sincerity of the views of the US Administration on this point. At the same time, "the difficulty" was that the UK was "reliant" on US "assertions" that France and others:

> "… knew and accepted that they were voting for a further discussion and no more. We have very little evidence of this beyond a couple of telegrams recording admissions by French negotiators that they knew the US would not accept a resolution which required a Council decision. The possibility remains that the French and others accepted OP12 because in their view it gave them a sufficient basis on which to argue that a second resolution was required (even if that was not made expressly clear)."

546. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "A further difficulty is that, if the matter ever came before a court, it is very uncertain to what extent the court would accept evidence of the negotiating history to support a particular interpretation of the resolution, given that most of the negotiations were conducted in private and there are no agreed or official records."

547. Lord Goldsmith identified three arguments in support of the view that a further decision was needed:

- The word "assessment" in OP4 and the language of OP12 indicated that the Council would be assessing the seriousness of any Iraqi breach.
- There was special significance in the words "in order to secure international peace and security" reflecting the responsibility of the Security Council under Article 39 of the UN Charter and it could be argued that the Council was to exercise a determinative role on the issue.
- Any other construction reduced the role of the Security Council to a formality.

548. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "Others have jibbed at this categorisation, but I remain of the opinion that this would be the effect in legal terms of the view that no further resolution is required. The Council would be required to meet, and all members of the Council would be under an obligation to participate in the discussion in good faith, but even if an overwhelming majority of the Council were opposed to the use of force, military action could proceed regardless."

549. Lord Goldsmith pointed out that the statements made by Security Council members on the adoption of resolution 1441, which might be referred to in circumstances when the wording of the resolution was not clear, were not conclusive. He wrote:

> "Only the US explicitly stated that it believed that the resolution did not constrain the use of force by States 'to enforce relevant United Nations resolutions and protect world peace and security' regardless of whether there was a further Security Council decision. Conversely, two other Council members, Mexico and Ireland, made clear that in their view a further decision of the Council was required before the use of force would be authorised. Syria also stated that the resolution should not be interpreted, through certain paragraphs, as authorising any State to use force."

Other arguments rejected

550. Lord Goldsmith rejected the argument that it was possible to establish that Iraq had failed to take its final opportunity through the procedures in OPs 11 and 12 without regard to the words "for assessment" in OP4. He accepted that the words "and shall be reported to the Council for assessment in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12" were added at a late stage, but noted that it was substituted for other language "which would clearly have had the effect of making any finding of material breach subject to a further Council decision". He wrote:

> "It is clear … that any Iraqi conduct which would be sufficient to trigger a report from the inspectors under OP11 would also amount to a failure to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of the resolution and would thus be covered by OP4. In addition, the reference to paragraph 11 in OP4 cannot be ignored. It is not entirely clear what this means, but the most convincing explanation seems to be that it is a recognition that an OP11 inspectors' report would also constitute a report of a further material breach within the meaning of OP4 and would thus be assessed by the Council under OP12."

551. Addressing whether the differences between the US and UK objectives had any impact on the interpretation of resolution 1441, Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "I have considered whether this difference in the underlying legal view means that the effect of the resolution might be different for the US than for the UK, but I have concluded that it does not affect the position. If OP12 of the resolution, properly interpreted, were to mean that a further Council decision was required before force was authorised, this would constrain the US just as much as the UK. It was therefore an essential negotiating point for the US that the resolution should not concede the need for a second resolution. They are convinced that they succeeded."

Lord Goldsmith's conclusions

552. In paragraphs headed "Summary", Lord Goldsmith set out his conclusions.

553. He wrote that the language of resolution 1441:

> "… leaves the position unclear and the statements made on adoption of the resolution suggest that there were differences of view within the Council as to the legal effect of the resolution. Arguments can be made on both sides.
> "A key question is whether there is … a need for an assessment of whether Iraq's conduct constitutes a failure to take the final opportunity or has constituted a failure fully to co-operate within the meaning of OP4 such that the basis of the cease-fire is destroyed. If an assessment is needed of that sort, it would be for the Council to make it.
> "A narrow textual reading of the resolution suggests that sort of assessment is not needed, because the Council has pre-determined the issue. Public statements, on the other hand, say otherwise."

554. Lord Goldsmith wrote that he remained "of the opinion that the safest legal course would be to secure the adoption of a further resolution to authorise the use of force", and that he had "already advised" that he did "not believe that such a resolution need be explicit in its terms" if it established that the Council had "concluded" that Iraq had "failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441".

555. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "Nevertheless, having regard to the information on the negotiating history which I have been given and to the arguments of the US Administration which I heard in Washington, I accept that a reasonable case can be made that resolution 1441 is capable in principle of reviving the authorisation in 678 without a further resolution."

556. Lord Goldsmith added that that would:

> "… only be sustainable if there are strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity. In other words, we would need to be able to demonstrate hard evidence of non-compliance and non-co-operation. Given the structure of the resolution as a whole, the views of UNMOVIC and the IAEA will be highly significant in this respect. In the light of the latest reporting by UNMOVIC, you will need to consider extremely carefully whether the evidence … is sufficiently compelling to justify the conclusion that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity."

557. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "In reaching my conclusions, I have taken account of the fact that on a number of previous occasions, including in relation to Operation Desert Fox in December 1998 and Kosovo in 1999, UK forces have participated in military action on the basis of advice from my predecessors that the legality of the action under international law was no more than reasonably arguable.
> "But a 'reasonable case' does not mean that if the matter ever came before a court I would be confident that the court would agree with this view. I judge that, having regard to the arguments on both sides, and considering the resolution as a whole in the light of the statements made on adoption and subsequently, a court might well conclude that OPs 4 and 12 do require a further Council decision in order to revive the authorisation in resolution 678. But equally I consider that the counter view can reasonably be maintained.
> "However, it must be recognised that on previous occasions when military action was taken on the basis of a reasonably arguable case, the degree of public and Parliamentary scrutiny of the legal issue was nothing like as great as it is today."

558. Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March did not present the "reasonable case" as stronger or "better" than the opposing case.

559. Nevertheless, in making that judgement, Lord Goldsmith took responsibility for a decision that a reasonable case was sufficient to provide the legal basis for the UK Government to take military action in Iraq.

560. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that it was:

> "… very clear that the precedent in the United Kingdom was that a reasonable case was a sufficient lawful basis for taking military action … I checked this at the time, because this is what I had been told by my officials – it was the basis for the action in Kosovo, it was also the basis for the action in 1998 … as a matter of precedent it was standard practice to use the reasonable case basis for deciding on the lawfulness of military action."[215]

561. Lord Goldsmith added that he was saying that it was "the right test to use", and that:

> "… as a matter of precedent it was standard practice to use the reasonable case basis for deciding on the lawfulness of military action."

562. Asked to explain the meaning of the word "reasonable", Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "It means a case which not just has some reasoning behind it, put in practical terms, it is a case that you would be content to argue in court, if it came to it, with a reasonable prospect of success. It is not making the judgment whether it is right or wrong …"[216]

563. Asked whether the reference in his 7 March advice to action being taken in Iraq in Operation Desert Fox in 1998 and in Kosovo in 1999 on the basis that the legality of the action was "reasonably arguable" was a "somewhat lesser standard" than others that he might have liked to present, Lord Goldsmith replied that the distinction he was making:

> "… was between the authority based on the assessment that there was a reasonable case that it was lawful, to authority which is based upon having balanced all the arguments and come down on one side or the other, is it, in fact, lawful?"[217]

564. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "I had originally been not that instinctively in favour of this 'reasonable case' approach, but these precedents were helpful, because, although Kosovo was a different legal basis, the point was that the British Government had committed itself to military action on the basis of legal advice that there was a reasonable case. That was the precedent. It had been pressed upon me that that was the precedent in the past.

> "I can see … that, with hindsight, I was being overly cautious in expressing it in this way, but that was the precedent that had been used and I went along with it. Not 'I went along with it', I followed the same practice."[218]

565. Asked about his advice to Mr Blair that he could not be confident that a court would agree with the view that there was a "reasonable case", Lord Goldsmith replied:

> "I think … I'm explaining what I mean by 'reasonable case', and this is – if you like – the 'yes, but' point. I wanted to … underline to the Prime Minister that I was saying that reasonable case is enough. I'm saying it is a reasonable case. So that is the green light … but I want to underline, 'Please don't misunderstand, a reasonable case doesn't mean of itself that, if this matter were to go to court, you would necessarily win'. 'On the other hand, the counter view can reasonably be maintained'."[219]

566. Ms Adams told the Inquiry that, when she arrived in Lord Goldsmith's office, one of her predecessors had already put together a file of previous Law Officers' advice on the use of force over the last "ten years or so" which "contained all the key advice on the revival argument".[220] In her view, "it was self-evident from this file, that there had been a number of occasions when the Law Officers had … endorsed … military action on the basis of a reasonable case".

567. Addressing Lord Goldsmith's reference to precedent, Ms Adams stated:

> "It wasn't a precedent in the sense of something that had to be followed; it was a precedent in the sense of something which had, as a matter of fact, taken place."[221]

568. Asked if the term "reasonable case" had a meaning in international law, Ms Adams told the Inquiry that it did not, it was:

> "… one which can be reasonably argued. Obviously, it has to have a reasoned basis to it because otherwise it is not going to be reasonable to a court. There has to be a reasonable prospect … of success for this argument, but it doesn't mean to say it is the better legal opinion. That would be my interpretation."[222]

569. The Inquiry has seen the advice from the Law Officers on the use of force described by Ms Adams, in which the formulation "respectable legal argument" is used.

570. Asked whether there was any significant difference between a "reasonable case" and a "respectable legal argument", Lord Goldsmith wrote that he preferred the former, though he treated "respectable case" as amounting to the same test in practice, and "certainly not a higher test".[223]

571. Asked how his "characterisation of his 7 March advice as a 'green light'" sat with his explanation that a "reasonable case does not mean that if the matter came before a court" he "would be confident that the court would agree", Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "I was relying on the precedent established in previous cases that a reasonable or respectable case was sufficient. Precedent in the Law Officers' department is commonly followed. However I was careful to explain what I meant by the phrase 'reasonable case' and to highlight in my advice all the difficulties in interpreting the effect of the resolution."[224]

572. Lord Goldsmith added that, after delivering his advice of 7 March, he had:

> "… continued to reflect on the position and on 13 March 2003 concluded that the better view was there was a lawful basis for the use of force without a further resolution."

573. Asked how his "characterisation of his 7 March advice as a 'green light'" sat "with the number of difficulties with the argument that no further Security Council determination" was needed which he had identified but not resolved in that advice, Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "I was well aware of the contrary arguments and had set them out in detail in my advice. They could not be resolved because the language of the resolution lacked clarity and the statements made on adoption revealed differences of view within the Council on the legal effect of the resolution. The issue for me therefore was to consider whether the argument that the resolution authorised the use of force was of sufficient weight to reach the threshold of certainty that my predecessors had concluded was necessary. I concluded that it was and I knew that therefore I was giving a 'green light'."[225]

574. Asked how his view – that a "reasonable case" was sufficient to decide on the lawfulness of military action – reflected the framework of the UN Charter and the prohibition on the use of force except in self-defence or where clearly authorised by the Security Council in the circumstances set out in Chapter VII of the Charter, Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "A 'clear' or 'certain' basis for the use of force will always be preferable to a 'reasonable' or 'respectable' one. That is why I argued in my advice of 7 March 2003 that the safest legal course would be to secure the adoption of a further resolution to authorise the use of force … If we had achieved the second resolution that would have provided more certainty – although even then it is still likely to have been in terms relying on the revival of the original 1990/91 authorisation which would not have satisfied all international lawyers. We had however previously engaged in the use of force on the basis of a reasonable or respectable case that action is authorised by a UNSCR or self defence or humanitarian intervention and my understanding was and is that this is a sufficient basis."[226]

Other matters dealt with in Lord Goldsmith's 7 March advice

575. Lord Goldsmith reiterated the categorical advice, previously expressed in his 14 January draft, that there were no grounds for arguing that "an unreasonable veto" would permit the US and UK to ignore such a veto.

576. Addressing the effect of an "unreasonable" veto, Lord Goldsmith stressed:

"The analysis set out above applies whether a second resolution fails to be adopted because of a lack of votes or because it is vetoed. As I have said before … there are no grounds for arguing that an 'unreasonable veto' would entitle us to proceed on the basis of a presumed Security Council authorisation. In any event, if the majority of world opinion remains opposed to military action, it is likely to be difficult on the facts to categorise a French veto as 'unreasonable'."

577. Lord Goldsmith stressed the importance of the circumstances at the time a decision was taken.

578. Addressing the importance of circumstances, Lord Goldsmith concluded:

"The legal analysis may, however, be affected by the course of events over the next week or so, e.g. the discussions on the draft second resolution. If we fail to achieve the adoption of a second resolution, we would need to consider urgently at that stage the strength of our legal case in the light of the circumstances at that time."

579. Lord Goldsmith recognised that there was a possibility of a legal challenge.

580. Lord Goldsmith set out the possible consequences of acting without a further resolution, in particular the ways in which the matter might be brought before a court, some of which he described as "fairly remote possibilities".

581. Lord Goldsmith outlined the potential risks of action before both International and UK Courts, concluding:

"… it would not be surprising if some attempts were made to get a case of some sort off the ground. We cannot be certain that they would not succeed. The GA route [the General Assembly of the United Nations requesting an advisory opinion on the legality of the military action from the International Court of Justice] may be the most likely …"

---

[226] Statement, 4 January 2011, paragraph 6.5.

582. Sir Michael Wood had provided advice on the possibility of legal challenge in October 2002.[227]

583. Lord Goldsmith stressed the importance of the principle of proportionality in the use of force during the campaign.

584. Addressing the principle of proportionality, Lord Goldsmith stressed that the lawfulness of military action depended not only on the existence of a legal basis, but also on the exercise of force during the campaign being proportionate.[228]

585. Lord Goldsmith wrote that any force used pursuant to the authorisation in resolution 678 must have as its objective the enforcement of the terms of the cease-fire contained in resolution 687 and subsequent relevant resolutions; be limited to what is necessary to achieve that objective; and must be a proportionate response to that objective. That was "not to say that action may not be taken to remove Saddam Hussein from power if it can be demonstrated that such action is a necessary and proportionate measure to secure the disarmament of Iraq. But regime change cannot be the objective of military action."

586. Asked if he thought that the matter would be closed by his 7 March advice, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "… at the time, I thought it was, because I thought I had given the green light in February, I was following precedent in giving the green light again, and I thought, therefore, the issue was closed, and therefore, if, politically, the decision was taken wherever it needed to be taken in the United Kingdom, and no doubt the United States, about military action, then that would be it.
> "… [R]ecognising that things could change, I said … we would need to … assess the strength of the legal case in the light of circumstances at the time if there were a failure to obtain the second resolution …"[229]

587. Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Dr John Reid, Minister without Portfolio, and the Chiefs of Staff had all seen Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March before the No.10 meeting on 11 March, but it is not clear how and when it reached them.

588. Other Ministers whose responsibilities were directly engaged, including Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Ms Short, the International Development Secretary, and their senior officials, did not see the advice.

Media coverage during the weekend of 8 and 9 March

589. An article in the Financial Times on Saturday 8 March referred to an interview with Lord Archer, Solicitor General from 1974 to 1979, that was to be broadcast the following day on GMTV's Sunday programme.[230] The article stated that Lord Archer would reject the position "that resolution 1441 provided sufficient legal authority" for military action. It also stated that civil servants were understood to be putting pressure on Sir Andrew Turnbull to show them the Attorney General's advice.

590. On 9 March, an article in the Sunday Times warned that there would be "a rebellion" of up to 200 Labour MPs if Mr Blair proceeded to military action without a second UN resolution authorising military action.[231]

591. The article stated:

> "Conservatives urged the Government to say whether Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, had given legal approval for military action to be taken under any circumstances."

592. In an interview broadcast in the late evening of 9 March as part of the BBC Radio 4 Westminster Hour programme, Ms Short was asked if she would resign if there was no mandate from the UN for war.[232] She said:

> "Absolutely. There's no question about that.
> "If there is not UN authority for military action or if there is not UN authority for the reconstruction of the country, I will not uphold a breach of international law or this undermining of the UN and I will resign from the Government."

593. Ms Short's comments were widely reported in the media on 10 March.

Mr Straw's statement, 10 March 2003

594. Mr Straw made a statement to the House of Commons on 10 March 2003.

595. On 10 March, in an oral statement to the House of Commons, Mr Straw reported on his attendance at the ministerial meeting in the Security Council on 7 March (see Sections 3.7 and 3.8).[233]

596. In response to a question from Mr Michael Ancram, Deputy Leader of the Opposition and Shadow Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, as to what the Government's position would be in the event that three Permanent Members of the Security Council vetoed a second resolution, Mr Straw replied:

> "We have made it clear throughout that we want a second resolution for political reasons, because a consensus is required, if we can achieve it, for any military action. On the legal basis for that, it should be pointed out that resolution 1441 does not require a second resolution."[234]

597. Asked by Mr Simon Thomas (Plaid Cymru) to remind the House "exactly of which part of resolution 1441 authorises war", Mr Straw said:

> "I am delighted to do so. We start with paragraph 1, which says that the Security Council 'Decides that Iraq has been and remains in material breach of its obligations under relevant resolutions, including resolution 687 … in particular through Iraq's failure to cooperate with United Nations inspectors and the IAEA, and to complete the actions required under paragraph 8 to 13 of resolution 687'.
> "We then go to paragraph 4, in which the Security Council 'Decides that false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq pursuant to this resolution and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, this resolution shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations" – Obligations of which it is now in breach. We turn to operative paragraph 13, in which the Security Council 'Recalls, in that context, that the Council has repeatedly warned Iraq that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations'."[235]

Mr Blair's meeting with Lord Goldsmith, 11 March 2003

598. Mr Blair discussed the legal basis for the use of military force, and the need to avoid a detailed discussion in Cabinet, in a bilateral meeting with Lord Goldsmith on 11 March.[236]

599. There is no record of that discussion in either the No.10 or Attorney General's papers sent to the Inquiry.

600. In his statement for the Inquiry, Lord Goldsmith confirmed that the meeting had taken place at 0930 but he could not recall the detail of the discussion. He added that it "would have been my first meeting" with Mr Blair since he had submitted his advice of 7 March: "I expect that I would have gone over the main points of my advice with him."[237]

601. Asked about the conclusions of the meeting with Lord Goldsmith, Mr Blair wrote:

> "I did see him briefly, I think, on 11 March 2003 before the meeting with the other Cabinet members. I cannot recall the specific content of the discussion but most likely it would have been about his coming to Cabinet to explain his decision."[238]

602. In the edition of his diaries published in 2012, Mr Campbell wrote that Lord Goldsmith:

> "… had done a long legal opinion and said he did not want TB to present it too positively. He wanted to make it clear he felt there was a reasonable case for war under 1441. There was also a case to be made the other way and a lot would depend on what actually happened. TB also made clear that he did not particularly want Goldsmith to launch a detailed discussion at Cabinet, though it would have to happen at some time, and Ministers would want to cross-examine. With the mood as it was, and with Robin [Cook] and Clare [Short] operating as they were, he knew that if there was any nuance at all, they would be straight out saying the advice was that it was not legal, that the AG was casting doubt on the legal basis for war. Peter Goldsmith was clear that though a lot depended on what happened, he was casting doubt in some circumstances and if Cabinet had to approve the policy of going to war, he had to be able to put the reality to them. Sally [Morgan] said it was for TB to speak to Cabinet, and act on the AG's advice. He would simply say the advice said there was a reasonable case. The detailed discussion would follow.
> "… Peter G[oldsmith] told TB he had been thinking of nothing else for three weeks, that he wished he could be clearer in his advice, but in reality it was nuanced."[239]

Mr Blair's meeting, 11 March 2003

603. On 11 March, Ministers discussed legal issues, including holding back for a few days the response to a US request for the use of UK bases.

604. They also discussed the viability of the military plan.

605. Mr Blair held a meeting on 11 March with Mr Prescott, Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith and Admiral Boyce. Mr Straw attended part of the meeting.[240] Sir Andrew Turnbull, Mr Powell, Mr Campbell, Baroness Morgan, Sir David Manning and Mr Rycroft were also present.

606. Prior to the meeting, Mr Straw's Private Office wrote to No.10 on 11 March reporting that the US was pressing for a response "as soon as possible" to a letter to Mr Straw delivered by the US Ambassador on 5 March. It had formally requested the UK

Government's agreement to the use of RAF Fairford, Diego Garcia and, possibly, other UK bases for military operations against Iraq.[241]

607. In the letter the FCO advised that "under international law, the UK would be responsible for any US action in breach of international law in which the UK knowingly assisted". The draft response was "premised on a decision that UNSCR 1441 and other relevant resolutions" provided "the authority for action".

608. Mr Desmond Bowen, Deputy Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat in the Cabinet Office, advised Sir David Manning in a minute that the request was to be discussed at Mr Blair's meeting with Lord Goldsmith, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon on 11 March. He understood that Mr Straw and Mr Hoon had copies of Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March.[242]

609. Ms Adams advised Lord Goldsmith that she understood "the principal purpose of the meeting to be to discuss the ad bellum issue".[243]

610. An hour before the meeting took place, MOD Legal Advisers provided questions for Mr Hoon to raise at the meeting, explaining:

> "… some in the FCO – whether having read the AG's letter or not, I don't know – are beginning to believe that the legal base is already OK. It seems to us – and I have discussed this with Martin Hemming – that the position is not yet so clear."[244]

611. The document provided for Mr Hoon stated:

> "Questions for the Attorney General
> "If no 2nd resolution is adopted (for whatever reason), and the PM decides that sufficient evidence exists that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity to comply offered by 1441, is he satisfied that the currently proposed use of force would be lawful under international law?
> "Comment: The AG's minute to the PM is equivocal: he says 'a reasonable case can be made' [for the revival argument] but also says that his view is that 'different considerations apply in different circumstances' [meaning the nature of the Security Council discussions under OP12]. He ends his summary thus: 'If we fail to achieve the adoption of a second resolution we would need to consider urgently at that stage the strength of our legal case in the light of circumstances at the time'.

"If the answer is yes to the above, can it be assumed that the Attorney will be able to confirm formally at the time that CDS's order to implement the planned operation would be a lawful order (anybody subject to military law commits an offence if he disobeys any lawful command).

"Comment: Notwithstanding the current uncertainties, when it comes to the crunch, CDS will need to be assured that his orders are lawful. As the Attorney points out in his letter, 'on previous occasions when military action was taken on the basis of a reasonably arguable case, the degree of public and Parliamentary scrutiny of the legal issue was nothing like as great as it is today'."

612. A minute from Mr Rycroft to Mr Blair described confirmation of the viability of the overall military plan as the "main purpose of the meeting".[245]

613. The record of the meeting on 11 March stated that Mr Blair had started by addressing the legal basis for military action. He stated that Lord Goldsmith's "advice made it clear that a reasonable case could be made" that resolution 1441 was "capable of reviving" the authorisation of resolution 678 (1990), "although of course a second resolution would be preferable".[246]

614. Other points recorded by Mr Rycroft included:

- Admiral Boyce said he "would need to put a short paragraph in his directive to members of the Armed Forces".
- The paragraph "should be cleared with the Attorney General".
- The UK would send the US a positive reply on its request to use Diego Garcia and RAF Fairford "in a day or two, with the usual conditions attached".
- Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce advised that "once we had given our approval, the US might give very little notice before the start of the campaign".
- Sir Andrew Turnbull asked whether a legal basis for military action was required for civil servants, as well as for members of the Armed Forces.
- Mr Hoon asked whether the Attorney General's legal advice was ever disclosed.
- Mr Blair asked for a quick study into the precedents for that.
- Adm Boyce told the meeting that he was "confident that the battle plan would work".
- Mr Blair stated that "we must concentrate on averting unintended consequences of military action. On targeting, we must minimise the risks to civilians."

laid down in resolution 1441 and previous relevant resolutions, was sent to Dr Rice on 18 March.[247]

616. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that:

- Mr Hoon had "said he would be happier with a clearer green light from the AG".
- Mr Blair had been "really irritated" when Sir Andrew Turnbull had "said he would need something to put round the Civil Service that what they were engaged in was legal". Mr Blair was "clear we would do nothing that wasn't legal".
- Lord Goldsmith had provided "a version of the arguments he had put to TB, on the one hand, on the other, reasonable case".
- Mr Hoon had advised that the response to the "US request for the use of Diego Garcia and [RAF] Fairford" should be that it was "not … automatic but had to go round the system". Mr Blair had said he "did not want to send a signal that we would not do it".
- Mr Hoon and Mr Straw were telling Mr Blair that the US could act as early as that weekend, and "some of our forces would have to be in before".[248]

Mr Straw's minute to Mr Blair, 11 March 2003

617. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair that the UK and US should not push the second resolution to a vote if it could not secure nine votes and be certain of avoiding any vetoes.

618. Mr Straw suggested the UK should adopt a "strategy" based on the argument that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441, and that the last three meetings of the Security Council met the requirement for Security Council consideration of reports of non-compliance.

619. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 11 March setting out his firm conclusion that:

> "If we cannot gain nine votes and be sure of no veto, we should not push our second resolution to a vote. The political and diplomatic consequences for the UK would be significantly worse to have our … resolution defeated (even by just a French veto alone) than if we camp on 1441. [UN Secretary-General] Kofi Annan's comments last evening have strengthened my already strong view on this. Getting Parliamentary approval for UK military action will be difficult if there is no second resolution: but in my view marginally easier by the strategy I propose."[249]

[249] Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 11 March 2003, 'Iraq: What if We Cannot Win the Second Resolution?'.

620. Mr Straw set out his reasoning in some detail, making clear that it was predicated on a veto only by France. That was "in practice less likely than two or even three vetoes. The points made included:

- The upsides of defying "the" veto had been "well aired". It would "show at least we had a 'moral majority' with us".
- In public comments he and Mr Blair had kept their "options open on what we should do in the event that the resolution does not carry within the terms of the [UN] Charter". That had "been the correct thing to do". "In private we have speculated on what to do if we are likely to get nine votes, but be vetoed" by one or more of the P5.
- Although in earlier discussion he had "warmed to the idea" that it was worth pushing the issue to a vote "if we had nine votes and faced only a French veto", the more he "thought about this, the worse an idea it becomes".
- The intensive debate over Iraq in the last five months had shown how much faith people had in the UN as an institution; and that "far from having the 'moral majority' with us … we will lose the moral high ground if we are seen to defy the very rules and Charter of the UN on which we have lectured others and from which the UK has disproportionately benefitted".
- The "best, least risky way to gain a moral majority" was "by the 'Kosovo route' – essentially what I am recommending. The key to our moral legitimacy then was the matter never went to a vote – but everyone knew the reason for this was that Russia would have vetoed. (Then, we had no resolution to fall back on, just customary international law on humanitarianism; here we can fall back on 1441.)"
- The veto had been included in the UN Charter "for a purpose – to achieve a consensus". The UK could not "sustain an argument (politically, leave aside legally) that a distinction can be made between a 'reasonable' and an 'unreasonable' veto". That was a completely subjective matter.
- The "three recent meetings of the Council more than fulfil the requirement for immediate consideration of reports of non-compliance. So we can say convincingly that the process set out in 1441 is complete. If we push a second resolution to a veto, then the last word on the Security Council record is a formal rejection of a proposal that Iraq has failed to take its final opportunity."

621. Mr Straw advised that it would be "more compelling in Parliament and with public opinion to take our stand on the basis of 1441, and the overwhelming evidence that Iraq has not used the four months since then to co-operate 'immediately, unconditionally and actively'"; and that the UNMOVIC [clusters] document would be "a material help in making that case".

622. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair that he interpreted Mr Annan's "important" statement on 10 March:

> "… essentially as a gypsies' warning not to try and then fail with a second resolution. If the last current act of the Security Council on Iraq is 1441, we can genuinely claim that we have met Kofi's call for unity and for acting within (our interpretation of) the authority of the Security Council."

623. There was no reference in the minute to President Chirac's remarks the previous evening.

624. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair that it would not be possible to decide what the Parliamentary Labour Party (PLP) and the House of Commons would agree until deliberations in the Security Council had concluded. If a second resolution was agreed it would be "fine", but that was "unlikely". He added:

> "I sensed yesterday that sentiment might be shifting our way; but we would need to be very clear of the result before putting down a resolution approving military action. We could not possibly countenance the risk of a defeat …
> "But it need not be a disaster for you, the Government, and even more important for our troops, if we cannot take an active part in the initial invasion, provided we get on the front foot with our strategy.
> "I am aware of all the difficulties of the UK standing aside from invasion operations, not least given the level of integration of our forces with those of the US. But I understand that the US could if necessary adjust their plan rapidly to cope without us … [W]e could nevertheless offer them a major UK contribution to the overall campaign. In addition to staunch political support, this would include:
> - intelligence co-operation;
> - use of Diego Garcia, Fairford and Cyprus, subject to the usual consultation on targeting;
> - as soon as combat operations are over, full UK participation in the military and civilian tasks, including taking responsibility for a sector and for humanitarian and reconstruction work. We could also take the lead in the UN on securing the … resolution to authorise the reconstruction effort and the UN role in it which the US now agree is necessary."

625. Mr Straw concluded:

> "We will obviously need to discuss all this, but I thought it best to put it in your mind as event[s] could move fast. And what I propose is a great deal better than the alternatives. When Bush graciously accepted your offer to be with him all the way, he wanted you alive not dead!"

626. Mr Straw's minute was not sent to Lord Goldsmith or Mr Hoon.

627. Mr Straw's Private Office had separately replied on 11 March to a request from Sir David Manning for advice on the implications of the argument that a French veto would be unreasonable.[250]

628. In the reply, the FCO advised that there was "no recognised concept of an 'unreasonable veto'"; and warned that: "In describing a French veto as 'unreasonable' we would therefore be inviting others to describe any future vetoes as 'unreasonable' too." That could have implications in other areas "such as the Middle East". In addition, "describing the veto as unreasonable would make no difference to the legal position". There was "no implied condition" in the UN Charter that a veto was valid "only" if it was reasonable. There was "already pressure at the UN to abolish veto rights". And pressure could be expected to increase "if the argument that certain vetoes were 'unreasonable' – and could therefore be ignored – gained ground".

629. The UK was "on record as saying that the veto should only be used with restraint and in a manner consistent with the principles of the Charter".

Prime Minister's Questions, 12 March 2003

630. During Prime Minister's Questions on 12 March, Mr Blair stated that the UK would not do anything which did not have a proper legal basis.

631. In PMQs on 12 March Mr Blair focused on efforts to secure a second resolution and the importance for the UN of being seen to act in response to Saddam Hussein's failure to co-operate as required by resolution 1441 and of achieving unity in the international community.[251]

632. Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, asked if the Attorney General had advised that a war in Iraq would be legal in the absence of a second resolution authorising force; Mr Richard Shepherd (Conservative) asked why a UN resolution was required; and Mr John Randall (Conservative) asked if Mr Blair would publish the legal advice.

633. In response, the points made by Mr Blair included:

- As he had "said on many occasions … we … would not do anything that did not have a proper legal basis".
- Resolution 1441 provided the legal basis and the second resolution was "highly desirable to demonstrate the will of the international community".
- It was not the convention to publish legal advice but it was "the convention to state clearly that we have a legal base for whatever action we take, and … we must have such a base".

[251] House of Commons, Official Report, 12 March 2003, columns 280-290.

634. In response to a question from Mr Kennedy about whether Mr Annan had said that action without a second resolution would breach the UN Charter, Mr Blair stated that Mr Annan had said that it was "important that the UN comes together". Mr Blair added that it was:

> "… complicated to get that agreement … when one nation is saying that whatever the circumstances it will veto a resolution."

635. Mr Kennedy wrote to Mr Blair later that day repeating his request that Mr Blair should publish Lord Goldsmith's advice.[252] A copy of the letter was sent to Lord Goldsmith.

Sir Jeremy Greenstock's discussions in New York, 12 March 2003

636. A UK proposal for a side statement setting out possible tests for Iraq attracted little support amongst Security Council members.

637. Sir Jeremy Greenstock suggested early on the afternoon of 12 March that in the Security Council that day the UK should:

- table a revised draft resolution explaining that the UK was "setting aside the ultimatum concept" in operative paragraph 3 of the draft of 7 March "because it had not attracted Council support";
- distribute a side statement with tests for Saddam Hussein, "explaining that the text was a national position to which the UK wanted as many Council Members as possible to adhere to maintain the pressure on Saddam"; and
- state that the deadline of the 17 March by which it had been proposed that Iraq should demonstrate full, immediate and active co-operation in accordance with resolution 1441 was "being reviewed".[253]

638. Sir Jeremy favoured using the open debate in the Security Council later that day to explain the UK move, adding: "At no point will I signal, in public or in private, that there is any UK fallback from putting this new text to a vote within 24-36 hours."

639. Sir Jeremy reported that he had explained the gist of the plan to Ambassador Negroponte who was briefing Secretary Powell for a conversation with President Bush.

640. Sir Jeremy had spoken to Mr Annan and had explained the UK concept of a side statement and tests which Saddam Hussein could meet "within the tight deadline we would offer (ideally 10 days)" if he "was serious about disarming". Council members "should be able to agree the concept we were offering as a way out of the current impasse".[254]

[254] Telegram 427 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 13 March 2003, 'Iraq: Call on the Secretary-General, 12 March'.

641. Sir Jeremy reported that he had stressed that the UK's objective "was the disarmament of Iraq by peaceful means if possible". The "aim was to keep a united Security Council at the centre of attempts to disarm Iraq", but calls for a "grace period for Iraq" of 45 days or longer were "out of the question". The UK would not amend the draft resolution tabled on 7 March:

> "… until it was clear that the new concept had a chance of succeeding. If the Council was interested, we might be able to move forward in the next day or so; if not, we would be back on the 7 March text and my instructions were to take a vote soon."

642. Sir Jeremy and Mr Annan had also discussed press reporting of Mr Annan's comments (on 10 March), "to the effect that military action without a Council authorisation would violate the UN Charter". Mr Annan said that he had been:

> "… misquoted: he had not been attempting an interpretation of 1441 but merely offering, in answer to a specific question, obvious thoughts about the basic structure of the Charter. Nevertheless the Council was seized of the Iraq problem and working actively on it. It had not yet reached a decision to authorise force; how … could it be right for some Member States to take the right to use force into their own hands?"

643. Sir Jeremy reported that he had "remonstrated that the Council was in paralysis: at least one Permanent Member had threatened to veto 'in any circumstances'. The Council was not shouldering its responsibilities."

644. Asked what the UK would do if it failed to get even nine votes, Sir Jeremy said:

> "… we would have to consider the next steps; but we believed we had a basis for the use of force in existing resolutions (based on the revival of the 678 authorisation by the material breach finding in OP1 of 1441, coupled with Iraq's manifest failure to take the final opportunity offered to it in that resolution) … OP12 … did not in terms require another decision. This was not an accidental oversight: it had been the basis of the compromise that led to the adoption of the resolution."

645. Sir Jeremy reported that he had "urged" Mr Annan "to be cautious about allowing his name to be associated too closely with one legal view of a complicated and difficult issue".

646. At Mr Annan's suggestion, Sir Jeremy subsequently gave the UN Office of Legal Affairs a copy of Professor Greenwood's memorandum to the FAC of October 2002 and Mr Straw's evidence to the FAC on 4 March 2003.

647. Mr Straw's evidence to the FAC is referred to in more detail in Section 3.7.

648. Sir Jeremy reported that Mr Annan had said "several times" that he "understood" what Mr Straw and Mr Blair "were trying to do, and expressed sympathy for the tough situation you found yourselves in". Sir Jeremy reported that Mr José Maria Aznar, the Spanish Prime Minister, was "in a similar predicament". The "US did not always realise how comments intended by US politicians for US domestic audiences seriously damaged the position of their friends in other countries". In a conversation with President Chirac on 12 March, Mr Annan had "found him 'tough but not closed' to possible compromises".

649. On the same day Mr Straw informed Mr Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, that the UK was about to table a revised resolution, omitting the paragraph from the 7 March draft which contained the deadline of 17 March for Iraq to demonstrate that it had taken the final opportunity offered in resolution 1441 to comply with its obligations.[255]

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 12 March 2003

650. In a telephone call with President Bush on 12 March Mr Blair proposed only that the US and UK should continue to seek a compromise in the UN, while confirming that he knew it would not happen. He would say publicly that France had prevented a resolution.

651. Much of the discussion focused on managing UK politics.

652. Mr Blair recognised that it would not be possible to agree a compromise in the Security Council before 17 March and that the US would not extend the deadline.

653. Mr Blair sought President Bush's help in handling the debate in the House of Commons planned for Tuesday 18 March, where he would face a major challenge to win a vote supporting military action.

654. Mr Blair wanted:

- to avoid a gap between the end of the negotiating process and the Parliamentary vote in which France or another member of the Security Council might table a resolution that attracted a Council majority; and
- US statements on the publication of a Road Map on the Middle East Peace Process and the need for a further resolution on a post-conflict Iraq.

655. On the afternoon of 12 March Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the latest position and discussions with Chile and Mexico.[256]

656. The conversation and discussions between Mr Straw and Secretary Powell about US concerns about UK diplomatic activity are addressed in more detail in Section 3.8.

[256] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 12 March 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Telephone Conversation with President Bush, 12 March'.

657. The UK subsequently circulated a draft side statement setting out the six tests to a meeting of Security Council members in New York on the evening of 12 March.[257] The draft omitted an identified date for a deadline and included the addition of a final clause stating:

> "The United Kingdom reserves its position if Iraq fails to take the steps required of it."

658. Sir Jeremy Greenstock commented that the initiative had resulted in:

- genuine expressions of warmth from the [undecided 6] for taking them seriously;
- recognition that the UK had made a real effort to find a way through for the Council;
- discomfiture of the negative forces, who sounded plaintive and inflexible in their questioning;
- finally, a bit of time. I can keep this going at least until the weekend."[258]

659. But:

- The UK had not achieved "any kind of breakthrough. The French, Germans and Russians will undoubtedly home in on the preambular section of the draft resolution and on the whiff of ultimatum in the side statement".
- There were "serious questions about the available time", which the US would "not help us to satisfy".

Cabinet, 13 March 2003

660. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 13 March that work continued in the UN to obtain a second resolution and, following the French decision to veto, the outcome remained open.

661. Mr Blair indicated that difficult decisions might be required and promised a further meeting at which Lord Goldsmith would be present.

662. Mr Straw told Cabinet that Iraq continued to be in material breach of resolution 1441 and set out his view of the legal position.

663. Mr Straw told Cabinet that there was "good progress" in gaining support in the Security Council.

664. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 13 March that work continued in the UN to obtain a second resolution. The UK had presented proposals for six "tests", "endorsed by Dr Blix", to judge whether Saddam Hussein had decided to commit himself to disarmament. Satisfying those tests would not mean that disarmament was complete, but that the first steps had been taken. The non-permanent members of the Security Council were uncomfortable with a situation where, "following the French decision to veto", the Permanent Members were "not shouldering their responsibilities properly". The "outcome in the Security Council remained open". If the United Nations process broke down, difficult decisions would be required and there would be another Cabinet meeting at which the Attorney General would be present.[259]

665. Mr Straw said that, although there were differences between members of the Security Council, "none was saying that Iraq was complying with its international obligations"; and that it "followed that Iraq continued to be in material breach" of those obligations.

666. On the legal basis for military action, Mr Straw said that he "was already on record setting out the position to the Foreign Affairs Committee". Mr Straw rehearsed the negotiating history of the resolution 1441, stating that:

- "the French and Russians had wanted a definition of what would constitute a material breach, but had settled for the facts being presented to the Security Council";
- "they had also wanted a statement that explicit authorisation was required for military action and instead had settled for further consideration by the Security Council …"; and
- failure by Iraq to comply with resolution 1441 "revived the authorisations existing" in resolutions 678 (1990) and 687 (1991).

667. Mr Straw noted that the Government's supporters had "a clear preference" for a second resolution but it "had not been seen as an absolute necessity". There had been "good progress" in New York in "gaining the support of uncertain non-permanent members of the Security Council, including Mexico and Chile".

668. Quoting from her diary, Ms Short wrote that she had asked for "a special Cabinet with the Attorney General present" and this had been agreed. She also reported saying, "if we have UN mandate, possible progress on Palestine/Israel and try with the second resolution process, it would make a big difference". She was "hopeful of progress".[260]

669. Ms Short had been advised by Mr Suma Chakrabarti, the DFID Permanent Secretary, that she should focus her intervention in Cabinet on the need for "a proper decision-making process", which would be "important both in substance and … for the politics". In his view, there were two key points to make:

> "Cabinet needs to discuss now the legal opinion of the Attorney General and how to make it public. This is vital for Ministers, our Armed Services and the Civil Service.

> "As soon as we are clear on the second resolution (whether it fails to get the necessary votes or is not put to a vote), Cabinet should meet again for a discussion on the politics and to put a proposition to Parliament for immediate debate."[261]

670. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Lord Williams of Mostyn, the Leader of the House of Lords, had "said there would be a debate [in Cabinet] on the legality" and Ms Short had said Lord Goldsmith should be present. Mr Blair had "said of course he would".[262]

The continuing public debate

Media reports, 13 March 2003

671. On 13 March, several newspapers commented on the exchanges which had taken place in the House of Commons the previous day.

672. A leading article in The Guardian exhorted Mr Blair to "re-engage with Mr Chirac" and stated that he should:

> "… come clean about the legal advice that has been given to the Government by the Attorney General. Either the Attorney has advised that to wage war in defiance of a vetoed UN resolution is acceptable under international law, or he has advised that it is not. The difference is very important and the public has a right to know what has been advised. To say nothing is merely to sow suspicion. In the Commons yesterday, Mr Blair said that Britain was determined to act 'on a proper legal basis'. That has all the sound of a weasel formulation".[263]

673. In the same edition, the political editor referred to the exchanges in Parliament and to a radio interview in which Mr Kenneth Clarke (Conservative) had stated that the advice of the Law Officers had been made available on previous occasions.[264]

674. Articles in the Financial Times and The Times referred to the questions asked by Mr Kennedy and to the request that Lord Goldsmith's advice should be published.[265]

Parliamentary calls for a statement

675. In Parliament on 13 March, several MPs called for a statement on the Attorney General's advice regarding the legal basis for military action.

676. MPs raised the issue of the Attorney General's advice later that day when Mr Robin Cook, Leader of the House of Commons, described the business of the House in the week to follow.

677. Mr Eric Forth (Conservative) asked:

> "Given that there is an increasing belief that the Attorney General's advice may well be against military action by this country, certainly if that takes place without United Nations cover, may we please have a statement in the House by the Solicitor General … as to the position with regard to the advice being given to the Prime Minister and the Government by the Attorney General on the legality of military action in Iraq?"[266]

678. Welcoming Conservative support for Mr Kennedy's request for access to the Attorney General's advice, Mr Paul Tyler (Liberal Democrat) stated:

> "… is it not right that the Law Officers are answerable to Parliament, not to the Government of the day. Surely it must be an exceptional circumstance when very important issues of international law are being challenged in the way implied by the Secretary-General of the United Nations? Should there not be a second Security Council resolution, is it not absolutely essential that the Law Officers make a statement prior to any debate in this House?"[267]

679. Several MPs made reference to the authoritative work Parliamentary Practice by Erskine May (see Box below).

Erskine May

Thomas Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice is an authoritative source of information and guidance on Parliamentary practice and procedure and British constitutional law.

The 22nd edition, current in 2001, contained the following paragraph entitled "Law officer's opinions":

> "The opinions of the law officers of the Crown, being confidential, are not usually laid before Parliament, cited in debate or provided in evidence before a select committee, and their production has frequently been refused; but if a Minister deems it expedient that such opinions should be made known for the information of the House, he is entitled to cite them in the debate."[268]

680. Mr Andrew Mackay (Conservative) asked:

> "… is it not very important indeed that the Prime Minister should let us see this legal advice, ahead of the debate next week?"[269]

681. Referring to the fact there were precedents for the disclosure of the Law Officers' advice, Mrs Alice Mahon (Labour) said: "In these circumstances – these exceptional circumstances – it is absolutely vital that we get that advice."

682. Mr Andrew Mitchell (Conservative) said that the Prime Minister "should bring into the public domain the advice that has been given by the Attorney General".[270]

683. Mr Robert Wareing (Labour) asked:

> "Is it not imperative that we have a statement about the advice given by the Attorney General? Members of Parliament who vote for an aggressive war launched by America and its collaborators and may be culpable and may be committing an offence if the Attorney General's advice were that Britain was going against international law."[271]

684. Further calls for a statement were made during points of order by Mr William Cash, the Shadow Attorney General, Mr John Burnett (Liberal Democrat), Mr Mark Francois (Conservative) and Ms Lynne Jones (Labour).[272]

The legal basis for military action

Lord Goldsmith's change of view, 13 March 2003

685. Lord Goldsmith informed his officials on 13 March that, after further reflection, he had concluded earlier that week that on balance the "better view" was that there was a legal basis for the use of force without a further resolution.

686. Lord Goldsmith reached this view after he had been asked by both Admiral Boyce and Ms Juliet Wheldon, the Treasury Solicitor, to give a clear-cut answer on whether the "reasonable case" was lawful rather than unlawful.

687. This view was the basis on which military action was taken.

688. Mr Martin Hemming had written to Mr Brummell on 12 March stating:

> "It is clear that legal controversy will undoubtedly surround the announcement of any decision by the Government to proceed to military action in the absence of the adoption of a further resolution by the UN Security Council. The CDS is naturally concerned to be assured that his order to commit UK Armed Forces to the conflict in such circumstances would be a lawful order by him. I have informed the CDS that if the Attorney General has advised that he is satisfied that the proposed military action by the UK would be in accordance with national and international law, he [CDS] can properly give his order committing UK forces.

> "In view of the rapidly developing situation, I thought that the Attorney would wish to know what I have said on this question."[273]

689. Lord Goldsmith met Mr Brummell and Ms Adams at 1300 on 13 March.[274]

690. In a minute approved by Lord Goldsmith, Mr Brummell wrote that Lord Goldsmith had told him that:

> "… he had been giving further careful consideration to his view of the legal basis for the use of force against Iraq … It was clear … that there was a sound basis for the revival argument in principle …
> "The question was whether the conditions for the operation of the revival doctrine applied in this case. The Attorney confirmed that, after further reflection, he had come to the clear view that on balance the better view was that the conditions for the operation of the revival argument were met in this case, i.e. there was a lawful basis for the use of force without a further resolution beyond resolution 1441."[275]

691. Addressing the key provisions of resolution 1441, Mr Brummell reported that Lord Goldsmith had stated:

> "… the crucial point … was that OP12 did not stipulate that there should be a further decision of the SC before military action was taken, but simply provided for reports of any further breaches by Iraq to be considered by the SC. In the absence of a further decision by the SC, the Attorney General thought that the better view was that resolution 1441 itself revived resolution 678 and provided the legal basis for use of force. (It was, moreover plain that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it and continued to be in material breach: not a single member of the SC considered that Iraq had complied.)"

692. Lord Goldsmith had:

> "… fully taken into account the contrary arguments. In coming to his concluded view … he had been greatly assisted by the background material he had seen on the history of the negotiation of resolution 1441 and his discussions with both Sir Jeremy Greenstock and the US lawyers …"

693. Lord Goldsmith's view was:

> "It was apparent from this background material that members of the Council were well aware that a finding of material breach by the SC was tantamount to authorising the use of force (through the operation of the revival doctrine). It was for this very reason that the French had been keen to avoid the finding of a material breach and had argued for the fire-break provision in OP2, so as to prevent automaticité. And in relation to OP12 it was evident that the French, who had pressed hard for a reference to a 'decision' (as a pre-condition to use of force), appreciated that, as the final text provided only for the SC to 'consider' Iraq's further breaches, the way was left open for the operation of the revival argument in the event that the SC did not come to any decision."

694. Lord Goldsmith had:

"… explained that in his minute of 7 March he had wanted to make sure that the Prime Minister was fully aware of the competing arguments. He was clear in his own mind, however, that the better view was that there was a legal basis without a second resolution. He had come to this concluded view earlier in the week."

695. Lord Goldsmith and Mr Brummell agreed that:

- It would be proper for Mr Brummell to confirm to Mr Hemming that the proposed military action would be in accordance with national and international law.
- It would be necessary to prepare a statement setting out the Attorney's view of the legal position which could be deployed at Cabinet and in Parliament the following week.

696. Mr Brummell wrote to Mr Hemming on 14 March to "confirm" that Lord Goldsmith was "satisfied that the proposed military action by the UK would be in accordance with national and international law".[276]

697. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Hoon, Admiral Boyce and Sir Kevin Tebbit, as well as to Mr Desmond Bowen (Cabinet Office) and Ms Wheldon.

698. Gen Jackson told the Inquiry that the Chiefs of Staff had seen Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March.[277]

699. In his memoir, Gen Jackson wrote that the Chiefs of Staff had discussed the issue of the legal basis for military action and "collectively agreed that we needed to be sure of the ground".[278] Adm Boyce had "on behalf of us all, sought the Attorney General's assurances on the legality of the planned action" and the Chiefs had accepted his advice.

700. Gen Jackson told the Inquiry that a similar assurance had been sought and received in relation to military action in Kosovo in 1999.[279]

701. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he had reached his "better view" after he had received a letter from the Ministry of Defence stating that Adm Boyce needed "a yes or no answer" on whether military action would be lawful and, as requested by Sir Andrew Turnbull, a visit from Ms Wheldon asking the same question on behalf of the Civil Service.[280]

702. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "… the propriety and/or the legality of what we were about to do was obviously a concern of mine, not least of it, since, somewhat against my better instincts, we had signed up to the ICC [International Criminal Court]. I always made it perfectly clear to the Prime Minister face-to-face, and, indeed, to the Cabinet, that if we were invited to go into Iraq, we had to have a good legal basis for doing so, which obviously a second resolution would have completely nailed."[281]

703. Lord Boyce added:

> "… that wasn't new, it was something which I had told the Prime Minister that I would need at the end of the day, long before March. This is back in January when we started to commit our forces out there, and, as you say, I received that assurance. This was an important issue, particularly because of the speculation in the press about the legality or otherwise and, as far as I was concerned particularly for my constituency, in other words, soldiers, sailors and airmen and their families had to be told that what they were doing was legal. So it formed the first line of my Operational Directive which I signed on 20 March, and it was important for me just to have a one-liner, because that was what was required, as far as I was concerned, from the Government Law Officer, which, as you say, I received."[282]

704. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "… there were a number of things which happened after 7 March. It was becoming clear, though it hadn't yet become definitive, that the second resolution was going to be very difficult to obtain.
> "… But most importantly … I had been presented with a letter which had come from the Ministry of Defence, which reflected the view of CDS, and which was … calling for this clear view, a yes or no answer, as I think he has put it.
> "At about the same time, I also received a visit from Juliet Wheldon … the Treasury Solicitor. I understood her to be speaking on behalf of the Civil Service, and, indeed, from what I now know, I suspect, believe, she would at least have been encouraged to do that by the Cabinet Secretary on behalf of the Civil Service.

"Both of them in a sense were saying the same thing. They were saying, 'We are potentially at risk personally if we participate', or, in the case of the Civil Service, 'assist in war, if it turns out to be unlawful, and therefore, we want to know whether the Attorney's view is yes or no, lawful'.

"That seemed to me to be actually a very reasonable approach for them to take …"[283]

705. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he:

"… very quickly saw that actually this wasn't satisfactory from their point of view. They deserved more … than my saying there was a reasonable case.

"So, therefore it was important for me to come down clearly on one side of the argument or the other, which is what I proceeded to do."[284]

706. Lord Goldsmith added:

"… until the Civil Service and the … Services said they wanted this clear view, I was working … I take full responsibility for this, but it was with the approval of my office on the basis that saying there was a reasonable case was a green light. It was sufficient for the Government, and if the Cabinet and, as it turns out, the House of Commons, took the view that it was the right thing to do, then we had done enough to explain what the legal basis was and to justify it.

"But when they came with their request, I then saw that actually that wasn't fair on them."

707. Asked how the case had suddenly become stronger, Lord Goldsmith replied:

"It is the decision you make about it. You make a judgment. You say 'I'm asked to advise whether there is a reasonable case', and you examine all the evidence and you say, 'Yes there is a reasonable case'. You don't need to go any further, and in that respect, I can see with hindsight, that I was being overly cautious.

"Then somebody says to you, 'Actually, I don't want to know whether you say there is a reasonable case, I want to know whether or not you consider that it will be lawful.'

"Well, I regard that as a different question and you then have to answer it."[285]

708. Asked why he was able to give the Armed Forces a more certain answer without providing more legal arguments, Lord Goldsmith replied:

"Well, not on the basis of more legal argument, but on the basis of asking a different question. This is, in a sense, why I'm saying 'with hindsight'. I would have liked to have known before the following week that what the Armed Services and the Civil Service expect was not what had been the precedent given in the past that they wanted more, they wanted an unequivocal answer. Had I known that, then I would have approached the question differently, and I'm simply saying that I was cautious in not going further than I needed to do on 7 March."[286]

709. Asked whether the difficulties in the Security Council had made it more important to know if there was a sufficient legal basis for military action, Lord Goldsmith replied: "Yes."[287]

710. Asked whether Mr Blair had asked him to come up with a definitive position, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

"I don't recall it that way. The way it may have been seen by others or interpreted by others or recollected by others, I don't know, but I don't recall the Prime Minister asking for that, no, definitely not."[288]

711. Asked whether the huge pressure on the Government, including Mr Blair's personal future, had weighed on him, Lord Goldsmith said:

"The consequences for the Government did not … What did matter to me, of course, was the United Kingdom as a country and the people that we would have been asking to take part in this with a potential personal responsibility, and I did believe it was right to respond to the request from the head of the Armed Services … That weighed with me."[289]

712. Asked whether the possibility of troops who had been deployed to the area being withdrawn as a consequence of his advice weighed upon him Lord Goldsmith said:

"No. Those sorts of consequences are not what the lawyer has to take into account. What the lawyer has to do is to weigh up the arguments and evidence carefully and reach what he believes is the correct legal view, whatever the consequences may be."[290]

713. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair what discussions he or others under his instruction had with Lord Goldsmith between 7 March, when he had received Lord Goldsmith's formal advice, and 13 March. Mr Blair said:

"I can't recall any specific discussions that I had. I don't know whether others would have had with him before 13 March, but essentially what happened was this: he gave legal advice, he gave an opinion saying, 'Look, there is this argument against it, there is this argument for it. I think a reasonable case can be made' and obviously > we then had to have a definitive decision, and that decision is: yes, it is lawful to do this or not."[291]

714. Asked if it had been of considerable relief to him when Lord Goldsmith came to the better view that resolution 1441 authorised the use of force without a further resolution, Mr Blair replied:

> "Yes, and the reason why he had done that was really very obvious, which was that the Blix reports indicated quite clearly that Saddam had not taken the final opportunity."[292]

Preparing the legal case

715. Lord Goldsmith had several meetings on the afternoon of 13 March.

716. The primary purpose of the meetings appears to have been discussion of the arrangements for preparing statements on the legal basis for action for Cabinet and Parliament.

717. A team was established to help Lord Goldsmith to explain in public the legal basis "as strongly and unambiguously as possible".

718. By the afternoon of 13 March, the UK and the US were discussing announcing the withdrawal of the draft resolution in the Security Council on 17 March and a planned debate in the House of Commons on 18 March.

719. Mr Brummell recorded that Lord Goldsmith had agreed on 13 March to explore whether Professor Greenwood:

> "… could be instructed now, for the purpose of assisting in the development of the legal arguments in support of the view that there was a sound legal basis for the use of force without a second resolution. This would be useful both in terms of preparing the public statement of the legal position and in terms of being ready to meet any legal challenge at short notice."[293]

720. A postscript to Mr Brummell's note indicated that Lord Goldsmith had spoken to Professor Greenwood "later that morning", who confirmed that he shared Lord Goldsmith's analysis of the legal position and that "he also considered that the better view was that a second resolution was not legally necessary".

721. Ms Adams wrote to Professor Greenwood "following" his "conversation with the Attorney General this morning", requesting his "assistance in drawing up a paper setting out the legal arguments which may be made in support of the view that military action may be taken against Iraq to enforce the terms of the UNSCR in the absence of a further resolution of the Security Council".[294]

722. Ms Adams stated that there were two issues to consider:

- "Is the revival argument valid?"; and
- "Is resolution 1441 sufficient?"

A "conference" with Lord Goldsmith had been arranged for 1630 that afternoon.

723. Lord Goldsmith met Lord Mayhew, the Conservative Attorney General from 1987 to 1992, late on the afternoon of 13 March.[295]

724. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that Lord Mayhew had asked for the meeting because he had wanted, and been given, Lord Goldsmith's view; and that in the debate on the legality of the use of force in Iraq in the House of Lords on 17 March, Lord Mayhew had professed himself in agreement with Lord Goldsmith's view.[296]

725. Lord Goldsmith's meeting with Lord Mayhew was followed by one with Mr Straw, which Mr Brummell also attended.[297]

726. In what was described as a "lengthy meeting", Lord Goldsmith was reported to have said that "having decided to come down on one side (1441 is sufficient), he had also decided that in public he needed to explain his case as strongly and unambiguously as possible".[298] A legal team under Professor Greenwood was "now working" on that. Mr Straw arranged for Mr Macleod and Mr Patrick Davies, one of his former Private Secretaries, to join the team.

727. Mr Straw's request that the team should produce a draft letter explaining the legal position for him to send to the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) had been agreed. Mr Straw's Private Office also recorded that Lord Goldsmith had said "he thought he might need to tell Cabinet when it met on 17 March that the legal issues were finely balanced".

728. The record stated that Mr Straw had responded by saying that Lord Goldsmith:

> "… needed to be aware of the problem of leaks from … Cabinet. It would be better, surely, if the Attorney General distributed the draft letter from the Foreign Secretary to the FAC as the basic standard text of his position and then made a few comments. The Attorney General agreed."

729. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that the main thrust of the meeting with Mr Straw on 13 March was planning for what was going to happen.[299]

730. Asked if the record of the meeting on 13 March made by Mr Straw's Private Office reflected his recollection of the decision on how to present his legal advice to Cabinet, Lord Goldsmith replied:

> "It isn't actually. There wasn't any question of distributing the longer FAC document as my opinion. That wasn't at all what I was going to do."[300]

731. A note on the Attorney General's file listed the "further material to be assembled", as discussed by Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw, as "evidence showing" that Iraq was "in further material breach", as:

- Any examples of false statements/omissions and (significant) non-co-operation reported to Security Council pursuant to OP4 of SCR 1441.
- Any examples of Iraqi interference reported by Blix or ElBaradei [Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, the Director General of the IAEA] to the Council pursuant to OP11.
- For these purposes, we need to trawl through statements from the draft Command Paper on Iraqi non-compliance which is to be published.
- See attached FCO paper Iraqi non-compliance with UNSCR 1441 of 13 March 2003."[301]

Lord Goldsmith's meeting with Lord Falconer and Baroness Morgan, 13 March 2003

732. The last meeting in Lord Goldsmith's diary on 13 March was with Lord Falconer, who in March 2003 was the Minister of State in the Home Office responsible for Criminal Justice, and Baroness Morgan.

733. Lord Goldsmith informed Lord Falconer and Baroness Morgan of his clear view that it was lawful under resolution 1441 to use force without a further UN resolution.[302]

734. Asked to comment on press allegations to the effect that he had been "more or less pinned to the wall at a Downing Street showdown with Lord Falconer and Baroness Morgan who allegedly had performed a pincer movement" on him, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that that was:

> "… absolute complete and utter nonsense. I had not spoken to Lord Falconer about this issue before. When I saw them [on 13 March] I, of course, had reached my opinion, I communicated it to my officials, to the Foreign Secretary and as it happens to Lord Mayhew as well. There was no question of them performing a pincer movement."[303]

735. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

"I told them the conclusion that I had reached, and I think briefly why, and I think we then went on to discuss – I think by that stage it was known that there was going to be a debate the following Monday in the House of Lords, and I think we discussed something about how that debate would be dealt with, the debate on the legality issue, I think a Liberal Democrat Peer put down a motion."[304]

736. Asked for a statement about the purpose of her involvement in a number of meetings with Lord Goldsmith throughout the period before 18 March 2003, Baroness Morgan wrote that the purpose of the meetings was to share information.[305] Her role was to explain her perception of the Parliamentary and political mood. She was aware of claims that she had somehow exerted pressure on the Attorney General to alter his advice to provide a legal justification for military action, but wished to state without equivocation that such allegations were untrue:

"… at no point during any discussion at which I was present did I witness any effort to engage with Lord Goldsmith as to the correctness of his legal analysis. I am certain there was never any attempt by me, or by anyone else present, at any of the four meetings to challenge the Attorney's legal analysis or otherwise to influence the Attorney's legal opinion."

737. On 15 March, Baroness Morgan informed Mr Campbell by email that the Attorney General would "make clear during the course of the week that there [was] a sound legal basis for action should that prove necessary".[306]

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 13 March 2003

738. On 13 March, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed withdrawing the draft resolution on 17 March followed by a US ultimatum to Saddam Hussein to leave within 48 hours. There would be no US military action until after the vote in the House of Commons on 18 March.

739. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the prospects for a vote in the House of Commons and a 'Road Map' for the Middle East on 13 March.[307]

740. On the UN draft resolution, Mr Blair commented that the "haggling over texts in New York was frustrating and muddied the waters. But it was buying the vital time we needed this weekend."

741. A discussion on the military timetable was reported separately.[308] It was envisaged that the withdrawal of the resolution on 17 March would be followed by a speech from President Bush which would give Saddam Hussein an ultimatum to leave within 48 hours. President Bush would call for freedom for the Iraqi people and outline the legal basis for military action.

742. There would be no military action before a vote in the UK Parliament on 18 March. President Bush would announce the following day that military action had begun. The plan was for the main air campaign to begin on 22 March.

Confirmation of Mr Blair's view

The exchange of letters on 14 and 15 March 2003

743. On 14 March, Lord Goldsmith asked for confirmation of Mr Blair's view that Iraq had "committed further material breaches as specified in [operative] paragraph 4 of resolution 1441".

744. Mr Brummell wrote to Mr Rycroft on 14 March:

> "It is an essential part of the legal basis for military action without a further resolution of the Security Council that there is strong evidence that Iraq has failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of resolution 1441 and has thus failed to take the final opportunity offered by the Security Council in that resolution. The Attorney General understands that it is unequivocally the Prime Minister's view that Iraq has committed further material breaches as specified in [operative] paragraph 4 of resolution 1441, but as this is a judgement for the Prime Minister, the Attorney would be grateful for confirmation that this is the case."[309]

745. In his response on 15 March, Mr Rycroft recorded that it was Mr Blair's "unequivocal view that Iraq is in further material breach of its obligations, as in OP4 of UNSCR 1441".

746. Mr Rycroft replied to Mr Brummell on 15 March:

> "This is to confirm that it is indeed the Prime Minister's unequivocal view that Iraq is in further material breach of its obligations, as in OP4 of UNSCR 1441, because of 'false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq pursuant to this resolution and failure to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, this resolution'."[310]

747. Lord Goldsmith gave evidence to the Inquiry about the purpose of this exchange of letters.

748. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

"… if this ever came to court … we would have to persuade a court of our interpretation of 1441, but they would also say, 'What's the evidence that they [Iraq] did actually fail?', and I was saying, at that stage, there needs to be strong factual evidence of failure."[311]

749. Lord Goldsmith described a briefing from Mr John Scarlett focused on the question of Iraqi compliance:

"… the clear intelligence, the clear advice I was being given by him was that Saddam Hussein in Iraq had not complied with the resolution, not just that there were specific elements of … serious non-co-operation, including, for example, intimidation of potential interviewees …"[312]

750. Asked what his opinion was on the weight of the intelligence, Lord Goldsmith replied:

"At the end of the day … like any lawyer who is dependent upon the facts from his client - I was dependent upon the assessment by the Government which had all the resources it had … and that was why I particularly wanted to be sure … the week before the events, that the Prime Minister, who did have access to all that information, was of the view that there had been a failure."[313]

751. Lord Goldsmith stated that the UK Government did not have to decide whether there had been a material breach, because:

"… the pre-determination had been made [by the Security Council in resolution 1441] that if there was a failure, it would be a material breach … we had to decide whether there was a failure but, if there was a failure, then the Security Council's pre-determination would come in and clothe that with the character of material breach."[314]

752. Addressing the purpose of seeking Mr Blair's views, Lord Goldsmith stated:

"First of all, because it did depend upon the failure, it was important to point out you need to be satisfied about that and secondly, I wanted the Prime Minister, consciously and deliberately to focus on that question. I wanted it to be a question that he would really apply his mind to. Forgive me for even suggesting that he wouldn't have done. That wasn't the point. That he should have focused his mind on whether there was, in fact, a failure, and that was the purpose of saying, 'I want this in writing', it was so there was a really conscious consideration of that."[315]

753. Lord Goldsmith later stated:

"I think I'm saying two things. First of all, I wasn't actually saying there needed to be a declaration by him [Mr Blair]. I was saying 'You need to be satisfied. You need to judge that there really is a failure to take the final opportunity. You need to judge that on the basis of the resources, the intelligence and the information that you have got' … This was going to be a very controversial decision, whichever way it went. There would be a lot of scrutiny. We had had sort of legal actions bubbling up already. So, 'whereas in the past a reasonable case was sufficient, you can expect a degree of scrutiny on this occasion'."[316]

754. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he had received Mr Blair's view orally, but thought it was important to have it in writing.[317]

755. In his statement, Lord Goldsmith wrote:

"I was asking the Prime Minister to confirm that Iraq had submitted false statements or omissions in its declarations submitted pursuant to the resolution and had failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of resolution [1441] so that the authority to use force under resolution 687 revived."[318]

756. In response to the question whether Mr Blair could decide if Iraq was in further material breach of resolution 1441, Lord Goldsmith wrote: "No."[319]

757. Lord Goldsmith added:

"Only the Security Council could decide whether or not a particular failure or set of failures by Iraq to meet an obligation imposed by the Security Council resolution had the quality of being a 'material breach' of resolution 687."[320]

758. Lord Goldsmith's view that resolution 1441 authorised the use of force relied on the conclusion that OP4:

> "… constituted a determination in advance that if the particular set of circumstances specified in it arose, so that Iraq failed to take the final opportunity it had been given, that would constitute a further material breach.
> "The resolution therefore constituted authority for the use of force provided that such a factual situation had occurred, namely that Iraq had failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of the resolution. In that event a Council discussion would need to take place.
> "I had concluded that in any such Council discussion the assessment contemplated by OP4 was not an assessment of the quality of the breaches, since the Council had already resolved that any failure on Iraq's part would constitute a material breach, but rather an assessment of the situation as a result of those breaches having occurred … Accordingly, the Council did not need to conclude that breaches had taken place (though I believe that at the discussion no member of the Security Council took the view that they had not occurred).
> "Nonetheless the authorisation in resolution 678 could not revive unless in fact breaches had occurred. We needed therefore to be satisfied that this factual situation existed, and to be in a position if necessary to justify that to a court. That was why I said … that there would have to be strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity."[321]

759. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "As I explained giving my oral evidence, this was an issue on which I wanted the Prime Minister consciously and deliberately to focus, hence my request for written confirmation that he had reached this view."[322]

Mr Blair's view

760. The Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ('The Butler Report') records it was:

> "… told that, in coming to his view that Iraq was in further material breach, the Prime Minister took account both of the overall intelligence picture and of information from a wide range of other sources, including especially UNMOVIC information."[323]

---

[321] Statement, 4 January 2011, paragraphs 5.6-5.7.

[323] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraph 385.

761. Mr Blair told the Liaison Committee on 21 January 2003 that, if the reported breach was a pattern of behaviour rather than conclusive proof would require "more considered judgement".[324]

762. As the Inquiry indicates in Sections 3.7 and 3.8, Mr Blair and his advisers in No.10 had been very closely involved, particularly since the beginning of March, in examining the reports of the UN weapons inspectors and had access to advice from the JIC on the activities of the Iraqi regime.

763. In his 7 March advice Lord Goldsmith had advised that Mr Blair "would have to consider extremely carefully whether the evidence of non-co-operation and non-compliance by Iraq [was] sufficiently compelling to justify the conclusion that Iraq had failed to take its final opportunity".

764. But Mr Blair did not seek and did not receive considered advice from across government specifically examining whether the evidence was "sufficiently compelling" to provide the basis for a judgement of this magnitude and seriousness.

765. In mid-March, UNMOVIC was reporting increased co-operation, and the IAEA had confirmed that Iraq had no nuclear weapons or nuclear weapons programmes.

766. The Inquiry has not seen any evidence of consideration of whether the reports by UNMOVIC and the IAEA to the Security Council during January to March 2003 constituted reports to the Council under OP11 of resolution 1441; or whether the subsequent Security Council discussions constituted "consideration" as required by OP12.

767. There was clearly no majority support in the Security Council for a conclusion that the process set in hand by resolution 1441 had reached the end of the road.

768. Asked if he had been working from the definition of material breach set out by Mr Straw in November 2002, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "Yes, absolutely."[325]

769. Asked about the process that he had followed before giving the determination requested by Lord Goldsmith, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "We went back over the Blix reports and it was very obvious to me, particularly on the subject of interviews, that they weren't co-operating. They were co-operating more, as you rightly say. They started to give out a little bit more, but there was absolutely nothing to suggest that this co-operation was full, immediate and unconditional. It was actually not full, not immediate. In fact, even Blix himself said it wasn't immediate even on 7 March and was not unconditional.

"In addition to that I had I think JIC Assessments as well … where it was clear that Saddam was putting heavy pressure internally on people not to co-operate …"[326]

770. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair whether the process had involved only No.10 or if he had consulted more widely, Mr Blair stated:

"I am sure I would have spoken to Jack [Straw] particularly at the time … I don't recollect … This literally was the whole time a conversation … [O]ur view was that he [Saddam Hussein] was not co-operating in the terms of 1441, and that … remains my view today that he wasn't, and that he … never had any intention of doing that.

"Now it is correct … that he was offering up more, but … even in February he wasn't offering up what they were asking him."[327]

771. Asked whether he was comfortable with the situation whereby the Prime Minister confirmed the existence of a further material breach at a time when the head of the IAEA had reported there was no nuclear programme and the head of UNMOVIC was reporting improved co-operation. Mr Straw replied:

"Yes … and if I had not been I wouldn't have stayed in the Cabinet …"[328]

772. Mr Straw added that the two tests in OP4 were "conjunctive" not "disjunctive", and that:

"What OP4 talks about is false statements or omissions in the declarations. Well, the declaration was incomplete. There was no question about that. And …

"… They did fail to comply fully. The obligation on them was not to comply a bit … The obligation on Iraq was to comply fully. It is a positive obligation on them, not a negative one, not to disregard the whole of the resolution, and they had failed to do that."[329]

773. The Government motion tabled for the debate on 18 March included provisions asking the House of Commons to:

- note that in the 130 days since resolution 1441 was adopted Iraq had not co-operated actively, unconditionally and immediately with the weapons inspectors, and had rejected the final opportunity to comply and is in further material breach of its obligations under successive mandatory UN Security Council resolutions; and

- note the opinion of the Attorney General that, Iraq having failed to comply and Iraq being at the time of resolution 1441 and continuing to be in material breach, the authority to use force under resolution 678 has revived and so continued that day.[330]

774. In his speech Mr Blair did not address the events that had taken place since the declaration "as the House is familiar with them". He stated that "all members" of the Security Council "accepted" the Iraq declaration was false. He added:

> "That in itself, incidentally, is a material breach. Iraq has taken some steps in co-operation but, no one disputes that it is not fully co-operating."[331]

775. Mr Blair did not address how, in the absence of a consideration in the Security Council, the UK Government had reached the judgement that Iraq had failed to take its final opportunity.

776. The debate in the House of Commons and the details of Mr Blair's speech are described in Section 3.8.

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 15 March 2003

777. In his discussion with President Bush on 15 March, Mr Blair proposed that the main message from the Azores Summit should be that this was the final chance for Saddam Hussein to demonstrate that he had taken the strategic decision to avert war; and that members of the Security Council should be able to sanction the use of force as Iraq was in material breach of its obligations.

778. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on 15 March, he said that the "main message" for the Azores Summit "should be that this was a final chance for the UN to deliver, and that countries should be able to sanction the use of force as Iraq was in material breach".[332]

779. Mr Blair spoke to Mrs Margaret Beckett, Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, before her appearance on the BBC's The World at One on 16 March.[333]

780. Asked why he was not putting the second resolution to the vote, Mr Blair explained that losing a vote "… might cause legal difficulties". Mr Annan was "very keen to avoid that outcome since he believed it would make it harder for the UN to move forward after the conflict".

781. Mr Blair told Mrs Beckett that Lord Goldsmith would make it clear that "existing UN resolutions provided a legal base for military action", in Cabinet, "which would probably be on Monday afternoon".

The presentation of the Government's position

FCO paper, 'Iraqi Non-Compliance with UNSCR 1441', 15 March 2003

782. The FCO finalised a paper providing examples of Iraq's failure to comply with the obligations in resolution 1441 on 15 March.

783. The FCO paper, produced by officials in the FCO but drawn largely from official reports and statements by UN inspectors, examined the extent of Iraq's non-compliance with the obligations placed upon it by the United Nations Security Council in resolution 1441.[334]

784. In a note of a conversation on 14 March with Ms Kara Owen, an official in Mr Straw's Private Office, Mr Brummell recorded that he had made the following points on Lord Goldsmith's behalf regarding the FCO paper being prepared:

- "Demonstration of breaches of UNSCR 1441 are critical to our legal case. Therefore we must be scrupulously careful to ensure that the best examples of non-compliance are referred to."
- "It would be distinctly unhelpful to our legal case if the examples of non-compliance … were weak or inadequate; and it would be difficult – indeed it would be too late – to seek to add further (better) examples 'after the event'."
- The FCO needed to check the document they were preparing "very carefully" and subject it to "the tightest scrutiny".
- The document should include "a caveat … acknowledging that the examples of non-compliance … were not exhaustive but illustrative".
- The submission to Mr Straw should reflect those points.[335]

785. Mr Brummell's record of his conversation with Ms Owen on 14 March also stated that he had been informed that the FCO paper would be sent out with a letter from Mr Blair to Ministerial colleagues on 17 March, "after Cabinet". Mr Blair's letter would also contain a "one page" summary of the legal position, which was "news" to Mr Brummell. A subsequent conversation with Mr Rycroft had "confirmed that it would be helpful if" Lord Goldsmith's staff would draft that summary.

Sir Jeremy Greenstock's discussions in New York, 16 March 2003

787. Sir Jeremy Greenstock consulted colleagues in New York on 16 March to consider whether the Security Council could agree an ultimatum to Saddam Hussein.

788. Sir Jeremy reported that he had agreed with his US and Spanish colleagues to tell the press during the following "late morning" that there was no prospect of putting the resolution to a vote, and blaming France.

789. After the Azores Summit on 16 March, Sir David Manning spoke to Sir Jeremy Greenstock to ask him to phone his Security Council colleagues that evening to establish whether there had been any change in their positions on the draft resolution.[337]

790. Reporting developments in New York on 16 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote that, following the conclusion of the Azores Summit, the UK Mission in New York had spoken to all Security Council colleagues with the message that:

> "… there was now a short time left to consider whether the Council could agree at last on an ultimatum to Saddam which, if he did not fulfil it, would result in serious consequences. If their respective governments were in a position to engage in such a discussion, I would need to hear it as early as possible on 17 March. When asked (as the majority did), I said that I had no (no) instructions as to whether to put the text … to a vote …"[338]

791. Sir Jeremy commented that the French and Russians did not like the message. Mr Jean-Marc de La Sablière, French Permanent Representative to the UN, had claimed that the French had moved significantly over the last two days as President Chirac's interview would show. The "undecided 6" were "only slightly more positive".

792. Sir Jeremy also reported that he had agreed with his US and Spanish counterparts to tell the press during the "late morning" of 17 March that there was "no prospect of putting our resolution to the vote, casting heavy blame on the French". The key elements of the statement should be:

> "(a) the Azores summit had called for a last effort to see if the Council could unite around an ultimatum;

(b) having contacted every member it was clear that Council consensus was not possible within the terms of 1441, given the determination of one country in particular to block any ultimatum;

(c) we would therefore not be pursuing a vote;

(d) the Azores communiqué had made clear the positions of our governments on the way forward."

793. Sir Jeremy had informed Mr Annan and Dr Blix that he would be receiving final instructions "eg on whether to stop pursuing the resolution on the morning [Eastern Standard Time] of 17 March".

794. Sir Jeremy asked for instructions and comments on a draft statement, writing: "I have assumed you will want to be fairly strong on the French."

Preparing the legal argument

795. A team of lawyers assembled in Lord Goldsmith's chambers over the weekend of 15/16 March to prepare arguments and documents to deploy in support of the Government's position.

796. Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that Lord Goldsmith and Ms Harriet Harman (the Solicitor General), Professor Greenwood, Mr Brummell, Ms Adams, Mr Wood, Mr Grainger, Mr Davies and himself were present.[339]

797. Sir Michael Wood explained the team's role to the Inquiry:

> "Firstly there was the drafting of the Parliamentary answer. Secondly there was the drafting of the longer note that the Foreign Secretary sent to members of Parliament, the so-called Foreign Office note, but it was drafted at the Attorney's …
> "I think I was more or less on the sidelines, because my views were known, but I probably did read through the drafts and no doubt in my usual way made editorial suggestions and the like, but I don't think I had a major part in the preparation of those questions of … the Parliamentary Question and the longer FCO note … I should stress that by that stage, as I saw it, we were in the advocacy mode as opposed to the advisory decision-making mode. This was a matter of presentation: how is this to be presented in public?"[340]

798. Mr Macleod told the Inquiry that the team had produced:

> "… essentially a collection of documents to help the Attorney and the Ministers with a difficult explanation in Parliament. Technically difficult rather than politically difficult."[341]

[340] Public hearing, 26 January 2010, pages 59-60.
[341] Public hearing, 30 June 2010, page 64.

799. Asked if he agreed with Sir Michael's description that the team was in an advocacy mode, Mr Macleod replied:

> "Yes … The decision had already been made in the sense that we knew what the Attorney's view was. The question was how to help present it in a way that would be easy to present, easy to understand, because … the full advice of 7 March is a fairly complex, dense legal document and you needed something else which brought out the key points which could be used in Parliament and in other places."[342]

800. Ms Adams told the Inquiry:

> "I think the understanding of everybody sitting round the table on 16 March was not that the Attorney General was giving legal advice to Parliament through that statement but he was setting out a view of the legal position …. coming back to the difference between the earlier cases, where there had been legal advice from Law Officers saying there is a reasonable case, what had happened on those occasions was not that the Attorney General had gone to Parliament and said 'This is lawful because there is an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe', or 'Because there is a revival', it had been the Government Minister in the Foreign Office or the Ministry of Defence."[343]

801. On the morning of Monday 17 March, preparations for Cabinet later that day and Parliamentary debates the following day were put in place.

802. Lord Goldsmith set out his view of the legal basis for military action in a Written Answer on 17 March 2003.

803. In parallel, Mr Straw wrote to the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee with a copy of Lord Goldsmith's Answer and an FCO paper which addressed the legal background.

804. Mr Straw also wrote to Parliamentary colleagues drawing their attention to the documents being published and the statements issued at the Azores Summit the previous day.

Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer, 17 March 2003

805. Lord Goldsmith replied on the morning of Monday 17 March to a Written Question tabled by Baroness Ramsey of Cartvale (Labour):

> "To ask Her Majesty's Government what is the Attorney General's view of the legal basis for the use of force against Iraq."[344]

806. The text of Lord Goldsmith's response is set out in the Box below.

Text of Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer of 17 March 2003

"Authority to use force against Iraq exists from the combined effect of resolutions 678, 687 and 1441. All of these resolutions were adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter which allows the use of force for the express purpose of restoring international peace and security:

1. In resolution 678 the Security Council authorised force against Iraq, to eject it [Iraq] from Kuwait and to restore peace and security in the area.
2. In resolution 687, which set out the cease-fire conditions … the Security Council imposed continuing obligations on Iraq to eliminate its weapons of mass destruction in order to restore international peace and security in the area. Resolution 687 suspended but did not terminate the authority to use force under resolution 678.
3. A material breach of resolution 687 revives the authority to use force under resolution 678.
4. In resolution 1441 the Security Council determined that Iraq has been and remains in material breach of resolution 687, because it has not fully complied with its obligations to disarm under that resolution.
5. The Security Council in resolution 1441 gave Iraq 'a final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations' and warned Iraq of the 'serious consequences' if it did not.
6. The Security Council also decided in resolution 1441 that, if Iraq failed at any time to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of resolution 1441, that would constitute a further material breach.
7. It is plain that Iraq has failed so to comply and therefore Iraq was at the time of resolution 1441 and continues to be in material breach.
8. Thus the authority to use force under resolution 678 has revived and so continues today.

Resolution 1441 would in terms have provided that a further decision of the Security Council to sanction force was required if that had been intended. Thus, all that resolution 1441 requires is reporting to and discussion by the Security Council of Iraq's failures, but not an express further decision to use force."[345]

807. Ms Harman repeated Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer in the House of Commons as a pursuant answer to Mr Blair's response on 14 March to a Question from Mr Cash, asking Mr Blair if he would "make a statement on the legal basis for military intervention against Iraq".[346]

808. Mr Blair had replied on 14 March:

> "There is a longstanding convention, followed by successive Governments and reflected in the Ministerial Code, that legal advice to the Government remains confidential. This enables the Government to obtain frank and full legal advice in confidence, as everyone else can.
> "We always act in accordance with international law. At the appropriate time the Government would of course explain the legal basis for any military action that may be necessary."[347]

809. Mr Straw sent a copy of Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer to Mr Anderson, the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, on the morning of 17 March, together with an FCO paper giving "the legal background in more detail".[348]

810. The Inquiry asked Ms Adams whether she agreed that the Attorney General was not giving a Law Officer's advice on 17 March. Ms Adams replied:

> "He was essentially asserting the Government's view of the legal position, which was based on his advice … I think that [using the Attorney General to make the public statement on the legal position] may have been a mistake."[349]

811. Mr Macleod had expressed a similar view:

> "There is a question whether it was right to place on the Attorney General the onus of explaining the legal position publicly, so that he became perceived as the arbiter of whether the war should take place or not. The general practice on other legal issues is that the Attorney does not present the Government's legal position: that is left to the Minister with policy responsibility for the issue under discussion. That is what was done in relation to Kosovo or Iraq in 1998."[350]

812. Sir Michael Wood explicitly endorsed Mr Macleod's view.[351]

813. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "… there was a huge interest in what my view was in relation to the legality of war, and I had had, for example, almost weekly calls from the Shadow Attorney General [Mr Cash], who had both been telling me what his view was, which was that it was lawful, and saying 'You will have to tell Parliament what your view is in relation to this'.

> "Normally, a Law Officer's opinion is not disclosed. It was in fact, impossible in these circumstances not to disclose what my conclusion was, because the clamour to know … would have been frankly impossible to avoid. So I knew that I would have to make some sort of statement as to what my position was. So that is the point about the Parliamentary answer."[352]

814. Parliamentary Questions and Parliamentary Committees after 2003 sought to probe whether Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer to Baroness Ramsey on 17 March constituted the Attorney General's advice, and by implication, whether the Government had waived, in the case of the legal advice on the basis of military action in Iraq, the convention that neither the fact that the Attorney General had advised nor the content of that advice were disclosed.[353]

815. In his responses, Lord Goldsmith was always very careful to point out that Baroness Ramsey had asked for, and he had provided, his view of the legal basis for the use of force, not his advice.[354]

816. The FCO paper, 'Iraq: Legal Basis for the Use of Force', stated that the legal basis for the use of force in Iraq was the revival of the authorisation in resolution 678.[355]

817. Specifically, the paper stated that in resolution 1441:

> "… the Security Council has determined –
>
> (1) that Iraq's possession of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) constitutes a threat to international peace and security;
>
> (2) that Iraq has failed – in clear violation of its legal obligations – to disarm; and
> (3) that, in consequence, Iraq is in material breach of the conditions for the ceasefire laid down by the Council in SCR 687 at the end of hostilities in 1991, thus reviving the authorisation in SCR 678."

818. Referring to the Security Council's power under Chapter VII of the Charter to authorise States to take military action, the paper set out the occasions during the 1990s when action had been taken on the basis that Iraq's non-compliance had broken the conditions of the cease-fire in resolution 687 and the authority to use force in resolution 678 had been "revived", as the "legal background" to resolution 1441.

[355] Paper FCO, 17 March 2003, 'Iraq: Legal Basis for the Use of Force'.

819. The FCO paper stated that the preambular paragraphs of resolution 1441:

- confirmed "once more" by the reference to resolution 678 "that that resolution was still in force";
- "recognised the threat which Iraq's non-compliance … posed to international peace and security"; and
- "recalled" that resolution 687 "imposed obligations on Iraq as a necessary step for the achievement of its objective of restoring international peace and security".[356]

820. The paper stated that operative paragraph one (OP1) of resolution 1441 decided that "Iraq 'has been and remains in material breach' of its obligations" and, paraphrasing the resolution, added:

> "The use of the term 'material breach' is of the utmost importance because the practice of the Security Council during the 1990s shows that it was just such a finding of material breach by Iraq which served to revive the authorisation of force …
> "On this occasion, however, the Council decided (paragraph two) to offer Iraq a 'final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations'. Iraq was required to produce an accurate, full and complete declaration of all aspects of its prohibited programmes (paragraph three), and to provide immediate and unrestricted access to UNMOVIC and IAEA (paragraph five). Failure by Iraq to comply with the requirements of SCR 1441 was declared to be a further material breach of Iraq's obligations (paragraph four), in addition to the continuing breach identified in paragraph one. In the event of a further breach (paragraph four), or interference by Iraq with the inspectors or failure to comply with any of the disarmament obligations under any of the relevant resolutions (paragraph 11), the matter was to be reported to the Security Council. The Council was then to convene 'to consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all of the relevant Council resolutions in order to secure international peace and security' (paragraph 12). The Council warned Iraq (paragraph 13) that 'it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations'."

821. The paper stressed that the authority to use force did not revive immediately and there had been "no 'automaticity'". The provision "for any failure by Iraq to be 'considered' by the Security Council" did not:

> "… mean that no further action can be taken without a new resolution. Had that been the intention, it would have provided that the Council would decide what needed to be done … not that it would consider the matter. The choice of words was deliberate; a proposal that there should be a requirement for a decision by the Council … was not adopted. Instead the members of the Council opted for the formula that the Council must consider the matter before action is taken.

"That consideration has taken place regularly since the adoption of resolution 1441. It is plain, including from UNMOVIC's statement to the Security Council, its Twelfth Quarterly Report and the so-called 'Clusters Document', that Iraq has not complied as required … Whatever other differences there may have been in the Security Council, no member of the Council questioned this conclusion. It therefore follows that Iraq has not taken the final opportunity offered to it and remains in material breach of the disarmament obligations which, for twelve years, the Council has insisted are essential for the restoration of peace and security. In these circumstances, the authorisation to use force contained in resolution 678 revives."

822. On 17 March, Mr Straw wrote to all Parliamentary colleagues with a copy of the FCO paper on Iraq's non-compliance, a copy of his letter to the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and copies of the statements made at the Azores Summit the previous day.[357]

823. Mr Straw wrote that the FCO paper on non-compliance stated that Iraq had "failed to comply fully with 14 previous UN resolutions related to WMD" and assessed Iraq's "progress in complying with relevant provisions of UNSCR 1441 with illustrative examples".

824. To supplement the Command Paper of UN documents published in February (CM 5769) Mr Straw also published a further Command Paper (CM 5785) with UN documents from early March.[358]

Cabinet, 17 March 2003

825. A specially convened Cabinet at 1600 on 17 March 2003 endorsed the decision to give Saddam Hussein an ultimatum to leave Iraq and to ask the House of Commons to endorse the use of military action against Iraq to enforce compliance, if necessary.

826. Mr Blair told his colleagues that he had called a meeting of Cabinet because "an impasse" had been reached at the United Nations.[359]

827. The Government had tried its "utmost", and had "tabled a draft … resolution, amended it, and then been prepared to apply tests against which Iraq's co-operation … could be judged". Although the UK had been "gathering increasing support from members of the Security Council", the French statement "that they would veto a resolution in all circumstances had made it impossible to achieve a new … resolution". France, with Russia in support, "were not prepared to accept" that if Saddam Hussein "did not comply with the United Nations obligations, military action should follow". The UK was in a situation it had "striven to avoid": "There would be no second resolution and military action was likely to be necessary … to enforce compliance by Saddam Hussein with Iraq's obligations."

828. Mr Blair stated that the US "had now undertaken to produce a 'Road Map' for the Middle East Peace Process, once the new Palestinian Prime Minister's appointment had been confirmed". That would "open the way to a full and final settlement within three years". The US "had also confirmed" that it "would seek a UN mandate for the post-conflict reconstruction of Iraq", and that: "Oil revenues would be administered under the UN's authority."

829. Mr Blair stated:

> "A lot of work was needed to repair the strains which had arisen internationally over the past few weeks. He regretted that the international community had sent mixed messages to Saddam Hussein, whose regime could have been disarmed peacefully if confronted by international solidarity. The blockage we had encountered in the United Nations impeded any progress."

830. Mr Straw said that Mr Blair:

> "… had persuaded President Bush … to go down the United Nations route in order to achieve the maximum authority for the disarmament of Iraq, but the diplomatic process was now at an end."

831. Mr Straw added:

> "Progress had been made towards forging a consensus before the French and Russians had indicated their intention to veto any Security Council resolution proposed which indicated that military action would follow Saddam Hussein's failure to comply. His assessment was that President Chirac of France had decided to open up a strategic divide between France and the United Kingdom; the row in Brussels in late 2002 had been manufactured. Effectively, one member of the Security Council had torpedoed the whole process."

832. Mr Straw concluded:

> "… the one chance now remaining to Saddam Hussein was to seek exile. If that course failed, the Government would seek the support of the House of Commons for military action against Iraq. There would be a substantive motion in a debate now scheduled for Tuesday [18 March]."

833. Lord Goldsmith told Cabinet that he had answered a Parliamentary Question in the House of Lords that day "on the authority for the use of force against Iraq"; and that Mr Straw had also sent a document "on the legal basis" to the Foreign Affairs Committee.

834. The minutes record that Lord Goldsmith informed Cabinet that:

> "Authority existed from the combined effect of United Nations Security Council resolutions 678, 687 and 1441, all of which were adopted under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. The latter allowed the use of force for the express purpose of restoring international peace and security … resolution 1441 determined that Iraq had been and remained in material breach of … resolution 687 and gave Iraq a final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations, warning of serious consequences if it did not do so. It was plain that Iraq had failed so to comply and therefore continued to be in material breach. The authority to use force under … resolution 678 was revived as a result … [R]esolution 1441 did not contain a requirement for a further … resolution to authorise the use of force."

835. The points made during discussion included:

- The attitude of France "had undermined the mechanism of the United Nations to enforce the will of the international community".
- The Government's supporters "needed a comprehensive statement to explain the position": a second resolution "had been politically desirable but not legally essential".
- "It was important to focus on Saddam's failure to comply, and to avoid the impression that the failure to gain a further … resolution was the issue".

836. Mr Prescott stated that Mr Blair:

> "… had played a major role in upholding the credibility of the United Nations. French intransigence had thwarted success in taking the United Nations process to its logical conclusion. Nevertheless, the use of force against Iraq was authorised by existing … resolutions."

837. Mr Blair concluded:

> "… the diplomatic process was now at an end. Saddam Hussein would be given an ultimatum to leave Iraq; and the House of Commons would be asked to endorse the use of military action against Iraq to enforce compliance, if necessary."

838. Cabinet "Took note."

839. Mr Cook's decision to resign from the Government was announced during Cabinet, which he did not attend.[360]

840. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he had attended Cabinet:

> "… ready to answer any questions which were put to me and to explain my advice. Certainly the view I took was that producing my answer to Parliament would be a good framework for explaining to them what the legal advice was, and I would have been happy to answer the questions which were put to me. I was ready, fully briefed, ready to debate all these issues.
> "What actually happened was that I started to go through the PQ [Parliamentary Question], which had been handed out as this framework. Somebody, I can't remember who it was, said 'You don't need to do that. We can read it.' I was actually trying to use it as a sort of framework for explaining the position, and there was a question that was then put. I do recall telling Cabinet, 'Well there is another point of view, but this is the conclusion that I have reached', and then the discussion on the legality simply stopped, and Cabinet then went on to discuss all the other issues, the effect on international relations, domestic policy, and all the rest of it.
> "So the way it took place was that I was ready to answer questions and to deal with them and in the event that debate did not take place."[361]

841. Lord Turnbull told the Inquiry that there was:

> "… a kind of tradition which says you rely on the Attorney General to produce definitive advice. Once he has done it, you don't say, 'I don't think much of that'. His job is to produce the version we can all work on."[362]

842. Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "The whole purpose of having the Attorney there … was so that he could answer anybody's questions …"[363]

843. Ms Short told the Inquiry that she thought that Lord Goldsmith had:

> "… misled the Cabinet. He certainly misled me, but people let it through … I think now we know everything we know about his doubts and his changes of opinion and what the Foreign Office Legal Advisers were saying and that he had got this private side deal that Tony Blair said there was a material breach when Blix was saying he needed more time. I think for the Attorney General to come and say there is an unequivocal legal authority to go to war was misleading."[364]

844. Addressing the evidence given to the Inquiry by Lord Goldsmith and Mr Blair, Ms Short stated:

> "I see that both Tony Blair and he [Lord Goldsmith] said the Cabinet were given the chance to ask questions. That is untrue."[365]

845. Asked what she was trying to discuss and why she was not able to do so, Ms Short told the Inquiry that she had asked for a meeting with Lord Goldsmith but:

> "There was a piece of paper round the table. We normally didn't have any papers, apart from the agenda. It was the PQ answer, which we didn't know was a PQ answer then, and he started reading it out, so everyone said 'We can read' … and then … everyone said, 'That's it'. I said, 'That's extraordinary. Why is it so late? Did you change your mind?' And they all said 'Clare!'
> "Everything was very fraught by then and they didn't want me arguing, and I was kind of jeered at to be quiet. That's what happened."[366]

846. Asked if she then went quiet, Ms Short replied:

> "If he won't answer and the Prime Minister is saying, that's it, no discussion, there is only so much you can do … the Attorney, to be fair to him, says he was ready to answer questions, but none was allowed."[367]

847. Ms Short added that she had later asked Lord Goldsmith, "How come it was so late?", and that he had replied, "Oh, it takes me a long time to make my mind up."[368]

848. Mr Campbell wrote that Ms Short had asked Lord Goldsmith "if he had any doubts". Lord Goldsmith had replied that "lawyers all over the world have doubts but he was confident in the position".[369]

849. Dr Reid told the Inquiry: "everyone was allowed to speak at these [Cabinet] meetings. I don't recognise some descriptions of some of the least quiescent of my colleagues claiming to have been rendered quiescent …"[370]

850. Addressing Ms Short's evidence that she had been "kind of jeered at", Mr Straw told the Inquiry:

> "… that's not my recollection. Obviously if that's what she felt … but this was a very serious Cabinet meeting. People weren't, as I recall … going off with that kind of behaviour. We all understood the gravity of the situation."[371]

851. Asked if he recognised Ms Short's description of events, Lord Boateng, who was Chief Secretary to the Treasury from 2002 to 2005, told the Inquiry that he did not.[372]

852. Ms Short sent a letter to colleagues in the Parliamentary Labour Party the following morning, explaining her reasons for deciding to support the Government.[373] She wrote that there had been "a number of important developments over the last week", including:

> "Firstly, the Attorney General has made clear that military action would be legal under international law. Other lawyers have expressed contrary opinions. But for the UK Government, the Civil Service and the military, it is the view of the Attorney General that matters and this is unequivocal."

853. Asked at what point he had initiated the process of working out what he was going to tell the Cabinet, and how much, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "So far as Cabinet is concerned, I can't remember at what stage I was told the Cabinet was going to meet and I was going to be asked to come to Cabinet on that occasion. I think it would have been the second occasion ever that I had attended Cabinet."[374]

854. Asked how it was decided that he would present the advice to Cabinet in the way he did, and whether that decision was taken in discussion with Mr Blair or with Mr Straw, Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that it was his decision:

> "… the point for me was to determine how to express my view to Parliament, and the Parliamentary answer then seemed to be a convenient way, as a framework really, for what I would then say to Cabinet about my view on legality."[375]

855. Asked if anyone asked him to restrict what he said to Cabinet, Lord Goldsmith replied: "No."[376]

856. Asked why, given the concerns of the Armed Forces and the Civil Service, Cabinet had not taken the opportunity to discuss the finely balanced legal arguments,

Lord Goldsmith stated that a number of the Cabinet Ministers present had seen his 7 March advice, although things had moved on since then.

857. Lord Goldsmith added that the issues were well known in Parliament, but Cabinet did not want to debate them:

> "… thinking about it afterwards, I could sort of understand that … for this reason: that actually debating the legal question with the Attorney General was a slightly sterile exercise … because they could have put to me, 'What about this and what about that?' and I would have answered them, but what mattered, I thought, was that they needed to know whether or not this had the certificate, if you like, of the Attorney General. Was it lawful? That was a necessary condition. Then they would need to consider whether it was the right thing to do … So they were looking at the much bigger question of 'Is it right?' not just 'Is it lawful?'."[377]

858. Asked for his view on the proposition that there was never a full discussion in Cabinet about his opinion which was "caveated and was finely balanced", Lord Goldsmith replied that his advice was:

> "… caveated in one respect … It takes the central issue of the interpretation of 1441 and identifies that there are two points of view, and then I have come down in favour of one of them.
> "The Cabinet, I'm sure knew that there were two points of view because that had been well-travelled in the press. The caveat was you need to be satisfied that there really has been a failure to take the final opportunity. That, of course, was something which was right in the forefront of Cabinet's mind, I have no doubt, and I'm sure was mentioned by the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary and others in the course of the debate. I would expect so."[378]

859. Asked whether Cabinet should have had a discussion of Lord Goldsmith's fuller opinion before they came to a decision Lord Turnbull stated: "I think what they needed was "yes" or "no", and that's what they got."[379]

860. Asked if he thought that his Cabinet colleagues would have wished to have a discussion of the considerations in Lord Goldsmith's full advice, Mr Hoon replied:

> "I'm not sure that it would be appropriate for Cabinet to have that kind of discussion, because, in the end, what you would be inviting people to do was to speculate on the legal judgment that the Attorney General had reached, and it is not the same as having a political discussion about options or policies.

> "This is someone whose decision is that this was lawful, and I can't see how Cabinet could look behind that and have the kind of discussion that you are suggesting. This was not policy advice. This was not, 'On the one hand … and on the other hand, we might take this course of action'. What he was saying is that this was lawful in his judgment, and I can't see how we could have had a sensible discussion going beyond that."[380]

861. Mrs Beckett told the Inquiry:

> "Peter Goldsmith came to Cabinet. He made it clear what was his view. It was open to people to ask questions … I was never the slightest bit surprised to learn that in earlier iterations he had drawn attention to, 'On the one hand … on the other hand' … that's what lawyers do."[381]

862. Mr Straw was asked whether it would have been better if Cabinet had had Lord Goldsmith's full opinion, whether he had persuaded Lord Goldsmith to present only the (PQ) answer, whether it was incumbent on Cabinet to satisfy itself that it was be aware of the arguments, and why Lord Goldsmith had reached his conclusion. He told the Inquiry:

> "I did that, partly for the reasons I have explained … but also, because we were concerned about leaks, and … what the military wanted to know wasn't the process by which a decision had been arrived at."[382]

863. Asked whether he had been given the opportunity to look at the full legal opinion of 7 March, Dr Reid told the Inquiry:

> "I was given the opportunity, but I didn't particularly want to look at some long 'balancing' legal opinion, I wanted to know 'is what we are about to do lawful, or is it illegal?' … [A]s far as I was aware, the constitutional convention and legality in Great Britain for the Cabinet is dependent on the judgment of the Attorney General."[383]

864. In a statement he sent the Inquiry before his second hearing on 8 February 2010, Mr Straw wrote that, in the absence of the ability to secure an authoritative determination of the law from the courts, "a great weight of responsibility" rested on the shoulders of the Attorney General, and that his role was to determine whether the UK Government could consider the merits of taking military action.[384]

865. Mr Straw was asked whether Cabinet could meet its responsibilities to address the key moral as well as political issues, as stated by Mr Straw in his 'Supplementary

Memorandum' for the Inquiry, without being fully alive to the fact that the legal issues were finely balanced. Mr Straw replied:

> "The Cabinet were fully aware that the arguments were finely balanced. It was impossible to open a newspaper without being fully aware of the arguments."[385]

866. In response to the point that newspaper articles were not legal advice, Mr Straw added:

> "With great respect, we had lawyers from both sides arguing the case in the public print. So it was very clear … that there were two arguments going on. One was about the … moral and political justification, and that, in many ways, in the public print, elided with arguments about whether it was lawful … no one in the Cabinet was unaware of the fact that there had been and was a continuing and intense legal debate about the interpretation of 1441 … But the issue for the Cabinet was: was it lawful or otherwise?
> "… [W]hat was required … at that stage was essentially a yes/no decision from the Attorney General, yes/no for the Cabinet, yes/no for the military forces. It was open to members of the Cabinet to question the Attorney General … it wasn't necessary to go into the process by which Peter Goldsmith had come to his view. What they wanted to know was what the answer was."[386]

867. Mr Straw told the Inquiry:

> "… any member of the Cabinet could easily have asked about the finely balanced nature [of the legal arguments] … [T]he finely balanced arguments are part of the process by which he came to that decision.
> "… He was going through all the arguments …
>
> "But there is nothing unusual about legal decisions being finely balanced … [W]hat Cabinet wanted … and needed to know … was what was the decision.
> "Nobody was preventing anybody from asking the Attorney … what the position was. In the event they chose not to. A number of lawyers were around the table. The legal issues had been extremely well aired in public, the press, and people were briefed anyway."[387]

868. Asked for an assurance that Cabinet was sufficiently informed, separately and collectively, to share responsibility for the risks a decision to invade Iraq entailed, "including risks, individual and collective, to Crown Servants, and … themselves", Mr Straw replied: "yes".[388]

869. Mr Straw added:

> "… we were being publicly bombarded with the arguments, and arguments about the consequences. We received detailed legal advice, for example, from CND saying why it was unlawful and what the personal consequences would be.
> "So everybody understood what the issues were and the level of responsibility, personal and individual …"[389]

870. Mr Straw also stated that Cabinet "was more involved in this decision" because members of Cabinet had to "explain themselves in the House of Commons as well as publicly and to their constituency parties".

871. Asked if he was fully satisfied with the advice that was given to Cabinet about the legality of the conflict, Mr Brown told the Inquiry that Lord Goldsmith's role was to give Cabinet advice, and that "he was certain about the advice he gave" but it was Cabinet's job to "make our decisions on the basis, not simply of the legal advice, but the moral, political and other case for taking action".[390]

872. Asked if he had been aware that Lord Goldsmith had earlier taken a different view, Mr Brown replied that he was not aware of the details and that he had not been involved in previous discussions with Lord Goldsmith. Mr Brown added:

> "We had this straightforward issue. We were sitting down as a Cabinet, to discuss the merits of taking action once the diplomatic avenues had been exhausted, unfortunately, and we had to have straightforward advice from the Attorney General: was it lawful or was it not? His advice in the Cabinet meeting was unequivocal."[391]

873. Asked if he had seen Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March, Mr Brown replied:

> "As I understand it, the constitutional position is very clear, that before a decision of such magnitude is made, the Attorney General has to say whether he thinks it is lawful or not. That was the straightforward question that we had to answer. If he had answered equivocally … then of course there would have been questions, but he was very straightforward in his recommendation.
> "To me, that was a necessary part of the discussion about the decision of war, but it wasn't sufficient, because we had to look at the political and other case that had to be examined in the light of the period of diplomacy at the United Nations."[392]

874. After further questioning, Mr Brown told the Inquiry:

> "I think in retrospect, people, as historians … will look at it very carefully … and what was said between different people at different times and what were the first … second … and the third drafts. But the issue for us was very clear … Did the Attorney General, who is our legal officer who is responsible for giving us legal advice … have a position … that was unequivocal? And his position on this was unequivocal.
> "… [I]t laid the basis on which we could take a decision, but it wasn't the reason that we made the decisions. He gave us the necessary means … but it wasn't sufficient in itself."[393]

875. Asked if his view would have changed if he had known that 10 days before the Cabinet discussion Lord Goldsmith's position had been equivocal, Mr Brown stated:

> "I don't think it would have changed my view, because unless he was prepared to say that his unequivocal advice was that this was not lawful, then the other arguments that I thought were important … the obligations to the international community, the failure to honour them, the failure to disclose, the failure to discharge the spirit and letter of the resolutions, particularly 1441 … But it seemed to me the Attorney General's advice was quite unequivocal."[394]

876. Asked whether Cabinet was able to take a genuinely collective decision or if it was being asked to endorse an approach at a time when the die had effectively been cast, Mr Brown replied:

> "I have got to be very clear. I believed we were making the right decisions for the right cause. I believed I had sufficient information before me to make a judgement … I wasn't trying to do the job of the Foreign Secretary or trying to second guess something that had happened at other meetings. I was looking at the issue on its merits and … I was convinced of the merits of our case."[395]

877. Asked if he thought he should have seen the full legal advice, Lord Boateng said:

> "On reflection, I think it would have been helpful if we had seen it. I think we would have had a fuller debate and discussion and I think that we ought to have been trusted with it, frankly. But be that as it may, we weren't, and we therefore acted upon the best legal advice we had. I don't think, if we had seen the full opinion, we would necessarily have come to a different conclusion. I think it would have been helpful if we had seen it. We didn't."[396]

878. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that, in respect of Lord Goldsmith's legal opinion:

> "… the key thing really was … Cabinet weren't interested in becoming part of the legal debate, they just wanted to know, 'Is the Attorney General saying it is lawful or not?'"[397]

879. Mr Blair stated that the legal issues were "one aspect" of the Cabinet discussion, but Cabinet was "really focused on the politics".[398]

880. Asked whether Cabinet should have weighed up the legal risk, Mr Blair replied:

> "I think they were weighing the risks up for the country, but … in respect of the law … I don't think members of the Cabinet wanted to have a debate … Peter was there and could have answered any questions they had, but their basic question to him was: is there a proper legal basis for this or not and his answer was, 'Yes.'
> "… the reason why we had Peter there … he was the lawyer there to talk about it."[399]

881. In a letter written to Lord Goldsmith in March 2005, Ms Short stated that the way the legal advice had been presented to Cabinet was a breach of the Ministerial Code.[400]

882. In 2003, the relevant provision of the Ministerial Code stated:

> "When advice from the Law Officers is included in correspondence between Ministers, or in papers for the Cabinet or Ministerial Committees, the conclusions may if necessary be summarised but, if this is done, the complete text of the advice should be attached."[401]

883. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry:

> "… the Ministerial Code, which talks about providing the full text of the Attorney General's opinion, is actually dealing with a quite different circumstance. That's dealing with the circumstance where a Minister comes to Cabinet and says 'I have got clearance from the Attorney General. He says this is all right, or she says this is all right'. In those circumstances, the Ministerial Code requires that the full text should be there rather than just the summary. You can summarise it but you need to produce the full text as well.

884. Lord Turnbull confirmed that in his view the requirements of the Ministerial Code had not been breached because Lord Goldsmith was present in person, rather than another Minister reporting his advice.[403]

885. Asked about the fact that Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March had raised the issue of the exposure of Ministers and Crown servants, both military and civil, to risk, Mr Brown told the Inquiry:

> "I knew … that the Permanent Secretary to the Civil Service [sic] and the military Chiefs [of Staff] had required, as they should, clear guidance … So I knew that they were satisfied that they had got the legal assurances that were necessary."[404]

Mr Straw's statement to the House of Commons, 17 March 2003

886. In his Statement to the House of Commons on the evening of 17 March, Mr Straw stated that the Government had reluctantly concluded that France's actions had put a consensus in the Security Council on a further resolution "beyond reach".

887. As a result of Saddam Hussein's persistent refusal to meet the UN's demands, Cabinet had decided to ask the House of Commons to support the UK's participation in military operations should they be necessary to achieve the disarmament of Iraq "and thereby the maintenance of the authority of the United Nations".

888. Mr Straw stated that Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer "set out the legal basis for the use of force".

889. Mr Straw drew attention to the significance of the fact that no-one "in all the discussions in the Security Council and outside" had claimed that Iraq was in full compliance with its obligations.

890. Mr Straw made a statement to the House of Commons at 8.24pm.[405]

891. Referring to the statement issued at the Azores Summit calling on all members of the Security Council to adopt a resolution challenging Saddam Hussein to take a strategic decision to disarm, Mr Straw told the House of Commons:

> "Such a resolution has never been needed legally, but we have long had a preference for it politically."

892. Mr Straw stated that there had been "intense diplomatic activity to secure that end over many months, culminating in the last 24 hours". Despite "final efforts" by Sir Jeremy Greenstock the previous evening and his own conversations with his "Spanish, American, Russian and Chinese counterparts that morning", the Government had:

> "… reluctantly concluded that a Security Council consensus on a new resolution would not be possible. On my instructions, Sir Jeremy Greenstock made a public announcement to that effect at the United Nations at about 3.15 pm UK time today."

893. Mr Straw continued that, since the adoption of resolution 1441 in November 2002, he, Mr Blair and Sir Jeremy Greenstock had "strained every nerve" in search of a consensus "which could finally persuade Iraq by peaceful means, to provide the full and immediate co-operation demanded by the Security Council".

894. Mr Straw stated that it was significant that "in all the discussions in the Security Council and outside" no-one had claimed that Iraq was "in full compliance with the obligations placed on it" and:

> "Given that, it was my belief, up to about a week ago, that we were close to achieving a consensus that we sought on the further resolution. Sadly, one country then ensured that the Security Council could not act. President Chirac's unequivocal announcement last Monday that France would veto a second resolution containing that or any ultimatum 'whatever the circumstances' inevitably created a sense of paralysis in our negotiations. I deeply regret that France has thereby put a Security Council consensus beyond reach."[406]

895. Mr Straw told the House of Commons that the proposals submitted by France, Germany and Russia for "more time and more inspections" sought to "rewrite" resolution 1441. They "would have allowed Saddam to continue stringing out inspections indefinitely, and he would rightly have drawn the lesson that the Security Council was simply not prepared to enforce the ultimatum … at the heart of resolution 1441".

896. Mr Straw pointed out that "in the event of non-compliance" Iraq should, as OP13 spelt out, expect "serious consequences". Mr Straw stated:

> "As a result of Saddam Hussein's persistent refusal to meet the UN's demands, and the inability of the Security Council to adopt a further resolution, the Cabinet has decided to ask the House to support the United Kingdom's participation in military operations, should they be necessary, with the objective of ensuring the disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, and thereby the maintenance of the authority of the United Nations."

897. Mr Straw confirmed that Parliament "would have an opportunity to debate our involvement in military action prior to hostilities" the following day; and that the debate would be on a substantive motion "proposed by the Prime Minister and Cabinet colleagues". He also drew the attention of the House to Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer, which "set out the legal basis for the use of force against Iraq", and the documents provided earlier that day.

898. Mr Straw concluded:

"Some say that Iraq can be disarmed without an ultimatum, without the threat or the use of force, but simply by more time and more inspections. That approach is defied by all our experience over 12 weary years. It cannot produce the disarmament of Iraq; it cannot rid the world of the danger of the Iraq regime. It can only bring comfort to tyrants and emasculate the authority of the United Nations …"

899. Mr Straw's statement was repeated in the House of Lords that day by Baroness Symons during a debate on the legality of the use of armed force in Iraq initiated by Lord Goodhart (see Section 3.8).[407]

900. In answer to the responses from Lord Howell of Guildford and Lord Wallace of Saltaire, Baroness Symons stated that she believed:

"… the legality of the position is indeed settled. I do not think we have ever had such a clear statement from the Attorney General at a juncture like this … I believe that this Government have gone further than any other Government to put that advice into the public arena, and the Law Officer with his principal responsibility has given a clear statement of his opinion …

"… [W]e have already put into the public arena a full history of the United Nations Security Council resolutions … That is in Command Paper 5769. We have also published a full statement on the legal basis – a fuller statement than that which my noble and learned friend gave in answer to … Baroness … Ramsey …"[408]

[408] House of Lords, Official Report, 17 March 2003, columns 101-102.

901. Responding to points made in the debate by Lord Goodhart and Lord Howell about the absence of Lord Goldsmith, Baroness Symons stated in her speech closing the debate:

> "The Attorney General has been more open-handed than any of his predecessors in publishing his advice in the way that he has. Furthermore … the Foreign Secretary has also tried to help … by circulating a further paper."[409]

902. Baroness Symons added that, "In recognition of the enormous importance of this issue", Lord Goldsmith had "decided to disclose his view of the legal basis for the use of force". That was:

> "… almost unprecedented. The last time a Law Officer's views were disclosed concerned the Maastricht Treaty in 1992. It is right that what has happened today remains the exception rather than the rule."

Conclusions

The timing of Lord Goldsmith's advice on the interpretation of resolution 1441

903. Following the adoption of resolution 1441, a decision was taken to delay the receipt of formal advice from Lord Goldsmith.

904. On 11 November Mr Powell told Lord Goldsmith that there should be a meeting some time before Christmas to discuss the legal position.

905. On 9 December, formal "instructions" to provide advice were sent to Lord Goldsmith. They were sent by the FCO on behalf of the FCO and the MOD as well as No.10.

906. The instructions made it clear that Lord Goldsmith should not provide an immediate response.

907. When Lord Goldsmith met Mr Powell, Sir David Manning and Baroness Morgan on 19 December, he was told that he was not, at that stage, being asked for his advice; and that, when he was, it would be helpful for him to discuss a draft with Mr Blair in the first instance.

908. Until 7 March 2003, Mr Blair and Mr Powell asked that Lord Goldsmith's views on the legal effect of resolution 1441 should be tightly held and not shared with Ministerial colleagues without No.10's permission.

909. Lord Goldsmith agreed that approach.

---

[409] House of Lords, Official Report, 17 March 2003, columns 117-118.

910. Lord Goldsmith provided draft advice to Mr Blair on 14 January 2003. As instructed he did not, at that time, provide a copy of his advice to Mr Straw or to Mr Hoon.

911. Although Lord Goldsmith was invited to attend Cabinet on 16 January, there was no discussion of Lord Goldsmith's views.

912. Mr Straw was aware, in general terms, of Lord Goldsmith's position but he was not provided with a copy of Lord Goldsmith's draft advice before Cabinet on 16 January. He did not read it until at least two weeks later.

913. The draft advice of 14 January should have been provided to Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and the Cabinet Secretary, all of whose responsibilities were directly engaged.

914. Lord Goldsmith provided Mr Blair with further advice on 30 January. It was not seen by anyone outside No.10.

915. Lord Goldsmith discussed the negotiating history of resolution 1441 with Mr Straw, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, with White House officials and the State Department's Legal Advisers. They argued that resolution 1441 could be interpreted as not requiring a second resolution. The US Government's position was that it would not have agreed to resolution 1441 had its terms required one.

916. When Lord Goldsmith met No.10 officials on 27 February, he told them that he had reached the view that a "reasonable case" could be made that resolution 1441 was capable of reviving the authorisation to use force in resolution 678 (1990) without a further resolution, if there were strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441.

917. Until that time, No.10 could not have been sure that Lord Goldsmith would advise that there was a basis on which military action against Iraq could be taken in the absence of a further decision of the Security Council.

918. In the absence of Lord Goldsmith's formal advice, uncertainties about the circumstances in which the UK would be able to participate in military action continued, although the possibility of a second resolution remained.

919. Lord Goldsmith provided formal written advice on 7 March.

Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March 2003

920. Lord Goldsmith's formal advice of 7 March set out alternative interpretations of the legal effect of resolution 1441. He concluded that the safer route would be to seek a second resolution, and he set out the ways in which, in the absence of a second resolution, the matter might be brought before a court. Lord Goldsmith identified a key question to be whether or not there was a need for an assessment of whether Iraq's conduct constituted a failure to take the final opportunity or a failure fully to co-operate within the meaning of OP4, such that the basis of the cease-fire was destroyed.

921. Lord Goldsmith wrote (paragraph 26): "A narrow textual reading of the resolution suggested no such assessment was needed because the Security Council had pre-determined the issue. Public statements, on the other hand, say otherwise."

922. While Lord Goldsmith remained "of the opinion that the safest legal course would be to secure a second resolution", he concluded (paragraph 28) that "a reasonable case can be made that resolution 1441 was capable of reviving the authorisation in resolution 678 without a further resolution".

923. Lord Goldsmith wrote that a reasonable case did not mean that if the matter ever came to court, he would be confident that the court would agree with this view. He judged a court might well conclude that OPs 4 and 12 required a further Security Council decision in order to revive the authorisation in resolution 678.

924. Lord Goldsmith noted that on a number of previous occasions, including in relation to Operation Desert Fox in Iraq in 1998 and Kosovo in 1999, UK forces had participated in military action on the basis of advice from previous Attorneys General that (paragraph 30) "the legality of the action under international law was no more than reasonably arguable".

925. Lord Goldsmith warned Mr Blair (paragraph 29):

> "… the argument that resolution 1441 alone has revived the authorisation to use force in resolution 678 will only be sustainable if there are strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq failed to take the final opportunity. In other words, we would need to be able to demonstrate hard evidence of non-compliance and non-cooperation … the views of UNMOVIC and the IAEA will be highly significant in this respect."

926. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "In the light of the latest reporting by UNMOVIC, you will need to consider extremely carefully whether the evidence of non-cooperation and non-compliance by Iraq is sufficiently compelling to justify the conclusion that Iraq has failed to take its final opportunity."

927. Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Dr Reid and the Chiefs of Staff had all seen Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March before the No.10 meeting on 11 March, but it is not clear how and when it reached them.

928. Other Ministers whose responsibilities were directly engaged, including Mr Brown and Ms Short, and their senior officials, did not see the advice.

Lord Goldsmith's arrival at a "better view"

929. At the meeting on 11 March, Mr Blair stated that Lord Goldsmith's "advice made it clear that a reasonable case could be made" that resolution 1441 was "capable of reviving" the authorisation of resolution 678, "although of course a second resolution would be preferable". There was concern, however, that the advice did not offer a clear indication that military action would be lawful.

930. Lord Goldsmith was asked, after the meeting, by Adm Boyce on behalf of the Armed Forces, and by the Treasury Solicitor, Ms Juliet Wheldon, in respect of the Civil Service, to give a clear-cut answer on whether military action would be lawful rather than unlawful.

931. On 12 March, Mr Blair and Mr Straw reached the view that there was no chance of securing a majority in the Security Council in support of the draft resolution of 7 March and there was a risk of one or more vetoes if the resolution was put to a vote.

932. There is no evidence to indicate that Lord Goldsmith was informed of their conclusion.

933. Lord Goldsmith concluded on 13 March that, on balance, the "better view" was that the conditions for the operation of the revival argument were met in this case, meaning that there was a lawful basis for the use of force without a further resolution beyond resolution 1441.

The exchange of letters on 14 and 15 March 2003

934. Mr Brummell wrote to Mr Rycroft on 14 March:

> "It is an essential part of the legal basis for military action without a further resolution of the Security Council that there is strong evidence that Iraq has failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of resolution 1441 and has thus failed to take the final opportunity offered by the Security Council in that resolution. The Attorney General understands that it is unequivocally the Prime Minister's view that Iraq has committed further material breaches as specified in [operative] paragraph 4 of resolution 1441, but as this is a judgment for the Prime Minister, the Attorney would be grateful for confirmation that this is the case."

935. Mr Rycroft replied to Mr Brummell on 15 March:

> "This is to confirm that it is indeed the Prime Minister's unequivocal view that Iraq is in further material breach of its obligations, as in OP4 of UNSCR 1441, because of 'false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq pursuant to this resolution and failure to comply with, and co-operate fully in the interpretation of, this resolution'."

936. It is unclear what specific grounds Mr Blair relied upon in reaching his view.

937. In his advice of 7 March, Lord Goldsmith had said that the views of UNMOVIC and the IAEA would be highly significant in demonstrating hard evidence of non-compliance and non-co-operation. In the exchange of letters on 14 and 15 March between Mr Brummell and No.10, there is no reference to their views; the only view referred to was that of Mr Blair.

938. Following receipt of Mr Brummell's letter of 14 March, Mr Blair neither requested nor received considered advice addressing the evidence on which he expressed his "unequivocal view" that Iraq was "in further material breach of its obligations".

939. Senior Ministers should have considered the question posed in Mr Brummell's letter of 14 March, either in the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee or a "War Cabinet", on the basis of formal advice. Such a Committee should then have reported its conclusions to Cabinet before its members were asked to endorse the Government's policy.

Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer of 17 March 2003

940. In Parliament during the second week of March, and in the media, there were calls on the Government to make a statement about its legal position.

941. When Lord Goldsmith spoke to Mr Brummell on 13 March, they agreed that a statement should be prepared "setting out the Attorney's view of the legal position which could be deployed at Cabinet and in Parliament the following week".

942. The message was conveyed to No.10 during the morning of 15 March that Lord Goldsmith "would make clear during the course of the week that there is a sound legal basis for action should that prove necessary".

943. The decision that Lord Goldsmith would take the lead in explaining the Government's legal position to Parliament, rather than the Prime Minister or responsible Secretary of State providing that explanation, was unusual.

944. The normal practice was, and is, that the Minister responsible for the policy, in this case Mr Blair or Mr Straw, would have made such a statement.

Cabinet, 17 March 2003

945. Cabinet was provided with the text of Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer to Baroness Ramsey setting out the legal basis for military action.

946. That document represented a statement of the Government's legal position – it did not explain the legal basis of the conclusion that Iraq had failed to take "the final opportunity" to comply with its disarmament obligations offered by resolution 1441.

947. Lord Goldsmith told Cabinet that it was "plain" that Iraq had failed to comply with its obligations and continued to be in "material breach" of the relevant Security Council resolutions. The authority to use force under resolution 678 was, "as a result", revived. Lord Goldsmith said that there was no need for a further resolution.

948. Cabinet was not provided with written advice which set out, as the advice of 7 March had done, the conflicting arguments regarding the legal effect of resolution 1441 and whether, in particular, it authorised military action without a further resolution of the Security Council.

949. Cabinet was not provided with, or informed of, Mr Brummell's letter to Mr Rycroft of 14 March; or Mr Rycroft's response of 15 March. Cabinet was not told how Mr Blair had reached the view recorded in Mr Rycroft's letter.

950. The majority of Cabinet members who gave evidence to the Inquiry took the position that the role of the Attorney General on 17 March was, simply, to tell Cabinet whether or not there was a legal basis for military action.

951. None of those Ministers who had read Lord Goldsmith's 7 March advice asked for an explanation as to why his legal view of resolution 1441 had changed.

952. There was little appetite to question Lord Goldsmith about his advice, and no substantive discussion of the legal issues was recorded.

953. Cabinet was not misled on 17 March and the exchange of letters between the Attorney General's office and No.10 on 14 and 15 March did not constitute, as suggested to the Inquiry by Ms Short, a "side deal".

954. Cabinet was, however, being asked to confirm the decision that the diplomatic process was at an end and that the House of Commons should be asked to endorse the use of military action to enforce Iraq's compliance. Given the gravity of this decision, Cabinet should have been made aware of the legal uncertainties.

955. Lord Goldsmith should have been asked to provide written advice which fully reflected the position on 17 March, explained the legal basis on which the UK could take military action and set out the risks of legal challenge.

956. The advice should have addressed the significance of the exchange of letters of 14 and 15 March and how, in the absence of agreement from the majority of members of the Security Council, the point had been reached that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441.

957. The advice should have been provided to Ministers and senior officials whose responsibilities were directly engaged and should have been made available to Cabinet.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the UK planning for a military invasion of Iraq and the decisions:

- on 31 October 2002 to offer ground forces to the US for planning purposes for operations in northern Iraq; and
- in December to deploy an amphibious force, including 3 Commando Brigade.

2. This Section does not address:

- The decision in mid-January 2003 to deploy a divisional headquarters and three combat brigades for potential operations in southern Iraq and the commitment of those forces to a combat role in the initial stages of the invasion of Iraq. That is addressed in Section 6.2. That Section also sets out the principles of international humanitarian law (IHL) governing the conduct of military operations, including control of targeting decisions.
- The campaign plan for the invasion which is addressed in Section 8.
- The roles and responsibilities of the Defence Secretary, the Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), the Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), and other key military officers and civilians, and the way in which advice was prepared for Ministers and decisions taken in the MOD in 2002 and 2003. They are set out in Section 2.
- The decisions on the wider UK strategy and options in relation to Iraq which are necessary to understand the wider context surrounding military deployments. Those are addressed in Section 3.
- The UK's assessments of Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes and its intentions to retain and conceal its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) capabilities. They are addressed in Section 4.
- The consideration of the legal basis for military action, which is addressed in Section 5.
- The preparations to equip the force for operations in Iraq, and the implications of the decisions between mid-December 2002 and mid-January 2003 to increase the size of UK combat forces and be ready to take an earlier role in the invasion in support of US forces. They are addressed in Section 6.3.
- The funding for the operation, which is addressed in Section 13.
- The planning and preparations for the UK military contribution post-conflict, including decisions on the UK's Area of Responsibility (AOR) for UK military forces. They are addressed in Sections 6.4 and 6.5.

Key findings

- The size and composition of a UK military contribution to the US-led invasion of Iraq was largely discretionary. The US wanted some UK capabilities (including Special Forces) to use UK bases, and the involvement of the UK military to avoid the perception of unilateral US military action. The primary impetus to maximise the size of the UK contribution and the recommendations on its composition came from the Armed Forces, with the agreement of Mr Hoon.
- From late February 2002, the UK judged that Saddam Hussein's regime could only be removed by a US-led invasion.
- In April 2002, the MOD advised that, if the US mounted a major military operation, the UK should contribute a division comprising three brigades. That was perceived to be commensurate with the UK's capabilities and the demands of the campaign. Anything smaller risked being compared adversely to the UK's contribution to the liberation of Kuwait in 1991.
- The MOD saw a significant military contribution as a means of influencing US decisions.
- Mr Blair and Mr Hoon wanted to keep open the option of contributing significant forces for ground operations as long as possible, but between May and mid-October consistently pushed back against US assumptions that the UK would provide a division.
- Air and maritime forces were offered to the US for planning purposes in September.
- The MOD advised in October that the UK was at risk of being excluded from US plans unless it offered ground forces, "Package 3", on the same basis as air and maritime forces. That could also significantly reduce the UK's vulnerability to US requests to provide a substantial and costly contribution to post-conflict operations.
- From August until December 2002, other commitments meant that UK planning for Package 3 was based on providing a divisional headquarters and an armoured brigade for operations in northern Iraq. That was seen as the maximum practicable contribution the UK could generate within the predicted timescales for US action.
- The deployment was dependent on Turkey's agreement to the transit of UK forces.
- Mr Blair agreed to offer Package 3 on 31 October 2002.
- That decision and its potential consequences were not formally considered by a Cabinet Committee or reported to Cabinet.
- In December 2002, the deployment of 3 Commando Brigade was identified as a way for the UK to make a valuable contribution in the initial stages of a land campaign if transit through Turkey was refused. The operational risks were not explicitly addressed.
- Following a visit to Turkey on 7 to 8 January 2003, Mr Hoon concluded that there would be no agreement to the deployment of UK ground forces through Turkey.
- By that time, in any case, the US had asked the UK to deploy for operations in southern Iraq.

MOD Defence Planning Assumptions

3. The Armed Forces' capacity to deploy and sustain expeditionary operations was determined by decisions in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review.

4. Defence Planning Assumptions (DPAs) were developed by the MOD to convert policy into detailed guidance that could be used by military planners.[1] They outline the levels of activity the Armed Forces plan to be able to undertake, and the contexts in which they are expected to operate. They are used to identify and resource the planned force structure, capabilities and equipment of the Armed Forces.

5. The DPAs extant in 2002-2003 were those defined in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR 98). It identified eight Missions which the Armed Forces could be expected to undertake, which were further divided into 28 Military Tasks. The Planning Assumptions defined the required level of forces, or scale of effort, allocated to each Military Task.

6. In relation to the ability to deploy forces to deal with overseas crises, SDR 98 stated that the objective was to "be able to make a reasonable contribution to multi-national operations" in support of the UK's "foreign and security policy objectives". On that basis "broad benchmarks" had been set for planning that the UK should be able to:

> "– respond to a major international crisis which might require a military effort and combat operations of a similar scale and duration to the Gulf War when we deployed an armoured division, 26 major warships and over 80 combat aircraft.
> "or
> "– undertake a more extended overseas deployment on a lesser scale (as over the last few years in Bosnia) while retaining the ability to mount a second substantial deployment – which might involve a combat brigade and appropriate naval and air forces – if this were made necessary by a second crisis. We would not, however, expect both deployments to involve war fighting or to maintain them simultaneously for longer than six months."[2]

7. SDR 98 determined that the UK's land forces should include two "deployable divisions" and six deployable brigades, three "armoured" and three "mechanised", together with two "lighter and more specialised deployable brigades, an airmobile brigade and the Royal Marine Commando Brigade".[3]

8. The principal scales of effort defined in SDR 98 were:

- small scale: "a deployment of battalion size or equivalent" such as the Royal Navy ARMILLA patrol in the Gulf, the British contribution to United Nations Forces in Cyprus (UNFICYP), and the Royal Air Force operations enforcing the No-Fly Zones (NFZs) over northern and southern Iraq;
- medium scale: "deployments of brigade size or equivalent" for warfighting or other operations, such as the UK contribution in the mid-1990s to the NATO-led Implementation Force (IFOR) in Bosnia;
- large scale: deployments of division size or equivalent, the "nearest recent example" being the UK contribution to the 1991 Gulf Conflict, "although on that occasion the British division deployed with only two of its three brigades". That was "the maximum size of force we would plan to be able to contribute to peace enforcement operations, or to regional conflicts outside the NATO area"; and
- very large scale and full scale: all the forces that would be made available to NATO to meet a major threat such as significant aggression against an ally. The difference between the two reflected the time available for preparation – "warning time", and the size of the threat.

9. The Planning Assumptions also defined:

- endurance: the likely duration of individual Military Tasks. The force structure for each Service needed to be able to sustain tasks for the required period, including where necessary by rotating individual units deployed and, where units were deployed on operations, allowing units a period of respite between each deployment as set out in the "Harmony Guidelines"[4] of each Service.
- concurrency: the number of operations of a given scale of effort and duration that could be sustained by the force structure. SDR 98 concluded that "not to be able to conduct two medium scale operations at the same time would be an unacceptable constraint on our ability to discharge Britain's commitments and responsibilities. It would, for example, oblige us to withdraw from an enduring commitment such as Bosnia in order to respond to a second crisis."[5]

10. The Defence Strategic Plan (DSP), a confidential MOD document, included greater detail than was published in the SDR report.[6] It identified specific readiness criteria in relation to operations against Iraq, stating:

> "… we need to maintain the ability to respond within short warning times to an Iraqi threat, and to build up forces thereafter. This again requires us to hold capabilities needed to mount a medium scale deployment at high readiness (30 days). For a large scale deployment we need to plan on a framework division being ready within 90 days."

11. The Defence White Paper 1999 stated:

"The assumptions made in the SDR were not intended to be an exact template for everything we have been called on to do. They were intended rather as a guide to the long term development of our forces without prejudicing the size of an actual commitment in particular contingencies … But the SDR provided us with a demonstrably sound and robust basis for planning and operations of all kinds."[7]

12. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff from February 2003 to August 2006, told the Inquiry that the Planning Assumptions were:

"… not just a bit of [an] intellectual experiment … they drive force structures, they drive stocks, they drive equipment."[8]

The possibility of military invasion emerges

The impact of 9/11

13. After the attacks on the US on 9/11, the UK was concerned that the US might take immediate military action against Iraq.

14. The discussion in the UK about what to do about Iraq in the wake of the attack on the US on 9/11 and the "war against terrorism", and the limitations on what the UK knew about US thinking and military operations, is addressed in Section 3.1.

15. The UK took the view that the status quo on Iraq was no longer acceptable and that Iraq's defiance of the international community would need to be addressed. But the UK sought to steer the US away from unilateral military action.

16. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush by telephone on 3 December 2001.[9] The conversation was primarily about the position in Afghanistan.

17. In a discussion on future options in relation to Iraq, Mr Blair told President Bush that Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), and Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), would be in Washington later that week. That would be an opportunity to share thinking on "how the next phase might proceed".

18. The record of the conversation was sent to Mr Hoon's Private Secretary and Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), amongst others.

[8] Public hearing, 28 July 2010, page 7.
[9] Letter Tatham to McDonald, 3 December 2001, 'Telephone Conversation with President Bush'.

19. Mr Blair sent President Bush a paper, 'The War Against Terrorism: The Second Phase', on 4 December.[10]

20. The paper comprised an overview of the possible approaches to potential terrorist threats in seven countries[11] and a 'Strategy for Confronting Islamic Extremism' in moderate Muslim states.

21. In relation to Iraq, the key points were:

- Iraq was a threat because: "it has WMD capability; is acquiring more; has shown its willingness to use it; and can export that capability". Iraq was in breach of UN Security Council resolutions 687 (1991), 715 (1991) and 1284 (1999) and Saddam Hussein supported certain Palestinian terrorist groups and used terror tactics against Iraqi dissidents.
- Any link to 11 September and Al Qaida (AQ) was "at best very tenuous".
- Although "people want to be rid of Saddam", international opinion outside the US and the UK would "at present" be "reluctant" to support immediate military action.

22. Mr Blair suggested that a "strategy for regime change that builds over time" was needed "until we get to the point where military action could be taken if necessary" without losing international support and "facing a choice between massive intervention and nothing".

23. Although the UK was aware in December 2001 that the US was conducting a full review of all its options, there are no indications in the papers seen by the Inquiry that the UK was aware that President Bush had commissioned General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief US Central Command (CENTCOM), to look at military options for removing Saddam Hussein; and that that would include options for a conventional land invasion.

24. Mr Kevin Tebbit, the MOD Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), visited Washington from 6 to 7 December where his meetings with a range of contacts included discussions on Afghanistan and the next stage of the "war against terrorism".[12]

25. While he was in Washington, an attempt was made by a senior Republican close to the Pentagon to persuade Mr Tebbit that the Iraqi National Congress (INC) could be a force to be reckoned with which would be sufficient to cause an Iraqi response and enable the US to take supportive military action.[13]

26. Mr Tebbit commissioned an analysis of that thesis, which he expected would "show it to be flawed".

27. On 19 December, Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, held a meeting with Adm Boyce, Mr Tebbit and others, to discuss the sustainability of operations in the No-Fly Zones and implications for plans for the defence of Kuwait, in the light of reduced patrolling following the invasion of Afghanistan.[14]

28. Mr Hoon asked, in the context of the changed political environment since 9/11, for further advice "detailing the current state of operations over Iraq and the political and military implications of continuing with the current patrolling patterns" and "options for future action together with their political, legal and military implications". The options could be part of "a discrete operation" or "a wider campaign", and could range from fewer patrols, maintaining current operations, to an incremental increase and "a significant large scale operation".

29. It is now public knowledge that President Bush had asked for military options for action in Iraq to be reviewed in autumn 2001; and that he had been briefed by Gen Franks on 28 December 2001 and 7 February 2002.

30. The MOD had some knowledge of that debate, but it was not fully aware of all aspects of the discussions.

31. Admiral the Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that "there was no contingency planning or thinking about Iraq, so far as the Ministry of Defence was concerned, in 2001".[15]

32. Lord Boyce subsequently told the Inquiry that discussions between the UK and US about the conduct of joint operations to enforce the No-Fly Zones had continued.[16]

33. Lord Boyce stated:

> "We were flatly saying we are not considering or contemplating military action in Iraq. We were really quite strongly against that. We were certainly not doing any thinking about … military adventures into Iraq in the early part of 2002, other than maintaining our No-Fly Zone capabilities and so forth."[17]

34. General Sir John Reith, Chief of Joint Operations (CJO) from August 2001 to May 2004, told the Inquiry that CENTCOM had had plans in place for the invasion of Iraq after 1991.[18]

35. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that he had been "quite surprised" when later on the US "started planning as quickly as they did in Iraq, that they were doing so before they sorted out Afghanistan".[19]

36. The MOD view in late January 2002 about the wisdom of taking any military action was cautious. It identified an opportunity to influence US thinking, which was far from settled.

37. On 24 January 2002, Dr Simon Cholerton, Assistant Director in Secretariat (Overseas) (Sec(O)), wrote to Mr Hoon, setting out the risks of taking action against Iraqi air defences in response to Iraqi violations in the No-Fly Zones.[20] That would require careful handling to avoid being seen as the next phase of "the war on international terrorism".

38. Dr Cholerton discussed the possibility of wider action against Iraq. He emphasised that neither the MOD nor the FCO had seen any "detailed US planning". Work on policy options, at both military and political levels, was continuing in the US but "little, if anything has been shared with the UK".

39. The case against Iraq, as "a candidate for 'Phase 2' in the GWOT [Global War on Terrorism]", would be based on the threat to US national security posed by Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programme in the absence of any evidence of Iraqi involvement in the 9/11 attacks. US thinking was far from settled and there "should be a window of opportunity to influence the US position".

40. Dr Cholerton also advised that the "initial assessment of the efficacy (never mind the legality) of military action to effect regime change is that it is poor". He drew attention to the work commissioned by Mr Tebbit in December 2001, which had addressed the strengths and weaknesses of the INC. That had concluded that there was "no Northern Alliance equivalent … who could take advantage of precision bombing" in Iraq.

41. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that the "long experience of patrolling the No-Fly Zones" was "a significant factor" in subsequent discussions about military intervention in Iraq:

> "There was increasing concern about the risks involved in these operations and the consequences for example if a British or American aircraft was shot down. It was certainly speculated at the time that this could lead to military intervention to rescue downed personnel; and that such operations could lead to a wider engagement."[21]

President Bush's "axis of evil" speech and the UK response

42. President Bush's State of the Union speech on 29 January 2002 referred to Iraq, Iran and North Korea as "an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world".[22]

43. The speech prompted a major public debate on both sides of the Atlantic about policy towards Iraq.

44. The UK's response, discussions between No.10 and the White House, and the advice commissioned by No.10, including a paper analysing the options on Iraq and a paper for public consumption setting out the facts on WMD, are addressed in Section 3.2.

45. Sir David Manning was assured by Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, that no decisions would be taken before the planned meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush at Crawford in early April.[23]

46. No.10 commissioned a number of papers to inform preparations for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush.[24]

47. By late February, US military action to achieve regime change in Iraq later that year was seen as a serious possibility.

48. The Chiefs of Staff were informed on 19 February that:

> "A sustained bombing campaign combined with internal opposition forces plus US covert action would not be sufficient to effect a regime change. Any ground invasion if it was perceived to be against the Sunni hegemony rather than that of Saddam himself, would incur greater resistance … [T]he US would not be in a position to project such a force until autumn 02. Basing in the region would be problematic …
> "US intent appeared to be to stem the creeping tide of WMD. Given that neither arms control or leverage were working, a line had to be drawn on the issues and in the case of Iraq, the line had been reached … The US also had to consider the possibility of Saddam retreating to the North of Iraq and the consequences that this could have to maintaining another leader in Baghdad … COS [Chiefs of Staff] needed to be more in tune with US planning and on message when speaking to their colleagues abroad. COS therefore requested regular updates as the FCO/MOD/US dialogue unfolded."[25]

49. The thinking in the MOD at the time, about the position in Iraq and the US military options, is set out in more detail in the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) paper issued on 5 March, which is addressed later in this Section.

JIC ASSESSMENT, 27 FEBRUARY 2002: 'IRAQ: SADDAM UNDER THE SPOTLIGHT'

50. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessment of 27 February reached the view that, without direct intervention on the ground, the opposition would be unable to overthrow Saddam Hussein's regime.

51. If he was unable to deter a US attack, Saddam Hussein would "go down fighting and could adopt high risk options".

52. At the request of the JIC, an Assessment, 'Iraq: Saddam Under the Spotlight', was produced on 27 February.[26] It addressed "Saddam's threat perceptions and internal position: whether he is secure, what opposition he faces, and what he is doing to try and avoid the internal and international threats he faces".

53. The Key Judgements included:

- "Saddam fears a US military attack which would threaten his regime by bringing about the disintegration of his military and security apparatus. A force on the scale of Desert Storm (1991) would constitute such a threat."
- Saddam Hussein would permit the return of weapons inspectors if large-scale military action was believed to be imminent, but he would seek to frustrate their efforts.
- "The Special Republican Guard (SRG) remains closely tied to Saddam's regime and is likely to resist any attempt to overthrow him. The Republican Guard … would be relatively resilient under attack but its loyalty in dire straits is more open to question than the SRG. Other elements of the Iraq military are more liable to crack if subjected to a strong attack."
- The "opposition" was "militarily weak and riven by factional differences. They will not act without visible and sustained US military support on the ground. A coup or military revolt is only a remote possibility."

54. The JIC also judged that Saddam Hussein did not believe such an attack was inevitable.

55. Elaborating the final Key Judgement, the Assessment stated:

> "Overall we judge that, unaided, the Iraqi opposition is incapable of overthrowing the Iraqi regime; in the present circumstances a coup or military revolt remains only a remote possibility. With outside help short of direct intervention on the ground, the opposition would still be unable to succeed. Spontaneous mass uprisings might be more important if the regime's control wavered, but this is not in prospect; however, it might hasten the regime's downfall in conjunction with a massive US attack."

[26] JIC Assessment, 27 February 2002, 'Iraq: Saddam Under the Spotlight'.

56. The JIC considered that the Kurds and Shia "would not show their hand until US resolve to overthrow Saddam" was "absolutely clear". There was "no obvious leader" among those groups who was "capable of unifying the opposition" and had "credibility and popular appeal inside Iraq". No likely replacement for Saddam Hussein from within the regime had been identified, but the JIC stated that, in the event of internal change, it was "likely that any successor would be autocratic and drawn from the Sunni military elite".

THE MOD PERSPECTIVE

57. The MOD advised Mr Hoon that the UK should not rule out military action against Iraq; and that it should think through the options in more depth to improve the "prospects for influencing the US towards a successful outcome".

58. Mr Simon Webb, MOD Policy Director, sent Mr Hoon advice on 27 February on how the UK might approach the three countries referred to by President Bush as an "axis of evil".[27]

59. Mr Webb recommended that the UK should acknowledge that the countries posed "increasing" risks to international stability; and that the US should be persuaded to explain why. The UK should:

> "Encourage a broad-based approach ranging from diplomacy to challenge inspections and levers on suppliers.
> "Not rule out UK participation in military action against Iraq […] if that is the only way to stem the tide of WMD proliferation and a worthwhile and legal option exists at the time."

60. Mr Webb also stated that it was important to distinguish between two strands: the "direct risks from proliferation" and the "potential association with international terrorism".

61. In the context of the response from European partners, Mr Webb advised:

> "… it would be wiser for the UK to take a more complex position supporting the underlying concerns but advocating a greater mix of possible approaches. No.10 have started to take this line over the last week but we need to think through the options in more depth. In this way we have better prospects of influencing the US towards a successful outcome. Above all we should encourage the US to explain the issues more effectively …"

62. Mr Webb's detailed advice on the risks from Iraq's WMD is addressed in Section 4.1.

---

[27] Minute Webb to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 27 February 2002, 'Axis of Evil'.

63. Mr Webb asked Mr Hoon for approval for the overall approach he had set out, on which he would "be working with the Cabinet Office" before Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush in early April.

64. Mr Webb stated:

> "If specific military options start to be considered in the US, we would of course seek his [Mr Hoon's] guidance on whether the UK should participate in planning."

65. Mr William Ehrman, FCO Director International Security, who had been shown a draft of Mr Webb's advice, raised a number of questions, and asked for a briefing for himself and Mr William Patey, FCO, Head, Middle East Department (MED), on what the MOD considered to be the "valid options for military operations in some specific scenarios against Iraq".[28] Mr Ehrman underlined the potential legal difficulties, including differences between the UK and the US on the question of whether a determination that Iraq was flouting UNSCRs could be made without collective Security Council authorisation.

66. A DIS paper on the possible US military options for removing Saddam Hussein was issued on 5 March.

67. The paper provides insights into some of the judgements in the JIC Assessment of 27 February, the Cabinet Office Options Paper of 8 March, and the thinking within the MOD which informed subsequent analysis and military planning, including uncertainty about what regime might replace Saddam Hussein.

68. At the request of Air Marshal Joe French, Chief of Defence Intelligence (CDI), the DIS produced a paper examining "US military" options for removing Saddam Hussein over the next 12 months on 5 March.[29] That did not "look at longer-term options, such as a covert action programme designed to achieve regime overthrow". The paper did, however, consider Saddam Hussein's options and likely intentions as he was "well aware of the possibility of action against him".

69. Addressing the feasibility of action to topple Saddam Hussein, the paper stated that:

- Perception of US intent was critical to all three broad options for regime change.
- Assassination or direct targeting of Saddam Hussein and the senior regime leadership was "unfeasible".
- Sustained airstrikes alone would not convince the Iraqi populace of US determination to overthrow the regime. Airstrikes and a widespread insurgency with US covert action on the ground was a "feasible option", but it would not "guarantee success".

---

[28] Letter Ehrman to Webb, 27 February 2002, 'Axis of Evil'.
[29] Paper DIS, 5 March 2002, 'Politico Military Memorandum, Removing Saddam'.

- Internal forces could only remove Saddam Hussein with the involvement of a Sunni strongman; but such an individual would be acting to preserve Sunni hegemony. That was "unlikely to be acceptable to Kurdish and in particular, Shia insurgents".
- The UK intelligence community had consistently assessed that "the only viable, long term successor to Saddam will come from within the Sunni security/military structure". He would be "unlikely to command popular support" and would be "forced (and probably inclined) to run Iraq along autocratic lines". Iraq would "remain a unitary state", but its long-term problems "would not disappear with Saddam".
- A "sustained air campaign combined with a ground invasion" would topple the regime.

70. Addressing Iraq's defences, the DIS wrote:

- The disposition of Iraqi forces was "defensive".
- Saddam Hussein would not take offensive action against the Kurds – he knew that would "definitely provoke US action".
- Equipment was "increasingly obsolescent" and US air supremacy was "certain". Key units might fight, "but the regime could fall quickly".
- "If softened by an air campaign, and facing US ground forces", the collapse of Iraqi Regular Army (RA) units "could be as swift as it was in 1991, particularly given the lack of a viable air force. The regime would quickly lose control of the South …"
- If the RA and the Republican Guard Forces Command (RGFC) "decided that they [were] defending the Iraqi homeland and Sunni dominance rather than just Saddam Hussein" they were "more likely to offer a tenacious and protracted resistance".

71. Addressing the possibility of Iraq using WMD, the DIS wrote that it had "no definitive intelligence" on Iraq's concepts for the use of WMD:

> "Iraq did not employ WMD against coalition forces … [in 1991], nor against the subsequent internal uprisings. We judge that Saddam wished to avoid regime-threatening retaliation from the coalition. Hence the use of WMD will be linked to perception of regime survivability. Were the regime in danger of imminent collapse, Saddam might consider use of WMD against internal opposition, US forces or Israel."

72. Other points made by the DIS included:

- The US would need three to four months to assemble a force capable of taking military action. It was "conceivable" that it could be ready to begin the first phase of an air campaign in May (when the UN was next due to review Iraq) "but late summer would be better, not least to avoid ground operations in the summer heat".

- Turkey would be wary of any regime change plan that encouraged or created the conditions in which Kurdish separatism may grow in strength. It wanted a stable, unitary and secular Iraq.
- Iraq would remain a unitary state but many of the structural problems would remain and: "We should also expect considerable anti-Western sentiment among a populace that has experienced ten years of sanctions."
- "A US attempt to create a more equitable long-term distribution of power in Iraq would require massive and lengthy commitment. Modern Iraq has been dominated politically, militarily and socially by the Sunni. To alter that would entail re-creation of Iraq's civil, political and military structures. That would require a US-directed transition of power (ie US troops occupying Baghdad) and support thereafter. Ten years seems a not unrealistic time span for such a project."

73. The paper was sent to Mr Hoon, the Chiefs of Staff, Sir Kevin Tebbit,[30] Mr Webb, Lieutenant General Sir Anthony Pigott, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments), and a small number of other individuals. It was also sent to Mr John Scarlett, the Chairman of the JIC, the Assessments Staff, Mr Tom Dodd, OD Sec, Dr Amanda Tanfield, FCO Head of Iraq Section, Middle East Department, and SIS.

74. The paper was subsequently included in the pack of reading material on Iraq for Mr Blair, sent to No.10 by Mr Scarlett on 1 August (see Section 3.4).

75. On 6 March, the Chiefs of Staff were informed that Iraq was "sliding rapidly up the scale of interest and a degree of strategic planning was essential at some point in the near future, given the lead times necessary to shape pol/mil thinking effectively".[31]

76. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that Air Chief Marshal Sir Anthony Bagnall, Vice Chief of the Defence Staff (VCDS), who was chairing the meeting in CDS's absence, should "refresh" work on Urgent Operational Requirements (UORs) to ensure that it was not left "too late".

77. The process of identifying and agreeing UORs to equip UK forces deployed to Iraq later in 2002 is addressed in Section 6.3.

78. Discussions with the Treasury on funding for operations in Iraq are addressed in Section 13.

CABINET, 7 MARCH 2002

79. Cabinet on 7 March was assured that no decision to launch military action had been taken and "any action would be in accordance with international law".

---

[30] Sir Kevin Tebbit was appointed KCB in the 2002 New Year Honours List.
[31] Minutes, 6 March 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

80. Mr Blair and other Ministers had not received any considered, cross-government advice on the policy issues or options before the Cabinet discussion.

81. The Cabinet Office 'Iraq: Options Paper' of 8 March was prepared as a background paper by relatively junior officials. It contained no recommendation and was not intended to provide the basis for decisions. It was not formally considered and approved by senior officials.

82. From late February 2002, Mr Blair and Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, began to set out the argument that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with in articles in the press and public statements which are described in Section 3.2.

83. In addition, a briefing paper on Iraq for the Parliamentary Labour Party (PLP) was prepared, at Mr Straw's request, by his Special Adviser, Dr Michael Williams.[32]

84. Mr Straw's Private Office signed a letter to members of Cabinet on 6 March suggesting that they might find the paper on Iraq "useful background".[33]

85. In Cabinet on 7 March (see Section 3.2), several Ministers expressed concern about the possibility of US military action against Iraq and its implications.

86. Cabinet was assured that no decision to launch military action had been taken and "any action would be in accordance with international law".

87. Mr Blair concluded that the right strategy was to engage the US Government closely to shape policy and its presentation.

THE CABINET OFFICE 'IRAQ: OPTIONS PAPER'

88. A collection of "background briefs" in preparation for his meeting with President Bush in early April was sent to Mr Blair on 8 March.[34]

89. The papers included a Cabinet Office 'Iraq: Options Paper',[35] together with two FCO papers, 'Iraq: Legal Background'[36] and the 'Military Action against Iraq: Attitudes of Selected Third Countries'.[37] The Cabinet Office paper and its origins are addressed in detail in Section 3.2.

[37] Paper Foreign and Commonwealth Office, March 2002, 'Military Action against Iraq: Attitudes of Selected Third Countries'.

90. The Cabinet Office paper did not make any recommendations but analysed two broad options: toughening the existing containment policy, and regime change by military means. The points made in the paper included:

- An improved containment policy would make a sanctions regime more attractive and reduce Iraq's illicit revenues. The return of the inspectors would also allow greater scrutiny of Iraq's WMD programme and security forces.
- Some of the difficulties with the existing policy would, however, still apply and the US had lost confidence in containment.
- The only certain means to remove Saddam Hussein and his elite was to invade and impose a new government. That would be a new departure which would require the construction of a coalition and a legal justification.
- Internal regime change in Iraq was likely to result in government by another Sunni military strongman.
- If the US and others committed to nation-building for many years, "a representative broadly democratic government" was possible but the paper concluded it would be Sunni-led.
- The use of overriding force in a ground campaign was the only option to offer confidence that Saddam Hussein would be removed and bring Iraq back into the international community.
- No legal justification for an invasion currently existed.
- A staged approach, establishing international support, should be considered.

91. Dr Cholerton sent a copy of the Cabinet Office and FCO papers to Mr Hoon on 8 March.[38]

92. Dr Cholerton advised that the text had not been agreed by the MOD and that, at the request of the Cabinet Office, the paper had not been circulated within the MOD. Copies of the minute and papers were sent only to Adm Boyce, Sir Kevin Tebbit, Mr Webb and Mr Desmond Bowen, MOD Director General Operational Policy.

93. Mr Hoon asked for further advice on the US legal justification for both a military attack on Iraq and regime change in Iraq, and how practicable action was against states breaking sanctions.[39]

94. Dr Cholerton's response of 26 March:

- set out the MOD's understanding of the UK and US legal position; and
- the difficulties of controlling trade between Iraq and its neighbours and other countries in the region.[40]

95. Military liaison officers with CENTCOM in Tampa, Florida, focused on operations in Afghanistan and the No-Fly Zones over Iraq, were aware that a policy of 'NOFORN' (no disclosure of information to anyone who was not a US citizen; a foreigner) planning on Iraq was under way. Rumours about CENTCOM planning on Iraq had been reported to Lt Gen Pigott on 8 March:

> "It is clear that planning is being conducted, and enablers are being put in place for a major air and land campaign in Iraq. It is clear that no political decisions have yet been made. Furthermore, temperatures over the summer and an apparent 6 month+ timescale for reconstitution of … stocks suggest a start date not before Oct[ober] 02."[41]

96. General Reith told the Inquiry that he had "about 40 people … working with CENTCOM, about 20 as embedded staff and 20 with my liaison team."[42]

97. The UK's deployments to Afghanistan in early 2002 are addressed in the Box below.

Deployments to Afghanistan in early 2002

The United Nations Security Council adopted resolution 1386 on 20 December 2001.[43] That recognised that the responsibility for providing security and law and order throughout Afghanistan resided with the Afghans themselves. The resolution noted the reported request from the Afghan authorities for a United Nations authorised international security force, and authorised the establishment of an International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) in Afghanistan for six months. It also welcomed the UK offer to lead in organising and commanding the Force.

ISAF's role was to assist the Afghan Interim Authority in the maintenance of security in Kabul and its surrounding areas.[44] The British contribution was known as Operation VERITAS.[45]

The Force was initially commanded by Major General John McColl and became fully operational from 18 February 2002.[46] The UK provided an infantry battlegroup based in Kabul and, until March 2002, a subordinate headquarters provided by 16 Air Assault Brigade.

On 18 March, the Force comprised more than 4,600 personnel from 18 nations, including some 1,600 UK troops deployed on Operation VERITAS.

In addition, and in response to a formal US request for forces to join military operations against Al Qaida and the Taliban, Mr Hoon announced the separate deployment of a further battlegroup, built around 45 Commando Royal Marines, of up to 1,700 personnel which would be ready to commence offensive operations by mid-April. The battle group would join a US-led brigade for military operations. The Brigadier commanding 3 Commando Brigade and his headquarters would also deploy to join the headquarters of CENTCOM at Bagram airbase.

Mr Hoon stated that the operation was being conducted in self-defence in accordance with the UN Charter, "against those elements of Al Qaida and the Taliban that continue to threaten the United Kingdom and other countries".[47] It was the "largest military deployment for combat operations since the Gulf Conflict" in 1991.[48]

The deployment was discussed in Cabinet on 21 March.[49]

Mr Blair concluded that:

> "… the troops were supported by the majority of the people in Afghanistan and would not be seeking to occupy territory, there was substantial United States air cover and there were troops from several Coalition partners involved. There was no parallel with the occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union. The total number of British forces engaged in operations related to Afghanistan was substantial, but still only one-tenth of the number deployed during the 1991 Gulf War."

Turkey took over lead responsibility for ISAF on 20 June 2002.[50]

The same day, Mr Hoon confirmed that the Task Force based on the 45 Commando battlegroup would return to the UK on successful completion of Operation JACANA.[51]

Drawdown was completed on 31 July 2002.[52]

MR HOON'S ADVICE, 22 MARCH 2002

98. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 22 March emphasising the importance of a counter-proliferation strategy in the Middle East.

99. On Iraq, Mr Hoon advised that the UK should support President Bush and be ready to make a military contribution; and that UK involvement in planning would improve the US process. One of Mr Blair's objectives at Crawford should, therefore, be to secure agreement to the UK's participation in military planning.

100. Mr Hoon also stated that a number of issues would need to be addressed before forces were committed, including the need for a comprehensive public handling strategy to explain convincingly why such drastic action against Iraq's WMD was needed now.

101. As the detailed analysis in Section 4.1 shows, the assumption that Saddam Hussein had retained some WMD and the ability to use it and that he was now actively seeking to enhance those capabilities, despite the disarmament obligations imposed by the UN Security Council after the Gulf Conflict in 1991, was deeply embedded in UK thinking by March 2002.

102. That was reinforced by the JIC Current Intelligence Group (CIG) Assessment of the status of Iraq's WMD programmes issued on 15 March to aid policy discussions on Iraq.[53]

103. In the context of a discussion about US concerns, relating to Al Qaida's pursuit of WMD, the need for action to deal with the threat posed by Iraq and the potential link between terrorism and WMD, Mr Blair told Vice President Dick Cheney on 11 March that it was "highly desirable to get rid of Saddam" and that the "UK would help" the US "as long as there was a clever strategy".[54]

104. Policy discussions with the US during March, including Mr Blair's discussion with Vice President Cheney and Sir David Manning's visit to Washington, are addressed in Section 3.2.

105. Mr Hoon discussed Mr Webb's advice of 27 February at a meeting on 19 March, at which AM French "and others" were present.[55]

106. In relation to the options for military action, Mr Hoon was advised that, if a UK contribution to US military action against Iraq were to be sought, it:

> "… might be a 'division minus', ie the largest of the options [for the deployment of UK ground forces] foreseen in the SDR [1998 Strategic Defence Review]."[56]

107. Mr Hoon was also told that a "key issue would be the size of any continuing military presence required to sustain a post-Saddam regime".

108. Mr Hoon requested advice on the "likely resilience of Iraq's resistance to a ground operation".

109. Mr Hoon concluded that, if the US were to pursue a military option and seek UK involvement, "it would clearly be undesirable" for the UK to find itself "facing a plan about which we had reservations". It would, therefore, be "advantageous to seek representation in the UN planning process". He would write to Mr Blair suggesting he should raise that possibility in his discussions with President Bush.

[56] The Planning Assumptions, agreed in SDR 1998 and described earlier in this Section, stated that the UK should be able to deploy a division of up to three brigades in response to crises outside the NATO area. During the Gulf Conflict in 1991, the UK deployed an armoured division comprising two combat brigades; 4 Brigade and 7 Armoured Brigade (Ministry of Defence, Statement on the Defence Estimates – Britain's Defence for the 90s, July 1991, Cm 1559).

110. In the context of advice about Iraq's ability to develop a nuclear weapon (see Section 4.1), AM French commented in a minute to Mr Webb that, "Despite the work going on in the Pentagon", he could "not see a significant possibility of a large-scale military attack on Iraq taking place this year".[57]

111. In AM French's view, the US would be "taking a calibrated approach":

- "The 'axis of evil' could be considered as the start of an IO [information operations] campaign."
- "The US would respond to international opinion by giving UNMOVIC [UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission] another chance, but with a much more intrusive regime."
- The IO campaign was "part of a move to foment opposition to Saddam Hussein inside Iraq".
- "The US would consider the selective use of military force, air strikes, to aid a coup, which must come from inside the country."
- "If all the above fail then consideration would have to be given to large-scale military action."
- Large-scale military action would come "into play quickly should Iraq be shown to be complicit in terrorist attacks using WMD".

112. The minute was also sent to Adm Boyce.

113. In response to Mr Hoon's request at his meeting on 19 March, the DIS advised that a ground offensive from Kuwait through Basra and coalition destruction of regime security organs in southern Iraq, calls for a democratic Iraq, or the attempted imposition of a government in exile, were all likely to increase resistance to a coalition attack.[58] As long as he was seen as defending Sunni hegemony in Iraq, that was Saddam Hussein's greatest strength.

114. Mr Hoon sent a minute to Mr Blair on 22 March, which included Mr Hoon's assessment that Saddam Hussein was "only one unpleasant dimension" of the "key strategic problem" of the spread of WMD, and that a more active counter-proliferation strategy was needed for the region as a whole. That is addressed in Sections 3.2 and 4.1.[59]

115. In relation to possible military action, Mr Hoon identified three factors that the UK should keep in mind in considering how to support President Bush:

- "The US already has heavy land forces in the region … [and] is planning on the basis that it would take 90 days to deploy all necessary forces to the region; it would take us longer.

- Despite 10 years of searching, no one has found a credible successor to Saddam.
- If a coalition takes control of Baghdad (especially without catching Saddam), it will probably have to stay there for many years."

116. Mr Hoon wrote that the UK "should support President Bush and be ready for a military contribution" in Iraq. The UK had "made some progress at getting inside the Pentagon loop", but he cautioned that the UK was:

> "… not privy to detailed US planning, either strategically across the region or on Iraq. Before any decision to commit British forces, we ought to know that the US has a militarily plausible plan with a reasonable prospect of success compared to the risks and within the framework of international law. Our involvement in planning would improve their process – and help address our lead time problem. It would enable either CDS to reassure you that there is a sound military plan or give you a basis to hold back if the US cannot find a sensible scheme … I suggest one of your objectives at Crawford should be to secure agreement to the UK's participation in US military planning …"

117. Finally, Mr Hoon proposed that Mr Blair might raise with President Bush "the need for a comprehensive public handling strategy, so that we can explain convincingly why we need to take such drastic action against Iraq's WMD now".

118. Mr Hoon's letter was copied to Mr Straw and to Sir Richard Wilson, the Cabinet Secretary.

119. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "The point of asking for access … was if the Americans were going to start … down a route of planning for military operations in Iraq, and if the Prime Minister was going to indicate … that might be something … we would be involved in, then the earlier we got involved … the earlier we would get an understanding of what might be required of us."[60]

120. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that "there was no such thing at that stage as military planning". It was "quite clear" that some in the US were pushing for military action to deal with WMD proliferation, "not just against Iraq, but against other countries too". The "background papers" produced for Mr Blair's visit to Crawford were "policy papers rather than military planning documents". Those papers helped to inform Mr Blair's thinking but there were "no recommendations".[61]

121. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that, if there was a possibility of the US taking military action to which the UK might make a military contribution, the MOD:

[61] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, pages 7-9.

> "… needed to be inside the process, both to influence it, but equally to understand what was happening, so that if, later on, there was such a request, we knew the nature of that request and why it had been made."[62]

122. On 25 March, Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair setting out the risks which could arise from discussions with President Bush, but suggesting the "case against Iraq and in favour (if necessary) of military action" might be made in the context of seeking regime change as an essential part of a strategy of eliminating Iraq's WMD, rather than an objective in its own right.[63]

123. Mr Straw's minute, which is addressed in Section 3.2, does not appear to have been sent to anyone outside No.10.

Mr Blair's meeting at Chequers, 2 April 2002

124. Mr Blair discussed the need for a strategy to remove Saddam Hussein and possible US military action in a meeting at Chequers on 2 April.

125. The meeting was clearly intended to inform Mr Blair's approach in his discussion with President Bush.

126. Mr Blair's meeting at Chequers on 2 April is addressed in Section 3.2. No formal record was made of the discussion, or who was present.

127. Accounts given by participants suggest that Adm Boyce, Sir Kevin Tebbit (representing Mr Hoon who was unable to attend), Lt Gen Pigott, Lieutenant General Cedric Delves (senior UK liaison officer at CENTCOM), Sir Richard Dearlove, Mr Jonathan Powell (Mr Blair's Chief of Staff), Sir David Manning and Mr Scarlett were present.

128. In relation to the military advice provided at the meeting, Lt Gen Pigott produced a set of briefing slides at the meeting.[64] They identified a provisional end state for military action against Iraq which was defined as:

> "A law-abiding Iraq which is reintegrated in the international community, that does not threaten its neighbours, or global security."

129. The slides prepared for Lt Gen Pigott also contained elements related to Afghanistan, the need to eliminate international terrorism as a force in international affairs and a series of questions in relation to the goals and approach of any military action in Iraq, including that, if the US wanted the UK to be involved in any military action, the UK would need to be involved in the planning.

130. Dr Cholerton provided Sir Kevin Tebbit with advice including a copy of the Cabinet Office 'Iraq: Options Paper' and Mr Webb's minute of 27 February.[65] Dr Cholerton wrote:

> "… we believe that the key issue for the PM to raise with President Bush is the outcome the US would seek from any military action: would it simply be [to] control Iraq's WMD, remove Saddam from office (in the knowledge that a successor regime may well continue with Iraq's WMD programmes) or is it necessary to install a replacement regime? The answer to this question will be key to military planning; how action would fit into the framework of international law and help hugely in subsequent work to influence US policy."

131. Lord Boyce initially told the Inquiry:

> "We had started thinking of what our capability would be. I was not involved in the briefing of the Prime Minister just before going to Crawford."[66]

132. In his later statement, Lord Boyce said:

> "There was a meeting with the Prime Minister on 2 April just prior to his visit to Crawford to discuss, amongst other things such as Afghanistan, a wide range of options about how to deal with Iraq, from containment and sanctions to conceptual military action. There was no discussion on the detail of military action or military options."[67]

133. Adm Boyce told the Inquiry that his "presence at Chequers on that particular occasion was simply if there were questions coming up about what could be done militarily, what was our capability should we be asked to do something"; and that "no particular preparations were made for that" meeting.[68]

134. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that Sir Kevin Tebbit had attended the meeting on his behalf, and that he "knew that there were quite detailed discussions about what was going to happen at Crawford".[69]

135. The MOD has been unable to locate any record of Sir Kevin's report to, or discussion with, Mr Hoon.[70]

136. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that Admiral Boyce and:

> "… [Lt Gen] Pigott who had studied the military options, gave a presentation. They warned it could be a bloody fight and take a long time to remove Saddam. The US were engaged in preliminary planning, but it was hard to read where they were going with it. We needed to get alongside that planning and be part of it …"[71]

137. The most detailed account of the meeting is in the diaries of Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy. He described the meeting as:

"… a repeat of the smaller meeting we'd had on Afghanistan. Boyce … mainly set out why it was hard to do anything …

"TB [Tony Blair] wanted to be in a position to give GWB [President Bush] a strategy and influence it. He believed Bush was in the same position as him, that it would be great to get rid of Saddam and could it be done without terrible unforeseen circumstances? …

"We were given an account of the state of Iraqi forces, OK if not brilliant, the opposition – hopeless – and Saddam's ways – truly dreadful. CDS appeared to be trying to shape the meeting towards inaction, constantly pointing out the problems, the nature of the [US] Administration, only Rumsfeld and a few others knew what was being planned, TB may speak to Bush or Condi [Rice] but did they really know what was going on? … He said apart from Rumsfeld, there were only four or five people who were really on the inside track.

"… but CDS would keep coming back to the problems … General Tony Pigott did an OK presentation which went through the problems realistically but concluded that a full-scale invasion would be possible, ending up with fighting in Baghdad. But it would be bloody, could take a long time. Also, it was not impossible that Saddam would keep all his forces back. He said post-conflict had to be part of conflict preparation. The Americans believed we could replicate Afghanistan but it was very, very different … Cedric [Delves] … said Tommy Franks was difficult to read because he believed they were planning something for later in the year, maybe New Year. He basically believed in air power plus Special Forces. CDS said if they want us to be involved in providing force, we have to be involved in all the planning, which seemed fair enough.

"TB said it was the usual conundrum – do I support totally in public and help deliver our strategy, or do I put distance between us and lose influence?

"We discussed whether the central aim was WMD or regime change. Pigott's view was that it was WMD. TB felt it was regime change in part because of WMD but more broadly because of the threat to the region and the world … [P]eople will say that we have known about WMD for a long time … [T]his would not be a popular war, and in the States fighting an unpopular war and losing is not an option.

138. Sir Richard Dearlove's evidence on the meeting and a press report about the Presidential Finding are described in Section 3.2.

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Crawford, April 2002

139. When Mr Blair met President Bush in early April, the US was not ready to agree UK access to US military planning.

140. Lt Gen Pigott and Mr Bowen travelled to Washington on 2 April primarily to discuss Afghanistan-related matters.[73]

141. Lt Gen Pigott also took the opportunity to ask what the US aims were for Iraq, and whether they were centred on regime change, WMD or both. He was reported as indicating some:

> "… close-hold interagency thinking was beginning in London … We [the UK] would welcome some engagement with the US on these broad questions. Discussion of military plans was for later."[74]

142. US officials were reported to have given a mixed response to his approach.

143. Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, sent a report of the visit to Sir David Manning, on 4 April.[75]

144. Mr Watkins wrote:

> "The impression they formed was that serious debate of the issues, let alone options, had not got off the ground … (The Chairman [of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Richard Myers] would presumably have to persuade Donald Rumsfeld [US Secretary of Defense] of the desirability of this joint activity.) Mr Hoon strongly endorses the need to get close to Pentagon thinking on the possible approaches in order to get the framework right before any military planning starts. He hopes that the President and Prime Minister can agree to set this Pentagon/MOD work in hand."

145. Sir David Manning added in a manuscript comment: "… further request from Geoff Hoon that you should persuade Bush to include us in the US military planning process."[76]

146. In a separate minute to Mr Blair, Sir David wrote:

> "We need to start US/UK military planning (ie access for UK military planners in Washington and CENTCOM – the point CDS [Adm Boyce] made at Chequers)."[77]

147. Mr Blair met President Bush at Crawford, Texas, on 5 and 6 April. The discussion and Mr Blair's subsequent statements – in a press conference with President Bush, the speech at College Station on 7 April, in Parliament on 10 April, and to Cabinet on 11 April – are addressed in Section 3.2.

148. A three-page record of the discussions on Iraq was circulated on a secret and strictly personal basis by Sir David Manning in a letter to Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, which was sent only to Mr Watkins (for Mr Hoon), Admiral Boyce, Sir Michael Jay (FCO Permanent Under Secretary), Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Christopher Meyer (British Ambassador to the US) and Mr Powell.[78]

149. In relation to military action, Sir David Manning recorded that the meeting on Saturday morning was informed that:

- There was no war plan for Iraq.
- Thinking so far had been on a broad, conceptual level.
- A very small cell in Central Command in Florida had recently been set up to do some planning and to think through the various options.
- When the US had done that, US and UK planners would be able to sit down together to examine the options.
- The US and UK would work through the issues together.

150. Sir David recorded that Mr Blair and President Bush had discussed:

- the need to enhance not diminish regional stability;
- who might replace Saddam Hussein if action was taken to topple him;
- the impact of a moderate, secular regime in Iraq on other countries in the region;
- the need to manage public relations with great care;
- putting Saddam Hussein on the spot over UN inspections and seeking proof of the claim that he was not developing WMD; and

- the timing of possible military action. If a decision was taken to use military action, that would not take place before late 2002/early 2003.

151. Mr Blair said that it was important to go back to the United Nations and to present that as an opportunity for Saddam Hussein to co-operate.

152. Sir David Manning also recorded that, following a further conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair had concluded that President Bush wanted to build a coalition, and that had led him to dismiss pressure from some on the American right.

153. The record contained no reference to any discussion of the conditions which would be necessary for military action.

154. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 11 April that regime change in Iraq was greatly to be desired but no "plans" for achieving that had been tabled during his discussions with President Bush at Crawford.[79]

155. A minute from Mr Powell on 11 April suggested to Mr Blair:

> "… in particular we need to bank his agreement that our military can be involved in joint planning once they have got pa[s]t the conceptual stage."[80]

156. A letter from Sir Christopher Meyer to Sir David Mannning on 15 May indicated that Mr Blair and President Bush had also discussed the first quarter of 2003 as a timeframe for action against Saddam Hussein.[81]

157. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that he did not "recall … any sort of discussion of military options" at Crawford.[82]

158. Asked what Mr Blair had told him about his discussions with President Bush at Crawford, Mr Hoon replied:

> "I don't think he told me anything directly. I saw a record of the meeting …"[83]

159. Subsequently Mr Hoon stated:

> "My recollection of those events is that … we were a little disappointed after Crawford that we hadn't immediately received a request from the United States to send someone to Tampa."[84]

160. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he had told President Bush the UK would be with him "in confronting and dealing with this threat".[85]

161. Mr Blair subsequently confirmed that included if it came to military action.[86]

162. Mr Blair also said that there had been "a general discussion of the possibility of going down the military route".[87]

163. Asked whether the UK would have made the request to be involved in US planning if military action had not been regarded as a serious possibility, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "… it behoves any responsible military planner to make sure he is considering all the options that might come in the future. If the Americans were going to go down the route of taking military action in Iraq … it was very important for us to understand what was going on at the earliest possible stage rather than being brought in at a late stage where we wouldn't have had any opportunity to say what our capabilities are or how we would shape our capabilities … to fit in with whatever plan was being produced."[88]

Initial consideration of UK military options

MOD contingency planning in April and May 2002

164. After Crawford, the MOD began seriously to consider what UK military contribution might be made to any US-led military action and the need for a plausible military plan for the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime.

165. The MOD's initial thinking focused on the deployment of an Army division.

166. Mr Hoon was advised that Cabinet-level agreement to decisions to deploy UK Armed Forces to Iraq would be required.

167. In early April, thinking in the MOD on possible options for a UK contribution to military operations in Iraq moved into a higher gear.

168. Following the meeting at Chequers on 2 April, Sir Kevin Tebbit asked Mr Trevor Woolley, MOD Director General Resources and Plans, on 3 April 2002 for advice on the implications of deploying a "Division minus (25-30,000 with enablers)" to Iraq.[89]

169. Sir Kevin's request, the advice he received, the fact that a division would require a minimum of six months lead time and ideally longer, and arrangements for Urgent Operational Requirements (UORs), are addressed in Section 6.3.

MR WEBB'S ADVICE, 12 APRIL 2002

170. Following Mr Blair's visit to Crawford, Mr Hoon discussed Iraq with Adm Boyce and Sir Kevin Tebbit on 8 April.[90]

171. Mr Hoon "emphasised that no decisions had been taken on military action" but it was "important that No.10 and others understood the practical steps and (additional) costs which would be involved". Therefore as a "precaution against the possibility that military action might have to be taken at some point in the future", exploratory work should be put in hand, conducted "on a very close hold", to provide:

- "… a clearer picture of the potential specific military options – including the possible UK involvement"; this should indicate the "likely scales of effort and force generation/deployment timelines".
- "Clarification of what military capability we could deliver on the basis of the … budgets for 2002/03 and what more might be required to deliver the options" identified.
- "Identification of the additional specific equipment requirements (UORs) necessary to deliver these options … Equipment – rather than personnel – was likely to be on the critical path in terms of deployment timelines."

172. Mr Hoon asked to discuss the emerging findings and "the 'think piece'" the following week.

173. On 12 April, following consultation with Sir Kevin Tebbit and Adm Boyce, Mr Webb sent Mr Hoon a think piece entitled "Bush and the War on Terrorism".[91] Mr Webb's minute provided formal advice on the possible scale of any UK military contribution and a draft letter to Mr Blair.

174. Mr Webb's paper explored potential end states for military action in Iraq in the context of Mr Blair's "commitment to regime change ('if necessary and justified')" in his speech at College Station on 7 April.

175. Mr Webb added:

- "Commitment on timing has been avoided and an expectation has developed that no significant operation will be mounted while major violence continues in Israel/Palestine".
- "Both Crawford and contacts with the Pentagon confirm that US thinking has not identified either a successor or a constitutional restructuring to provide a more representational regime:
    - "Various ideas for replacements have been aired over the years and none so far look convincing …"

---

[90] Minute Watkins to PSO/CDS & PS/PUS [MOD], 8 April 2002, 'Iraq'.
[91] Minute Webb to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 12 April 2002, 'Bush and the War on Terrorism'.

176. Mr Webb's view was that "the prospects for finding a stable political solution" were "poor in the short term"; and that a coalition might be left "holding the ring for a significant period". Securing a mandate for a UN interim administration "could be tricky" so there would be a "need to cater for some kind of sponsored interim administration".

177. Mr Webb added that "without proper access to US planning", the options were "speculative" but:

> "Potential US scenarios could embrace:
> A. A clandestine/Special Forces operation on a limited scale …
> B. A local revolution, possibly supported by SF and a major air campaign (on a Northern Alliance analogy, though the circumstances are very different).
> C. A major military operation to secure centres of power such as Baghdad …"

178. Mr Webb advised that the US had "sufficient forces to undertake a military operation … without anyone else's help"; but:

> "To achieve a successful regime change, the UK would need to be actively involved (one might also argue that the Prime Minister has effectively committed us)."

179. If the US mounted a major military operation, a UK contribution of only Special Forces, cruise missiles and/or air support "would be seen as only token … confer no significant influence on US planning (and would be adversely contrasted with Britain's contribution during the [1990/91] Gulf War)."

180. Setting out the MOD's thinking on military issues, Mr Webb wrote:

- "The fundamental building block for [a UK contribution to] a major US ground force operation is a division. Only on that scale (requiring 3 brigades as our planning base) would UK have significant influence over how the operation was developed and conducted: an independent brigade does not fit into the US structure and would in any case need substantial divisional scale enablers in order to be safe for high intensity operations … Such a deployment would be at the extreme end of the UK's capacity after the SDR: it was the scenario against which the 'large' option was scaled."
- The UK "should seek only to make a respectable large contribution that we can sustain properly".[92]

[92] In a handwritten amendment to the draft letter Lt Gen Pigott suggested amending the sentence "Without access to US planning, which is only now beginning …" to "Without formal access to US planning …" He also recommended inserting "a 3 brigade division" in the description of the potential UK force contribution of a division.

181. Mr Webb added:

> "… there could be advantage in the MOD doing some discreet internal strategic estimating. This should help us think through what would be the key strategic objectives and the end states and the 'centre of gravity' of the situation we need to tackle … When the time came for discussion with the US, our pre-thinking and ability to offer a well thought-through force contribution (up to a division, though obviously less if possible) would give us clout: and also a respectable position from which to judge whether their proposals offer adequate return for risk."

182. On the way forward, Mr Webb wrote:

> "Despite the massive scale of commitment, there are arguments that preventing the spread of WMD should be given the highest priority in coming years … [I]t remains the greatest risk to Middle East and international stability in the medium-term; and in the long-term countries like Iraq and Iran are on course to threaten Europe and UK direct. It is arguable that preventing this spread by making an example of Saddam Hussein would do more for long-term stability than all the displaced [military] activities combined …
>
> "By demonstrating our capacity for high intensity warfare at large scale the UK would also send a powerful deterrence message to other potential WMD proliferators and adversaries.
>
> "… There would come a point at which preparations could apply some valuable pressure on Saddam; or be seen as a natural reaction to prevarication over inspections. In general … until that point … we should keep a low profile …"

183. Mr Webb concluded:

> "Even these preparatory steps would properly need a Cabinet Committee decision, based on a minute from the Defence Secretary. The FCO are content for activity to be centred on MOD, to preserve the best prospect for dialogue with US DOD [Department of Defense] …"

184. At a meeting on 18 April to discuss Mr Webb's minute, Mr Hoon found the analysis "generally persuasive"; but asked for further work to examine the feasibility of making a smaller contribution.[93] He sought options "short of participation in a full ground offensive".

185. Mr Hoon said that more thought needed to be given to the legal aspects as:

> "Prima facie, the best legal foundation for any operation to displace Saddam's regime was that it would remove the threat posed by his WMD. However it was > conceivable that any new Iraqi regime – and, in particular, one led by another 'strong man' – would wish to have WMD to meet the perceived regional threat from Iran …"

---

[93] Minute Watkins to Policy Director, 18 April 2002, 'Iraq'.

186. Mr Hoon stated that he was content for thinking to continue, but decided it should be kept on "a very close hold until Ministers agreed otherwise". For him, "the key question was: how far ahead of a decision to deploy would we have to start any necessary preparatory action".

187. Mr Webb explained to the Inquiry that the way he had posed the issues in his minute was a means of finding out from Mr Hoon if he knew or could find out what the position was:

> "This was commissioned as a think piece. But … my duty is to say to my Secretary of State, you need, we need to have a feel for whether the Prime Minister has committed us here, because it affects what we do next."[94]

188. Mr Webb added that he had not got an explicit response on that point.

189. Mr Hoon did not formally write to Mr Blair setting out possible options for a UK contribution to military operations until 31 May.

190. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that after Crawford the MOD "started ramping up our … thinking on … what we could provide".[95]

191. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that it should not assume that the MOD was looking for the military option at that point. Rather, if the military was to be in a position to produce a military option "at a much later date", a "very long planning process [was] required" and it had to start thinking about the issues "as early as possible". The work was "very, very preliminary ground clearing".[96]

192. Sir Kevin subsequently told the Inquiry that, to produce a large scale option on the ground, serious planning had to start six months earlier.[97] The military papers and records would "indicate clarity of intent, when in fact what there was, was a determination to provide the politicians with the option".

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE "PIGOTT GROUP"

193. The MOD established an informal inter-departmental group of senior officials, the "Pigott Group", to identify the issues which might need to be addressed if military action was taken in Iraq.

194. The discussions of the Group were not recorded.

[96] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, pages 14-16.

195. Lt Gen Pigott told Mr Hoon on 18 April that a small, senior group had been put together "including … representatives from other interested Departments" to "brainstorm the options".[98]

196. Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, described the role of the group, which became known as the "Pigott Group", to Mr Straw on 25 April as to think about the issues that would be involved in any military operation in Iraq.[99] Its establishment was:

> "… a sensitive exercise. Participation is being tightly restricted and paperwork will be kept to the minimum."

197. Mr Ricketts advised Mr Straw that the first meeting of the Group had discussed how the objective or "end state" of a military operation should be defined. That is addressed in Section 3.3.

198. The minute stated that senior officials from the Cabinet Office and the Agencies, as well as the FCO, would be involved.

199. Sir Peter Ricketts told the Inquiry that the role of the Pigott Group was to discuss "the implications of military planning for other departments' activities" rather than to "discuss military planning as such".[100]

200. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that the Group "was constrained, to a very small group of people … in London in the MOD, it didn't actually go outside into any of the outposts … in the MOD".[101]

201. Lt Gen Pigott told the Inquiry that the role of the Group was:

> "… to do some scoping work … Not to do … planning … What could we be dealing with here? What might be the big issues? … the what, when, where. What were they beginning to look like …"[102]

202. Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of OD Sec from September 1999 until early September 2002, told the Inquiry that the Group "met a number of times in the early summer" of 2002.[103] The meetings were "not minuted" and were "very informal … the focus was on precisely what was the US emerging plan". At that stage there was "great uncertainty about that", and British access to American thinking had been "pretty limited".

203. Mr Webb told the Inquiry that the Group had worked out the shape of the options which he had then discussed with Mr Douglas Feith, US Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.[104]

204. The Strategic Planning Group (SPG), a planning team working for Lt Gen Pigott, supported the Pigott Group.

205. Lieutenant General Sir James Dutton, Adm Boyce's liaison officer to the Chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff until the middle of March 2002 and subsequently head of the SPG until taking up his appointment as Commander, 3 Commando Brigade in July 2002, told the Inquiry that, in view of his recent experience in Washington as CDS's liaison officer, he had been asked to lead the team, reporting weekly to Lt Gen Pigott.[105]

206. Lt Gen Dutton said that the work was best described as "prudent military contingency planning on what we might be able to do if there were a political directive to do so". Force packages were not yet being discussed:

> "If there were to be a political decision made to do something in Iraq, what might the Americans do, what might we be able to do … if that decision were made and … how would the various bits of Whitehall contribute to that and what might be the longer-term aim. So it was very much conceptual thinking …"

MOD ADVICE TO MR HOON, MAY 2002

207. The MOD advised Mr Hoon in early May that the US had decided to pursue regime change. The question was when. The MOD thought it could be at "the turn of the year".

208. The US was likely to continue to hold the UK military at arm's length until options had been considered by President Bush.

209. Lt Gen Pigott identified two key issues which would need to be addressed: the impact of the potential courses of action and the contribution the UK might make.

210. Gen Franks visited the UK as part of a wider overseas visit in late April 2002.

211. Mr Hoon's diary indicates that he met Gen Franks at RAF Brize Norton on 25 April.[106]

212. The MOD has not been able to locate any record of the discussion.[107]

213. The discussion on Iraq at the Chiefs of Staff meeting attended by Gen Franks and Air Marshal Brian Burridge, Deputy Commander in Chief Strike Command, on 26 April was recorded separately and circulated on very limited distribution.[108]

[108] Minute SECCOS to PS/SofS [MOD] and others, 30 April 2002, 'Record of CINCCENTCOM meeting with COS – 26 April 2002'.

214. The minute of the discussion records that the Chiefs of Staff were told that the US was thinking deeply about Iraq and possible contingencies; but was not currently planning a military operation to overthrow the Iraqi regime. There were a significant number of questions about the use of force including timing and the need for proof of WMD and a legal underpinning.

215. Recent difficulties with the No-Fly Zones were also discussed.

216. Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head of OD Sec (Foreign Policy), who attended the Chiefs of Staff meeting, advised Sir David Manning that:

> "… the mood [in the US government] was 'when not if', but the list of unintended consequences was long and policy makers were still grappling with them … Activity in Washington mirrored that in London. Small groups of senior staff thinking through strategy options."[109]

217. Air Chief Marshal Sir Brian Burridge told the Inquiry that Gen Franks had visited London in "mid-May"; and that he had said something about Iraq along the lines of "it is not if but when, and that was really the first time I had heard him say anything with that degree of certainty".[110]

218. From the records of the 26 April Chiefs of Staff meeting, the Inquiry concludes ACM Burridge was recalling that discussion. There is no evidence that Gen Franks was in London in mid-May.

219. Lt Gen Pigott told the Inquiry: "I had an extremely close relationship with the key players in the joint staff. It was very much professional friends over the years". If approached, they would say: "Yes … we are doing a bit more on this", but that was "not the American Government", it was "an individual senior officer in the American Government".[111]

220. Major General David Wilson, who replaced Lt Gen Delves as Senior British Military Adviser (SBMA) at CENTCOM in April 2002, told the Inquiry that he received no information about Iraq planning when he arrived:

> "Nothing. I didn't find anything, because the shutters were firmly down. I and my people were in the foreign exclusion category … there was no sort of nodding and winking, that's the way it was."[112]

221. Lt Gen Dutton told the Inquiry:

> "… we were all interested to know whether there was any planning going on for other potential operations. I used to ask that question of the J-3, General Newbold … and he would be quite honest in saying that they were doing staff checks for any number of contingencies and, if asked specifically about Iraq, he would not deny that they were looking at what they could do, if asked …"[113]

222. Lt Gen Pigott sent Mr Hoon an update on the work of the SPG on 10 May.[114]

223. Lt Gen Pigott stated:

> "Any thinking we do about joining the US in military operations against the Iraqi regime needs to be informed by our thinking in two key areas: the impact of potential courses of action open to a coalition and the capability the UK might contribute to such a coalition."

224. The SPG had concluded that the US had decided to pursue regime change; the question was when, including whether to pursue weapons inspections before a military build-up. The MOD's "best guess" was that the recommendation would be for action at "the turn of the year" but it did not expect to be "exposed" to US planning until advice had been put to President Bush, probably in late May. The UK would "need to be ready to discuss Iraq with the Americans as soon as they share planning with us".

225. Work had been commissioned on the capabilities the UK might aim to provide within periods of three to four and six to eight months; setting out the key decision and deployment points.

226. Lt Gen Pigott suggested that this could lead to "a note to the Prime Minister setting out these and the financial implications of taking contingency action now". The advantage of characterising this work as "contingency planning and considering generic force packages" was that it offered "the possibility of wider debate and scrutiny in the department than would be available if we were to consider specific courses of action, for operational security reasons". The work needed to be supported by "thinking on what 'end state' HMG is seeking to achieve and about the legal basis on which action would be taken forward".

227. Mr Hoon noted Lt Gen Pigott's advice and asked for a meeting to discuss the work and when it would be appropriate to convene a meeting with Mr Blair and Mr Straw.[115]

228. In a letter the same day as Lt Gen Pigott's update on wider issues, which is addressed in Section 3.3, Mr Webb told Mr Ricketts:

---

[114] Minute DCDS(C) to APS/Secretary of State [MOD], 10 May 2002, 'Iraq'.
[115] Minute Williams to DCDS(C), 13 May 2002, 'Iraq'.

> "… we have proposed to the Defence Secretary we take forward rapidly two distinct pieces of work, one on military contingency planning … and the other on coalition options which will need to factor in legal considerations. Rather than submitting our Ministers' conclusions to the Attorney General for his approval, we should prefer the usual approach of his putting advice to colleagues as part of a collective decision."[116]

229. The letter was sent to Lt Gen Pigott, Sir David Manning and SIS.

230. By mid-May, the perception that the UK might provide an armoured division for military operations had already gained currency in the US.

231. There is no evidence that such a suggestion had been authorised.

232. In the absence of an agreed avenue for dialogue between the US and UK and the sensitivities about the issue on both sides of the Atlantic in the spring of 2002, informal conversations between the US and UK military and between civilian officials to explore each other's positions to inform thinking and the development of advice to Ministers were unavoidable.

233. Mr Webb visited Washington in mid-May and discussed draft objectives for a military operation with US officials (see Section 3.3).[117]

234. Mr Webb explained the UK military timelines as:

> "… 7 to 9 months for a major contribution of division minus plus air wing etc, shorter for a smaller package. If they [the US] wanted UK participation this would have to be factored in."

235. Mr Webb also reported his impression that momentum in Washington "had flagged" since his last substantive discussions in February.

236. In the context of those discussions, Mr Webb told the Inquiry:

> "… once you get into the level of military planning, it doesn't make a big difference whether your policy is to remove WMD, and that means Saddam has to go, or whether you are going to change the regime and take the opportunity to remove WMD … [I]t's very important in legal and policy terms …"[118]

237. In preparation for Sir David Manning's visit to Washington, Sir Christopher Meyer sent a personal letter to Sir David on 15 May.[119]

[118] Private hearing, 23 June 2010, page 16.
[119] Letter Meyer to Manning, 15 May 2002, 'Your Visit to Washington'.

238. In relation to military planning, Sir Christopher reported that he had been told by a senior official in the State Department that:

- The timeframe discussed between Mr Blair and President Bush was still valid: the first quarter of next year was "realistic" for action against Saddam Hussein.
- CENTCOM was hearing from British military sources that we were contemplating contributing an armoured division.

239. In discussions with Dr Rice on Iraq, Sir David Manning was assured that the UK would be brought into the planning process at a very early stage, once such planning got under way.[120]

240. One significant and potentially awkward fact emerged from a meeting with Mr Richard Armitage, US Deputy Secretary of State, when Sir David Manning was told that a report that "a UK officer at Tampa had said that the UK would provide an armoured division" was "dropped into the conversation" of the most senior US policy-makers.[121]

241. On the record of the meeting in the Chief of the Defence Staff files, a handwritten comment to Adm Boyce said: "This could unstitch your line with the PM tomorrow."[122]

242. Mr Hoon's Private Office sent a note to Adm Boyce's office on 21 May, recording that the Defence Secretary was "surprised and concerned" by this report:

> "Given the very close hold under which contingency planning for Iraq has been conducted and the fact that no options have yet been presented to Ministers, the Secretary of State would be grateful for any light which can be thrown upon this story. Is the UK team in Tampa party to the current work on Iraq?"[123]

243. Adm Boyce's office replied that "the UK team in Tampa is not party to current MOD work on Iraq" and:

> "… our investigations indicate that there has been no authenticated or officially recorded message passed to General Franks, or anyone else at Tampa, that the UK 'would' provide a division. We can only assume that this is speculation based on UK's contribution to the Gulf War 1991 which has been misinterpreted."[124]

244. A manuscript note to Mr Hoon on the document states "we can assume the point has been made".

245. Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote on his own copy of the document "Rubbish!"[125]

246. Asked about his meeting with Mr Armitage and the fact that Mr Armitage had been told that Mr Blair had discussed with President Bush at Crawford the question of a British armoured division taking part in the invasion, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry: "Yes I didn't know that."[126]

247. Asked, in the context of an offer of a division, whether the military planners were getting ahead of the policy, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he was "surprised they had said that". It "didn't seem logical"; Mr Blair had refused in July to indicate what the military contribution might be.[127]

248. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry: "Let me absolutely assure you that no-one was authorised to make such an offer. In fact, quite the contrary."[128] He added: "we were unable to find out who this person was. So I don't believe there was such a person."

249. Two key strands of MOD thinking had clearly emerged by the end of May 2002.

250. First, work on options in the MOD focused on identifying the maximum contribution the UK could make to any US-led operation in Iraq, even though the UK was still unsure about the objectives and validity of the plan, the legal basis for action or the precise role the UK would play.

251. Second, the desire to secure "strategic influence" across all environments of a military campaign.

252. The record of Mr Blair's meeting with the Chiefs of Staff on 21 May, when a range of wider defence issues was discussed, noted on Iraq: "The two main questions were: Do the US have a sensible concept? If so how could the UK contribute?"[129]

253. A paper produced by the SPG on 24 May, 'Contingency Thinking: Force Generation and Deployment for the Gulf', was sent to the Chiefs of Staff and a limited number of named MOD addressees.[130]

254. The aim of the paper was to provide sufficient information:

> "… to judge what the UK's maximum level of commitment could be in the event of a contingent operation against Iraq, together with appropriate costs and timings, and to provide data on other smaller coherent force packages as a comparator."

[130] Paper [SPG], 24 May 2002, 'Contingency Thinking: Force Generation and Deployment for the Gulf'.

255. The paper identified a number of key assumptions:

- Any operation would be US led and might involve other active coalition partners, but would be "predominantly enabled by US/UK forces".
- The UK would provide only coherent, self-supporting force packages … and would operate within the framework of a coalition concept of operations.
- The UK would scale its contribution so that the force would "make a meaningful difference to a coalition effort" and would not be a "token contribution that attracts no influence or provides insignificant combat power. A small scale of effort would therefore only be appropriate if the coalition concept of operations demanded small scale contributions."
- Operations would not commence before autumn 2002.
- Decisions would not be taken incrementally because that would "add to timelines by making force generation increasingly complex and costly".
- Enhancements would be needed to enable units to operate in the Gulf. That would expose preparations from an early stage given the significant number of contracts that would be required with industry.
- It might be necessary to maintain force elements in theatre for policing, stabilisation or humanitarian operations. That had the potential to add considerably to the costs and commitments burden, depending on the end state of the campaign.

256. Three broad levels of effort in line with the MOD's DPAs were examined:

- the maximum the UK could provide (a large scale contribution);
- a "credible" medium scale package; and
- a small scale package.

257. Reflecting the UK's existing military commitments and the most recent MOD budgetary planning round, the SPG advised that the UK could realistically produce a "maximum contribution … at the lower end of large scale … medium scale (minus) for maritime (about 10 major warships), and medium scale for air (about 60 fast jets)".

258. The force mix might not be evenly balanced (in terms of scale of effort) across the sea, land and air environments; but the UK would "always seek to achieve strategic influence across the three environments such that UK influence is in place throughout the joint environment".

259. Also on 24 May, the emerging findings from the SPG analysis were presented to Mr Hoon to report to Mr Blair before a planned meeting with Secretary Rumsfeld in early June.[131]

---

[131] Minute DCDS(C) to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 24 May 2002, 'Iraq'.

260. Lt Gen Pigott advised that, "until there is greater visibility and clarity of US intent our work on potential approaches to an Iraq campaign remains speculative; this work is advancing but will lack definition until we engage with the US". There were "potential differences in US and UK views on the outcomes" being sought "in terms of governance and WMD".

261. In relation to "military contingency planning", the "key assumption" was that the largest US-led coalition would be "along the lines of Desert Storm and that the UK would want to contribute".

262. Three broad options ("force packages") had been identified, which were "illustrative of the maximum potential … contribution" that the UK might be able to make available for any offensive operations within given time periods:

a. Three months' warning: Deployment of a medium scale joint force – 10 warships including a carrier, an armoured brigade, about 60 fast jets and associated support. That was described as at risk of being a "token contribution". The cost, including "essential" UORs for equipping the force, was estimated at £500m-£800m. A brigade, rather than a division, would require integration into an allied formation, which would "substantially" reduce the UK's influence on control of the campaign. That would be "less than our Gulf War contribution" and "would be dwarfed by the likely scale of the overall effort".

b. Six months' warning: Deployment of a large scale, war-fighting force in addition to the medium scale maritime and air components, which would be "comparable to the 1990/1991 conflict", and "confer significant influence on the control of the campaign". Though the land element would be "capable of limited independent war-fighting" there would be sustainability issues. Large numbers of vehicles could become "unserviceable" and there would be reliance on others to supply ammunition and other stock. There would not be enough time for "the procurement and fitting of all UOR equipment considered to be essential for operations in the Gulf (such as the desertisation of all armoured vehicles)", which would generate further operational risks and result in the degradation of the "credibility of the UK's contribution as [the] campaign unfolded". That option would require the call-out of 5,000-10,000 reservists and cost £800m-£1.1bn. A decision would need to be taken immediately for operations to begin in December 2002.

c. Nine months' warning: The force package would be the same as (b) but would be better prepared and carry fewer risks, as a result of additional training and equipment. The package would have "enough capability and sustainability to be a credible contribution to any coalition". The cost would be £100m higher because of a greater volume of UORs.

263. Deployment and campaign costs would be additional to the costs identified for each option.

264. Lt Gen Pigott explained that current commitments in Afghanistan and subsequent recovery and deployment times would "limit the UK's ability to contribute significantly to any offensive operations in the region until November at the earliest".

265. If it was "likely that the UK would wish to contribute" to US action "when the call came", there was a "need to consider what action" was needed "now to reduce risks and as far as possible readiness times".

266. Mr Hoon was asked to agree further work to refine contingency planning, to be submitted in mid-June; and was informed that "proper preparations" would require wider involvement in the MOD and discreet approaches to industry.

267. In a meeting with Sir Kevin Tebbit, ACM Bagnall, Mr Webb, Mr Bowen, and others, on 27 May, Mr Hoon agreed that the best approach would be to explain the practical constraints the UK faced in assembling a useful force package to Secretary Rumsfeld.[132]

268. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that he had thought the land option "quite a big ask, given our extensive involvement in Afghanistan at the time"; "it was undoubtedly the case" that the UK would be "taken more seriously if we were making a substantial contribution", and that that influence would extend to shaping the policy.[133]

Meeting with Secretary Rumsfeld, 5 June 2002

269. In preparation for a visit to the UK by Secretary Rumsfeld on 5 June, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 31 May.

270. Mr Hoon advised that he and Mr Straw had agreed a preliminary objective to guide planning. Instead of calling directly for the elimination of Iraq's WMD capability, it called on Iraq to abide by its international obligations on WMD. The objective did not explicitly mention regime change.

271. UK contingency planning had concluded that, for the UK to have influence on US planning, a significant military contribution would be needed. That was defined as at "division level" for land forces.

272. To take planning further, greater clarity on US thinking was needed.

273. Mr Hoon also identified that exposing the constraints on the UK's ability to contribute forces before the end of 2002 could reduce its influence.

274. On 31 May, in advance of a visit by Secretary Rumsfeld, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair, stating that there had been "no take up" of the offer "to help the US in its planning", and setting out the "preliminary conclusions" from the MOD's contingency planning.[134]

[133] Public hearing, 19 January 2010, pages 19-20.
[134] Minute Hoon to Prime Minister, 31 May 2002, 'Iraq'.

275. The minute was also sent to Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Straw and Sir Richard Wilson.

276. Mr Hoon wrote that he and Mr Straw had agreed a "preliminary objective" to "guide the work":

> "A stable and law-abiding Iraq within its present borders, co-operating with the international community, no longer posing a threat to its neighbours or international security, abiding by its international obligations on WMD."

277. The MOD had looked at what it might be able to contribute "were the US to assemble a coalition along the lines of that assembled for Operation Desert Storm", the US-led operation (to liberate Kuwait) in 1990-1991. The "key message" from that work was:

> "… if we wish to be able to contribute meaningfully to any operation our Armed Forces would need plenty of warning time, much more than we think the US would need themselves. We are clear that, for the UK to have influence on detailed planning, the US would require a significant contribution to any large-scale operation. Our own analysis indicates that this would have to be at division level for land forces. (It is possible that the objective could be achieved by a more rapid blow, but we cannot count on that.)"

278. Mr Hoon also stated that "to plan properly" the UK needed to know:

- "what outcome" the US was seeking;
- "when the US might wish to take action"; and
- how long the US saw itself remaining in Iraq.

279. Mr Hoon added that the UK needed "to clarify the policy basis and legal justification for any action".

280. Mr Hoon identified that the visit by Secretary Rumsfeld would provide the opportunity to clarify US thinking but the UK faced a dilemma:

> "On the one hand, if we discuss the detail and timescales of a potential UK military contribution to a US-led coalition, it could send a misleading signal that we have decided to support a specific line of military action. (Such a signal could be used in Washington by the supporters of military action to promote their cause.) Equally if we are not clear with the US at this stage about our military constraints, we face the danger of our not being able to bring anything meaningful to the table at the right time and the consequent loss of influence that would bring. Finally, it could be precisely our readiness to participate that would allow you to counsel the President against proceeding if no convincing plan were to emerge."

281. Mr Hoon recommended that rather than "simply" generally probing Secretary Rumsfeld on Washington thinking:

> "… there would be more mileage in raising practicalities. I would make clear that our conditions for involvement in military action remain as you have set them out …"

282. Mr Hoon added:

> "Further, by raising in general terms, that our contingency planning has shown we need plenty of warning in order to be able to contribute to military action I would reinforce the need for the UK to be exposed fully to US thinking as soon as possible."

283. Mr Blair wrote alongside the last point: "No, that will send a wobbly message."[135]

284. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon met Secretary Rumsfeld on 5 June.[136]

285. Mr Blair's statement that the UK would be with the US in any military action, and that would best be done by ensuring a broad coalition and avoiding unintended consequences, and wider issues of the policy towards Iraq, are addressed in Section 3.3.

286. Secretary Rumsfeld indicated that the US would begin discussions with the UK "at the military level" so that the UK was "informed of – and 'to the extent appropriate' involved in – US military planning".

287. Mr Hoon spoke to Secretary Rumsfeld again on 17 June and asked him if he was in a position to authorise contact between General Myers and Adm Boyce on Iraq planning.[137]

SPG paper, 13 June 2002

288. A paper identifying a concept for a campaign plan, with three illustrative military options, was prepared for a Chiefs of Staff discussion on 18 June.

289. The paper demonstrates that thinking was still at a very early stage, but it provides a useful insight into the assumptions being made at that time by the most senior official and military personnel who had access to the Pigott Group thinking.

290. As this Report shows, many of those assumptions underpinned subsequent policy advice.

[137] Minute Watkins to DG Op Pol, 17 June 2002, 'Iraq: Telephone Call with Rumsfeld'.

291. One key assumption was that, although the objective for Iraq agreed by Mr Straw and Mr Hoon did not mention regime change, that would be necessary to secure the objective.

292. Other key elements of the thinking included the need to build international support for the UK effort, and judgements about Saddam Hussein's likely actions which were reflected in later JIC Assessments.

293. In preparation for a "Strategic Think Tank on Iraq", to be held by the Chiefs of Staff on 18 June, the SPG produced a paper on 13 June which, in the absence of access to US planning, identified key judgements encapsulating the thinking at the time in relation to components of a possible concept for military operations.[138]

294. The "Military/Strategic Implications" and "Key Judgements" identified by the SPG included:

- Regime change was "a necessary step" to achieving the end state identified by the UK, and there was "no point in pursuing any strategy which does not achieve this".
- "Once it is obvious that the US is committed to regime change, she will have to prevail", so the UK needed to "plan for the worst case" and "be prepared to execute [that plan] if required".
- There was a "need to acknowledge" that there would be a post-conflict phase "with an associated commitment, manpower and finance bill", with "a spectrum of commitment where the worst case is a long period with a large bill".
- A "much more detailed level of intelligence" was required.
- "Although Iraq's nuclear capability (essentially a 'dirty' bomb)" could not be "dismissed", the "main threat" was from chemical and biological weapons.
- If regime survival was at stake, Saddam Hussein would "almost certainly use WMD, so there would be no deterrent equation as in 1991".
- "Establishing and maintaining support", from the international community and Iraq's neighbours, would be "the Coalition CoG [Centre of Gravity]".

295. The paper examined each of the components of the concept, including:

- Reviewing the internal politics in Iraq and the options for regime change. Iraq was "potentially fundamentally unstable", and "currently held together by the strong security apparatus", which would require "considerable force to break". Once it was broken, the regime would "shatter" because of its minority appeal.

- A judgement that:
  - The possibilities for a replacement regime were “very difficult to assess” and the UK “must be clear on what we do not want”.
  - It would be “difficult to apply force with sufficient precision to ensure a pre-determined outcome”.
- Removing the threat posed by Iraq’s WMD was “essential”. That would mean changing the “regime to one that renounces WMD”, or completely destroying Iraq’s capability and “remove [the] will to regenerate the capability, which implies regime change”. That would need “much better granularity of intelligence”.
- Managing the regional dimension would require the “footprint and duration” of the military operation to be minimised, “commensurate with assets to manage unintended consequences”.
- Identifying three phases leading to regime change:
  - Phase 1: While Saddam Hussein was unsure of the Coalition’s intentions, he would avoid providing a “casus belli”. He was “unlikely to take any significant military action” but it was “possible” that he would take other actions, including accelerating WMD development and weaponisation and admitting inspectors then obstructing or expelling them.
  - Phase 2: If Saddam Hussein was convinced the Coalition was determined to overthrow his regime, his response would be “unpredictable, ranging from benign/conciliatory … to military aggression”, including pre-emptive attacks and the possible use of WMD, and mining “SPODs [Sea Points of Disembarkation] or approaches”. That phase would provide Saddam Hussein’s “best chance … to fracture the will of the Coalition” and “speed and agility” would be “needed once the decision to act has been taken”.
  - Phase 3: In a conflict phase, Saddam Hussein would go “into full regime (and personal) survival mode, with no holds barred”. The most difficult action for the Coalition to deal with would be if Saddam withdrew to and defended urban areas. The Coalition plan would need to minimise that possibility which supported the idea of a “surprise attack”. The most dangerous response for the Coalition would be a WMD attack on Israel.
- Identifying the key “strategic and military principles” which would affect the design of the campaign:
  - an aim that was “clear and both publicly explainable and defensible”;
  - a choice of options given Saddam’s unpredictability; and
  - surprise and an aim to “maximise strategic uncertainty in Saddam’s mind”.
- Creating political, military and regional conditions which would “keep Saddam off balance” whilst preparatory activities were under way.
- The need to identify and prepare possible force packages.

296. The paper also set out three illustrative options for a military campaign, with a very high-level assessment of their advantages and disadvantages:

- "Air and SF [Special Forces] Precision Strike": with the aim of generating "a 'knock out' blow of key installations and facilities" that would "shatter the regime and cause its downfall". The option had "gained high level enthusiastic backing in Washington" although that might "now be waning". It was "unlikely to be chosen as a discrete option" but elements would form parts of the other two options.
- "Strategic 'Coup de Main'": once "Saddam's regime had been 'squeezed' by all the means at the Coalition's disposal" – political, diplomatic, legal and economic – air assault forces would be used to seize "key regime power centres (mainly in Baghdad)" and "NBC weapons, sites and command and control nodes". The option was "Politically attractive" but militarily "high risk" and would need strategic surprise.
- "Conventional 'Heavy Punch'": "essentially the re-run" of the 1991 Gulf Conflict, which provided the "safer military option".

297. The MOD has been unable to locate any record of the "Think Tank" discussion.[139]

298. Subsequent revisions of the paper before the end of 2002 are addressed later in this Section.

299. The development of SPG thinking on post-conflict issues is addressed in Section 6.4.

300. Mr McKane wrote to Sir David Manning describing the discussion at the "Think Tank" as "preparatory to military talks with the US … at which Tony Pigott and Desmond Bowen would represent the UK".[140]

301. Mr McKane stated that he had been struck by two points:

> "There is a huge amount of work to be done if the UK is to be in a position to participate in any operation against Iraq …"
> "We may need to confront the legal base for military action sooner rather than later. The MOD say that the US will not admit the UK to detailed joint planning unless we are able to agree that regime change is a legitimate and legal objective."

302. Mr McKane recommended that Sir David should reply to Mr Hoon's letter of 31 May seeking "further and better particulars on the time-lines and precisely what decisions incurring significant expenditure would be required now in order to keep open the possibility of a large scale deployment in six months time".

303. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Powell: "We certainly need much greater precision from MOD."[141]

304. Mr Powell replied that he believed there was "a danger of getting ahead of ourselves here unless this is absolutely necessary to get us into detailed military planning with the US". He recommended discussing the issue with Mr Blair.[142]

305. Sir David Manning asked Mr McKane to "confirm that it is now absolutely necessary to get into the detailed planning with the US". He added: "I suspect it is if we are to have a voice."[143]

306. Mr McKane's advice on the legal issue and the UK position on the objective of regime change are addressed in Section 3.3.

Ministerial consideration of UK policy – July 2002

Formal military planning begins

307. The US agreed to discussions on military planning in late June.

308. Mr Blair asked for advice on the steps that would be needed to keep open the option of a making a large scale military contribution by the end of the year.

309. Gen Myers confirmed that he had received a "green light to set up the necessary mechanism for a UK input into Iraq planning" on 19 June.[144]

310. Sir David Manning responded to Mr Hoon's letter of 31 May on 25 June, recording that Mr Blair had:

> "… asked for further advice on precisely what steps would have to be taken now, including financial commitments … to keep open the possibility of deploying a large scale force by the end of the year – bearing in mind that we may not get six months' warning".[145]

311. Sir David wrote that it was "encouraging that following the Rumsfeld visit, our military planners have now been invited to discussions with the US". He added:

> "It will be important, as the Defence Secretary acknowledged in his minute, to make clear the conditions for UK involvement in military action set out by the Prime Minister …"

312. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 26 June reporting that the US was understood to be seeking:

"
- the removal of the Hussein regime;
- the neutralisation of WMD within Iraq;
- the elimination of a safe haven for terrorists;
- an acceptable new government."[146]

313. Mr Watkins stated that the US goals:

> "… broadly align with the objective previously agreed by the Foreign and Defence Secretaries … although Mr Hoon understands that Mr Straw, rightly, sees removal of Saddam as a way point – if necessary and justified – to the final outcome rather than an objective in its own right."

314. Mr Watkins indicated that a small MOD team would be going to Washington and CENTCOM HQ in Tampa, Florida "immediately".

315. The letter concluded that Mr Hoon believed Ministers would need clarity on:

"
- whether the Prime Minister's conditions are likely to be met;
- the viability of the proposed military action;
- the policy and legal framework in which military action is justified;
- overall, whether the prospective outcome looked worth the risks, costs and losses."

316. The draft planning order from CENTCOM was released to the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) on 25 June.[147] Lt Gen Reith was briefed by a US officer from CENTCOM on the state of US planning on 26 June.

317. Gen Reith told the Inquiry that he had been phoned by Maj Gen Wilson "on 4 or 5 June to say that we had been offered the opportunity to participate in the American planning for a potential invasion of Iraq".[148] He had informed Lt Gen Pigott the following day. It was not until 25 June that he "got authority [through MOD] for planning with CENTCOM, but without commitment" and he "didn't start any formal planning until 25 June".

318. Lt Gen Pigott, AM French and Mr Bowen visited Washington and CENTCOM from 27 to 29 June 2002.[149]

[149] Minute Fry to MA/DCDS(C), 26 June 2002, 'Comments on US Planning for Possible Military Action Against Iraq'.

319. Before they left, Major General Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations (Operations) (DCJO(Ops)), provided a paper commenting on US planning, which at that stage offered two basic approaches:

- a "running start", with extra forces being deployed as the initial attacks were under way, which would have the advantage of surprise and allow for operations as early as October 2002; and
- a "generated start" allowing full deployment before the beginning of operations, which was expected to require three months longer.

320. Maj Gen Fry wrote that the "running start" option carried considerably more risk and would be "much more manoeuvrist" than the type of operations which had been conducted in 1991. A number of issues for the UK were identified, including: the role and timing for a UK contribution; the need for very early decision-making; how to integrate into a complex US plan; levels of risk; UK participation in US exercises; and the likely US expectations that would result from UK involvement in the planning process.

321. On 1 July, Mr Watkins advised Mr Hoon on Mr Bowen's visit to Washington.[150] Mr Bowen had reported that the Americans had a plan, including taking Baghdad, which they were confident would deliver regime change, but there was no clear direction on timing. That would be affected by the decision on whether to choose a "running start". The plan would be heavily dependent on basing and overflight rights in the region and beyond. The view in Tampa was that it was very early in the planning process and too soon to talk about the UK's contribution.

322. Mr Bowen's view was that the US military were looking to the UK for a second opinion on their military planning, contributions in kind and influence with Washington on the overall campaign plan. The US military would want "the usual niche capabilities (Nimrod, etc). Whether we provide any more is up to you [Mr Hoon]."

323. Similar conclusions were reported by Maj Gen Wilson to Lt Gen Reith on 30 June.[151] He wrote that UK influence and counsel was "almost as important, if not more so than what we would actually bring to the campaign militarily"; although he also cautioned that "UK ability to significantly influence operational design, if so minded, is limited".

324. Maj Gen Wilson told the Inquiry: "… what I remember was said … I think by General Abizaid, who was then the Director of Joint Staff in the Pentagon … 'We need your advice. We need your counsel …'"[152]

325. Mr Bowen sought agreement for PJHQ to send a six-man team to Tampa to join US planning on 2 July.[153]

326. Mr Hoon agreed the deployment, but asked Adm Boyce to ensure, before the team's departure, that Gen Myers:

> "… understands when they meet tomorrow in Brussels that this is on the basis that no political decisions have been taken in the UK on our participation in an operation; and then follow up in writing."[154]

327. On 3 July, Adm Boyce met Gen Myers.[155] Gen Myers was reported to have "sympathised" with the UK government's condition, and agreed that Adm Boyce would write formally to him to reiterate the point.

328. Adm Boyce and Gen Myers discussed a northern option. There were differences of view within the US military about a possible attack from the North although the importance of control of the northern oilfields was recognised. Adm Boyce took the view that Gen Myers "showed his petticoat" in so far as he indicated that that was where the UK might be involved.

329. Adm Boyce also reported that "it appeared that military planning was taking place in a political void".

330. On 4 July, Adm Boyce wrote to Gen Franks, stating:

> "My Defence Secretary wishes me to record that our involvement in planning is on the basis that no political decisions have been taken in the UK on our participation in an operation against Iraq."[156]

331. Maj Gen Wilson informed the Inquiry that action through Turkey would have required the participation of the US European Command (EUCOM) in addition to CENTCOM.[157]

332. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry: "It was made absolutely clear that every time we spoke to the Americans that no commitment was guaranteed until a political tick had been received."[158]

333. Lord Boyce added that:

> "The reaction of the Americans was always 'Yes, I hear what you say but come the day, we know you will be there', until right towards the end."

JIC ASSESSMENT, 4 JULY 2002: 'IRAQ: REGIME COHESION'

334. A JIC Assessment on 4 July addressed regime cohesion in Iraq and how it would respond under pressure or attack.

335. Although it had only fragmentary intelligence about how the regime would deal with an attack including ground forces, the JIC assessed on 4 July that only massive military force would be guaranteed to topple Saddam Hussein

336. The JIC judged that disintegration of the regime would be most likely if Iraqi ground forces were being comprehensively defeated; if top military officers could be persuaded that their fate was not irrevocably tied to that of Saddam Hussein; or if Saddam were to be killed.

337. At the request of the MOD, the JIC issued an Assessment of "how cohesion of the Iraqi regime is maintained and how the regime would fare under pressure or attack" on 4 July.[159]

338. The minutes of the JIC discussion of the draft paper described it as:

> "… an important paper with a specific focus. It would be of interest to Ministers more because of its context, with decisions yet to be taken about what to do with Iraq, than because of its analysis, which was familiar rather than novel.
>
> "Its key message was that although Saddam Hussein's regime was remarkably resilient to pressure … the demonstration of a real and overwhelming international determination and ability to remove the regime through military force was the likeliest way to bring it down …
> "Experience in Afghanistan had shown that generating expectations and influencing people's perceptions of what might happen had considerable capacity to effect real and rapid change …
> "The paper needed to analyse and describe in more detail the nature of Saddam's support … The motives for each set of supporters were different … These mattered because under pressure the different groups would behave differently.
> "UK policy makers, and military planners, would be keen before too long to identify the point at which self-interested loyalty for Saddam might turn into disillusionment, fragility and fragmentation."[160]

---

[159] JIC Assessment, 4 July 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion'.
[160] Minutes, 3 July 2002, JIC meeting.

339. The JIC's Key Judgements were:

- Only massive military force would be guaranteed to topple Saddam. The regime expects a US attack […].
- The clear prospect of a major attack would put the regime under unprecedented pressure. But regime cohesion is unlikely to collapse in the absence of a large scale invasion.
- Saddam relies on a mixture of patronage and extreme fear to retain power and contain opposition. Real loyalty and support for his regime is confined to the top of the hierarchy.
- The Special Republican Guard (SRG) and the Republican Guard Forces Command (RGFC) are more reliable than the Regular Army (RA). All would initially fight a US-led attack. Once the regime was perceived as doomed the military's will to fight on would be sorely tested.
- Regime disintegration would be most likely if Iraqi ground forces were being comprehensively defeated; if top military officers could be persuaded that their fate was not irrevocably tied to that of Saddam; or if Saddam himself were to be killed. Military units are more likely to suffer mass desertions than revolt as coherent units."[161]

340. The Assessment also stated:

> "Saddam and his regime have proved durable …
> "The Iraqi military are aware of their vulnerability to air power, probably their greatest weakness; their main way of mitigating this is through dispersal, including into urban areas […] We have only fragmentary intelligence indicating how the regime might deal with an all-out attack including ground forces. But we assess that only massive military force could be guaranteed to topple Saddam."

341. Addressing the policy implications of the Assessment, the JIC stated: "Saddam and his regime must be convinced that any move to topple him is serious and likely to succeed before they begin to feel the pressure."

Mr Hoon's proposal for a collective Ministerial discussion

342. In early July, Mr Hoon proposed a collective Ministerial discussion, which Mr Straw supported.

343. On 2 July, Mr Watkins reported to Sir David Manning that "US military thinking is quite well advanced", but US planners were assuming offensive operations to overthrow Saddam Hussein "in a policy void".[162] The US "end-state to be achieved after conflict" had not been identified, and there seemed to be no "overarching campaign strategy for dealing with Iraq".

---

[161] JIC Assessment, 4 July 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion'.
[162] Letter Watkins to Manning, 2 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

344. An updated plan would be briefed to President Bush in August, and the US planning was designed "to put CENTCOM in a position to be able to activate their plan from August 2002 onwards". A "de facto invitation to the UK and Australia to participate" was "now on the table". The plan would require availability of bases and support from Kuwait, Jordan and Turkey.

345. Mr Watkins reported that Mr Hoon intended to respond positively to the invitation for a small number of British planners to join US planning teams; that was "essential in helping to inform the MOD's own thinking" so that Mr Hoon could make recommendations. But Mr Hoon was:

> "… very conscious that decisions about a military contribution cannot be made in the absence of a coherent and integrated strategic framework. An agreed strategy will be key to taking matters forward, not simply to provide justification for military action, but to clarify timelines; to incorporate the Prime Minister's conditions for UK participation; and to establish the framework for an information campaign. The draft public document, which you are currently considering, would ultimately form an important part of that campaign. He suggests that the Prime Minister may like to call an early meeting of a small group of colleagues to consider how best to get the US to address the strategic, as opposed to the narrowly military, dimension. The freestanding military option is not a viable political proposition.
> "Meanwhile, officials from the MOD, FCO and Cabinet Office should do some more homework urgently to put the Prime Minister and you in a better position to influence the President's and Condi Rice's thinking … before the updated CENTCOM plan is briefed to the President in the course of August. Mr Hoon will also review the possibilities for contact with the US Defense Secretary."

346. The preparation and content of the draft public document on Iraq referred to by Mr Watkins, the "dossier", is addressed in Sections 4.1 and 4.2.

347. The Treasury's reaction to Mr Hoon's minute is addressed in Section 13.

348. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 8 July supporting Mr Hoon's suggestion for an early Ministerial meeting.[163]

349. Mr Straw stated that the report of US planning had raised several points which concerned him, including:

- There was "no strategic concept for the military plan". US military planning had "so far taken place in a vacuum".

---

[163] Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 8 July 2002, 'Iraq: Contingency Planning'.

- "The support of key allies such as Kuwait cannot be counted on in the absence of some serious ground-work by the US."
- "The key point is how to get through to the Americans that the success of any military operation against Iraq – and protection of our fundamental interests in the region – depends on devising in advance a coherent strategy which assesses the political and economic as well as the military implications."

350. The advice from Mr Hoon and Mr Straw, and No.10's reaction to the proposal for a Ministerial meeting, are addressed in Section 3.3.

351. Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Mr Hoon on 3 July setting out his concerns about the absence of a political context for the military plan and the dilemma for the UK that being drawn into US planning potentially posed.[164]

352. Sir Kevin concluded that the UK could not count on a military campaign being unlikely or, if the US went ahead, that the UK could avoid being linked to the campaign.

353. Sir Kevin advised that a "credible political plan", which addressed the conditions for UK participation and moved American planning into acceptable channels and slowed it down, was needed. That is set out in more detail in Section 3.3.

354. Sir Kevin Tebbit's minute was sent after Mr Watkins' letter to Sir David Manning had been sent. Mr Watkins marked the letter to Mr Hoon observing that the MOD did not know the views of Secretary Powell or Dr Rice; and there was a risk "that the PM's conditions will be simply sidelined".[165]

355. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that getting involved in US planning in late June and early July had posed a dilemma because:

> "… it was clear … even at that stage, if one begins discussions with the United States on the military track, albeit without commitment, it becomes increasingly difficult to keep options open absolutely completely … [W]e made it clear to them that our participation … was purely to inform British Government thinking …
>
> "On the one hand, if one is drawn into discussion of timescales and details, we might give misleading signals of support for military action that was not present at that stage.
> "On the other hand, if we continued to stand aside, it might be too late for us to influence events or meet the political requirement which might be placed on us."[166]

356. On 9 July, Sir Christopher Meyer advised that President Bush would have a military plan on his desk before he went on holiday in August.

357. On 9 July, Sir Christopher Meyer reported speculation in the US media and a number of recent discussions in Washington.[167]

358. In a press conference on 8 July, President Bush had not attempted to challenge the veracity of a story about leaked military plans. Sir Christopher's contacts suggested that the aim was to have a reworked military plan on President Bush's desk before he went on holiday in August.

The MOD's assessment of US military plans

359. In mid-July, the MOD still had only scant information about US military plans and the Chiefs of Staff identified a number of areas of concern which needed to be addressed.

360. Political guidance was needed on how to implement the UK's intent and convey that intent to the US.

361. The SPG had pointed out that, once military forces were deployed, the US would have to see its policy through to a successful conclusion.

362. But that point does not seem to have been pursued in relation to what that might mean for UK policy.

363. Lt Gen Pigott issued 'Initial Planning Guidance for Possible Military Operations in Iraq' to Lt Gen Reith, AM French, the Director Special Forces, Air Commodore Mike Heath (Director Targeting and Information Operations), and Brigadier Andrew Stewart, the Army's Director of Overseas Military Activity, on 8 July.[168] The guidance considered the preparation of military strategic options ranging from regional influence to large scale war-fighting and assessed the CENTCOM plan.

364. Lt Gen Pigott made clear that the planning and contingency work conducted so far had not been subject to legal scrutiny. He also asked for "actionable intelligence" on WMD and an understanding of Saddam Hussein's options and the regime's fault lines and fragility.

365. A revised version of the SPG paper, 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq', was produced on 11 July for a "Strategic Think Tank" on Iraq the following week.[169]

366. Much of the thinking underpinning the paper was unchanged but there were some significant additions, including:

- The US was aware of the dangers of failure and was planning for the "worst case".

[168] Minute DCDS(C) to Various, 8 July 2002, 'Initial Planning Guidance for Possible Military Operations in Iraq'.
[169] Paper [SPG], 11 July 2002, 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq'.

- The UK was not "well-balanced" to match US ability to escalate action rapidly and, if UK forces were to be deployed alongside the US, there was a "need to match US planning aspirations".
- WMD, the composition and methods of the current Iraqi regime, and where the fracture lines existed in the current regime, were identified as the areas where a "much more detailed level of intelligence" was required.
- The UK "must accept" that it was "likely that our visibility of WMD may even deteriorate as Saddam prepares for conflict".
- Any replacement regime would need to renounce WMD.
- A much more detailed analysis of the need for international support and the risks associated with the position of individual countries was required. Turkey would be a "critical" ally and would "call for a delicate political balance" which would "require … military support". Ensuring Turkey's support would require identification of "credible political carrots", enhanced military aid and "effective military links to Kurdish guerrilla groups".
- Iraq provided a "balance" to Iran and needed "either … to retain significant military capability or international guarantees". The paper also asked whether Iran would be the "next candidate of axis of evil?"
- Saddam Hussein's "best chance" would be "to prevent the deployment of coalition forces as once committed by presence, the US can only see the operation through to success …"
- Information operations would play a key part in Phases 2 and 3 of the campaign.
- Taking military action during "Window 1" would require management of consequences after military action, "Strike then Shape". "Window 2" would be "more deliberate", and was characterised as "Shape then Strike".
- There was a definition of possible UK contributions as Packages 1, 2 and 3 and the initial, high-level identification of key shortfalls in readiness.
- There was the identification of a fourth, "Siege" option for a military campaign, which would entail "seizing one or more pieces of territory (probably in the North and South) and, in effect, laying siege to the regime". That had "received some support in the Press and from academics". It could achieve the end state "with little fighting, but the political risks" were "high".

367. PJHQ submitted an assessment of the CENTCOM plan on 12 July, which identified the possible scope and scale of a UK contribution as:

- enablers, including Special Forces;
- support of the US "Main Effort" through Kuwait with armoured forces up to a division (minus) and/or light forces at brigade strength; and

- a discrete contribution in geographical or functional terms – a second axis in the north, which needed more work to establish if it was feasible.[170]

368. The paper outlined the two possible windows for military action:

- Window One between October 2002 and March 2003; and
- Window Two between October 2003 and March 2004.

369. The second was the preferred UK option, but PJHQ acknowledged that it was "undoubtedly less attractive to the US".

370. The Chiefs of Staff were asked for guidance on the direction and nature of future planning.

371. Maj Gen Wilson advised Lt Gen Reith on 16 July that the UK was expected to present a statement of intent at a US CENTCOM planning conference in Tampa, Florida on 1 to 2 August.[171]

372. Maj Gen Wilson reported that it was expected that the UK capability "offered" would "deliver the northern option", together with Special Forces, air (especially tankers), ships, command and control architecture and enablers. He concluded that there were "more questions than answers, with too many issues of substance either not yet addressed or 'assumed away'":

- On WMD use, the view remained that Saddam Hussein's "ability to deliver 'capability' is unproven and widespread use thought unlikely".
- Although there was "reasonable information upon which to target", it remained "a critical information shortcoming".
- It was not clear whether detailed work had been done to assess Iraqi "red lines". There was uncertainty over what Israel would do by way of retaliation if attacked.
- The "Baghdad Stronghold" scenario was acknowledged but considered a "possibility rather than an eventuality".

373. In relation to the recent announcement of a Turkish election on 3 November, Maj Gen Wilson reported that had "unsettled" the US, and US military planners had been asked to "assess the feasibility of plans in a 'no Turkey scenario'". He added:

> "Whether it [the 'no Turkey scenario'] becomes a show-stopper remains to be seen."

374. Maj Gen Wilson's advice was seen by Adm Boyce.[172]

375. A briefing note prepared by Lt Gen Pigott for Adm Boyce focused on:

- the question of whether there was a winning concept;
- the comparative advantages and disadvantages of operations between October 2002 and March 2003 or one year later;
- the possible UK contribution; and
- the way ahead.[173]

376. Lt Gen Pigott advised that the UK assessments of the plan were based on "scant information", and that the key areas of concerns on the US plan included:

- a mismatch in the end states of the US and UK;
- the lack of a strategic framework;
- potentially optimistic assumptions about assessments of Iraqi weaknesses;
- insufficient knowledge of the WMD threat in many important respects; and
- a question about "to what extent" kinetic means could deliver strategic ends.

377. Lt Gen Pigott's view was that the UK should encourage thinking to move towards action in 2003-2004 rather than in 2002-2003, which "had a better chance of success" given the challenges "including political red cards". That was: "Not a recipe for delay, indeed quite the reverse." It would be difficult for the UK to send land forces to participate in a "running start" but the UK thinking was "taking us towards a 'distinctive' (Package 3) role". For any significant contribution, force preparation would need to start "now".

378. The advice from Lt Gen Pigott and the SPG was discussed in a restricted Chiefs of Staff meeting on 17 July.[174]

379. At the meeting, Adm Boyce emphasised the privileged nature of the UK access to US planning and the need for operational security. The points made in the discussion included:

- One key judgement which would affect planning would be whether an initial push would trigger regime collapse.
- Although the use of UK bases was critical to the US plan there was, from the UK viewpoint, no viable context within which it could participate in military action: "The legal basis was particularly fraught with difficulty."
- A running start "was not currently viable for the UK without significant risk".
- A UK contribution in the North that did not require integration into US land forces would "fix" Iraqi divisions in northern Iraq, "open up a second front, and safeguard the critical northern oilfields".

[173] Minute DCDS(C) to DPSO/CDS, 17 July 2002, 'Iraq: Summary of Key Issues'.
[174] Minutes, 17 July 2002, Chiefs of Staff (Restricted) meeting.

- It might take “up to nine months” to produce a division (minus), “although this was understood to be the ‘sensible worst case’”.
- Timings were critical and the UK could not wait to see if Window 2 was the preferred US option.
- There was a key judgement to be made about whether the UK should wait for an approach from the US, “or be more forward leaning and factor a UK ‘offer in principle’ into US planning at an early stage”.
- Iraq’s chemical and biological (CB) warfare capability and intent was a significant issue, “even a limited CB employment could cripple the battle plan”.

380. Adm Boyce concluded that “the UK needed greater visibility of US intent in a number of areas”. For the immediate future, “political guidance on how best to start implementing UK intent and to convey that intent to the US” was needed.

381. In preparation for a meeting to be held on 18 July, Mr Bowen outlined the MOD thinking in a minute to Mr Hoon on 17 July.[175]

382. Mr Bowen drew attention to the US concepts of “running” and “generated” starts. He advised that the indications were that the US favoured the “running start” option (which could see US operations beginning during the course of 2002). That would achieve “strategic surprise”, but it went against “our expectation of [a] Desert Storm-style build up over months”.

383. Mr Bowen suggested:

> “In the meantime, as we begin to explore possible UK contributions we need to identify what preparation – such as procurement for urgent operational requirements – could usefully begin now …”

384. A minute from Mr Hoon’s Private Office to Mr Hoon stated that the Chiefs of Staff, notably General Sir Mike Walker, Chief of the General Staff, had been very sceptical about the US plan, which was seen as “optimistic in a number of areas”, including:

- the speed of advance over large distances;
- confidence that the regime would implode without direct action against the seat of power or Iraqi leaders;
- reliance on the isolation rather than the capture of Baghdad;
- little consideration of the practicality of the plan in a chemical/biological environment; and
- the lack of focus on the northern areas.[176]

[176] Minute [Williams] and [Watkins] to SofS [MOD], 17 July 2002, ‘Meeting on Iraq 18 Jul 02 1145’.

385. The Chiefs of Staff had concerns about the difficulties for any land operations posed by the timescales and logistics. That would need to be "set against the Prime Minister's desire to be supportive".

386. Mr Hoon's Private Office was concerned about the weakness of the coalition elements and post-conflict plans, and advised Mr Hoon that his meeting should focus on what would "allow participation in planning to continue".

387. The MOD has been unable to locate any record of Mr Hoon's meeting on 18 July.[177]

388. The DIS reported on 22 July that the US was "no better off than we are about actionable intelligence on WMD.[178] Sites formerly used for the production of WMD were known, but there was "little intelligence on whether they are currently in use or on possible new locations". The whereabouts of potential storage sites was "a top priority but no significant success was reported".

Mr Blair's meeting, 23 July 2002

CABINET OFFICE PAPER, 'IRAQ: CONDITIONS FOR MILITARY ACTION'

389. The Cabinet Office paper 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action' was issued on 19 July, to inform Mr Blair's 23 July meeting with Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith (the Attorney General) and key officials to discuss Iraq.

390. The purpose of the Cabinet Office paper was to identify the conditions which would be necessary before military action would be justified and the UK could participate in such action; and to provide the basis for a discussion with the US about creating those conditions.

391. The Cabinet Office paper stated that Mr Blair had said at Crawford that the UK would support military action to bring about regime change, provided certain conditions were met.

392. The Cabinet Office paper, 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action', was issued on 19 July to those who would be attending a meeting to be chaired by Mr Blair on 23 July.[179]

393. Ministers were invited to note the latest position on US military planning, the timescales for possible action, and to agree:

- The objective for military action, as set out in Mr Hoon's minute to Mr Blair of 31 May, of "a stable and law-abiding Iraq within the present borders, co-operating with the international community, no longer posing a threat to its neighbours or to international security, and abiding by its international obligations on WMD".

- To "engage the US on the need to set military plans within a realistic political strategy", which included "identifying the succession to Saddam Hussein and creating the conditions necessary to justify government military action, which might include an ultimatum for the return of UN weapons inspectors to Iraq. This should include a call from the Prime Minister to President Bush ahead of the briefing of US military plans to the President on 4 August.
- The establishment of a Cabinet Office-led ad hoc group of officials to consider the development of an information campaign to be agreed with the US.

394. The paper stated that US military planning for action against Iraq was "proceeding apace" but it lacked a political framework: "In particular, little thought has been given to creating the political conditions for military action, or the aftermath and how to shape it."

395. It seemed "unlikely" that the UK's objective could be achieved while Saddam Hussein's regime remained in power. The US objective was "unambiguously" the "removal of Saddam Hussein's regime, followed by elimination of Iraqi WMD". The view of UK officials was that it was by "no means certain" that one would follow from the other: even if regime change was "a necessary condition for controlling Iraq's WMD", it was "certainly not a sufficient one".

396. The paper stated that "certain preparations would need to be made and other considerations taken into account". It contained a series of sections addressing the conditions which would be "necessary for military action and UK participation, including:

- "a viable military plan"; and
- "a positive risk/benefit assessment".

397. In relation to military planning, the paper stated:

- The Chiefs of Staff were not yet able to assess whether the military plans were "sound"; although a "decision in principle" might be needed "soon".
- Ministers were invited to "note" the potentially long lead times for equipping UK forces to undertake operations in Iraq, and asked to agree that the MOD could bring forward proposals for procurement of equipment.

398. The Chiefs of Staff had advised that there were a number of questions which would need to be answered before US military plans could be assessed as "sound". Those included:

- the realism of a "Running Start";
- the willingness of Iraqi forces to fight; and

- the potential impact of Iraqi attacks using chemical or biological weapons.[180]

399. Without an overt military build-up, a "Running Start" military action could begin as early as November, with air strikes and support for opposition groups and small-scale land operations, while further ground forces built up to overwhelm Iraqi forces "leading to the collapse of the Iraqi regime". A "Generated Start" following a military build-up could begin as early as January 2003. That was also judged to be the latest date for the start of military operations unless action was "deferred until the following autumn".

400. The "UK's ability to contribute forces depended on the details of US military planning and the time available to prepare and deploy them". The MOD was "examining how the UK might contribute to US-led action". Options ranging from deployment of a division to making bases available had been identified. US plans assumed the use of British bases in Cyprus and Diego Garcia. Unless "publicly visible" decisions were taken "very soon", the UK would not be able to send a division in time for an operation in Iraq in January 2003.

401. A "decision in principle" might be "needed soon on whether and in what form the UK takes part in military action".

402. Ministers were invited to "note the potentially long lead times involved in equipping UK Armed Forces to undertake operations in the Iraqi theatre"; and to "agree that MOD should bring forward proposals for the procurement of Urgent Operational Requirements under cover of the lessons learned from Afghanistan" and the "outcome" of the 2002 Spending Review.

403. Mr McKane advised Sir David Manning separately that the paper covered US military plans "only in headline form" on the grounds that Mr Blair would "wish to receive a short oral brief from CDS".[181]

404. The planning and preparations for equipping UK forces are addressed in Section 6.3.

405. The Cabinet Office paper was written in order to support a Ministerial discussion about the approach the UK should take to the US on Iraq. It identified the issues the UK should be trying to get the US to address before it embarked on military action to secure regime change in Iraq in a way the UK would find difficult to support.

---

[180] Paper Cabinet Office, 19 July 2002, 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action'.
[181] Minute McKane to Manning, 19 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

406. It was not written to provide a broader and more fundamental analysis of the policy choices which the UK Government might at that time have considered, and their consequences, including:

- whether military action would be the best way to secure the UK's objective;
- the longer-term consequences and obligations which were likely to arise from military action.

407. The wider issues addressed by the paper are set out in Section 3.3.

MOD ADVICE FOR MR HOON

408. Following his minute of 3 July and a visit to Washington on 18 to 19 July, Sir Kevin Tebbit advised that the US Administration as a whole was increasingly united in the view that military action would be taken against Iraq to bring about regime change and remove WMD risks.

409. Sir Kevin Tebbit visited Washington from 18 to 19 July.[182]

410. Sir Kevin advised Mr Hoon that the US Administration as a whole was increasingly united in the view that military action would be taken against Iraq to bring about regime change and remove WMD risks. He reported an "air of unreality" given the enormity of what was envisaged and the absence of a policy framework and detailed planning.

411. Sir Kevin Tebbit also wrote to Sir David Manning before the Ministerial discussion on 23 July.[183]

412. The advice for both Mr Hoon and Sir David is addressed in Section 3.3.

413. In the light of uncertainty about the timing of possible military operations, Adm Boyce had directed that planning for deployment of land forces should concentrate on two packages: a "supporting/enabling package" and a northern option, comprising a division with two combat brigades (a division-minus).

414. MOD officials privately expressed strong reservations about military action to Mr Hoon stating that there was no objective justification for a pre-emptive attack either now or in the immediate future.

415. Mr Hoon was advised that the legal framework could constrain the UK's ability to support US action.

[183] Letter Tebbit to Manning, 22 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

416. In preparation for the meeting on 23 July, Mr Bowen advised Mr Hoon that the meeting would discuss the Cabinet Office paper of 19 July, and the agenda was expected to cover:

- US planning and timescales;
- objectives of any military action;
- the strategic policy framework;
- the potential UK contribution; and
- an information campaign.[184]

417. Mr Bowen advised that it was "still too early to be definitive" about whether the US had a winning military concept; but that it was "likely" that the answer to that question would be "'yes' with certain conditions". The key point for Mr Blair to note was that US action could take place "very quickly, as early as November".

418. Agreeing the objective for military action would be "useful", but it begged the question of the "strategic policy framework in which to take military action in pursuit of that objective". "In particular a framework" was "required to set the conditions for military action including the necessary justification in international law". That was "important because it may well constrain our ability to support US action".

419. Adm Boyce had directed that UK planning should concentrate on two "packages":

- a supporting/enabling package, including basing, maritime and air assets, in which the "the only land contribution would be Special Forces"; and
- a discrete land contribution of a "division (minus)" for operations in northern Iraq.

420. Those two packages had been chosen "because they effectively represent maximum practical UK contributions to US-led operations for either early or later action". Schematic timelines showing decision dates and readiness which could be achieved were provided.

421. Mr Bowen advised that the "indications from the US" were that it did "not expect a ground force contribution from the UK for operations out of Kuwait"; and that "providing land forces to integrate with the US main effort in the South" had "been discounted because of the severe difficulties we would face due to interoperability; deployment time and geographic constraints affecting logistics in particular".

422. Work was "now being tailored" to a UK contribution from the north, although it was "difficult to see how meaningful operations could be achieved outside the framework of a multi-national force such as the ARRC [Allied Rapid Reaction Corps] with the support of other allies".

---

[184] Minute Bowen to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 22 July 2002, 'Iraq: Meeting with the Prime Minister'.

423. A speaking note stated that the key points for the meeting with Mr Blair were:

- US military planning was "gathering pace".
- The "mood and timetable" pointed to "this winter for action, although an alternative would be in 2003/4".
- There was a "need for early guidance on UK military involvement and preparatory work".
- Engagement between Mr Blair and President Bush was "needed now to assess US willingness to establish [a] strategic framework, followed by UK decision-making before summer break".

424. The "Line to Take" offered to Mr Hoon included:

- It was "too early to judge" if the US military plan was a winning concept and the Chiefs of Staff were "not yet convinced". The question of whether the US had a winning concept could be answered as planning developed. The UK view was that pressure should be "applied from South, West and North".
- The US would like to establish the scale of UK involvement. Subject to the legal framework, the US expected Diego Garcia, Cyprus, air enablers, maritime force and Special Forces as a minimum. There was a "Developing expectation" of a division size force in the North with Turkey and other allies.
- Decisions were "needed urgently" if UK forces were to be involved "this winter". A large land force contribution needed "preparatory action immediately" and would not be complete until "March/April".

425. Commenting on Mr Bowen's advice, Mr Watkins wrote that: "Large scale involvement in a US thrust from Kuwait would be impracticable"; and that a division (minus) option "would require immediate action on UORs etc and early decisions (October) on reserves". The latter would "definitely be visible".[185]

426. In relation to a discrete "Land Contribution", Mr Watkins wrote:

> "Apart from being 'involved', the military utility (and risks) of this option are not clear."

427. Mr Watkins added to the speaking note a suggestion that Mr Hoon should seek an understanding that the costs of UORs would be met from the Reserve.

428. Mr Watkins also offered Mr Hoon a "Private Office distillation of where we think most of your key advisers – Chiefs, PUS etc (with possible exception of Simon Webb) – are coming from". That set out strong reservations about military action, including that there was no objective justification for a pre-emptive attack either now or in the immediate future.[186]

429. Mr Watkins' note is described in more detail in Section 3.3.

430. Adm Boyce was advised that the UK should agree to explore the northern option with the US, including being prepared to consider offering to lead land forces.

431. Separate advice from Lt Gen Pigott for Adm Boyce stated that the choice was "between 'Embedded' and 'Distinctive'" options.[187] The former were "fine" for maritime and air components, but the latter were "better" for land and Special Forces, "largely for logs [logistic]/deconfliction reasons".

432. Lt Gen Pigott also wrote that strategic thinking on a "Northern Axis" was "still immature" in relation to "Timelines/Practicality?".

433. On the "Way Forward", the UK should:

- "Agree [the] Intent" to offer enablers, maritime and air forces at medium scale, and "up to" a division (minus) to US planners, "with provisos on deployment/employment clearly spelt out".
- "Agree to explore" the "Northern Option" with the US "as a matter of urgency". The UK should also:
  - "Be prepared to consider Framework Nation lead of a Land Component within this option."
  - "Be prepared … to scope possible role for HQ ARRC."
- "Agree to scope" Special Forces involvement.
- "Agree to Implement" invisible UORs now, and be prepared to advise Ministers later on visible UORs.
- "Agree to identify" other essential preparations for submission to Ministers "against "Window 1 timelines".

434. Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July did not take firm decisions.

435. The record of the meeting stated that the UK should work on the assumption that it would take part in any military action and Admiral Boyce could tell the US that the UK was considering a range of options.

436. Mr Blair commissioned further advice and background material on all the issues.

437. Mr Blair discussed Iraq with Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith, Sir Richard Wilson, Adm Boyce, Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Francis Richards (Director of the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ)), Mr Scarlett, Mr Powell, Baroness Morgan (Director of Political and Government Relations), Mr Campbell and Sir David Manning, on 23 July.[188]

438. The discussion in the meeting and the actions that followed are addressed in Section 3.3.

439. In relation to military planning, the record of the meeting produced by Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, stated:

- Mr Scarlett summarised the intelligence and latest (4 July) JIC Assessment: "Saddam's regime was tough and based on extreme fear. The only way to overthrow it was likely to be by massive military action." Saddam was "worried and expected an attack", but he was "not convinced" that an attack would be "immediate or overwhelming".
- Sir Richard Dearlove reported that there was "a perceptible shift in attitude" in Washington: "Military action was now seen as inevitable." President Bush "wanted to remove Saddam, through military action, justified by the conjunction of terrorism and WMD".
- Adm Boyce reported that Secretary Rumsfeld and President Bush would be briefed by CENTCOM planners in early August. The US was examining two military options, and saw the "UK (and Kuwait) as essential". The three main options for UK involvement were:
  - "(i) Basing in Diego Garcia and Cyprus plus […] SF [Special Forces] squadrons.
  - (ii) As above, with maritime and air assets in addition.
  - (iii) As above, plus a land contribution of up to 40,000 perhaps with a discrete role in northern Iraq entering from Turkey, tying down two Iraqi divisions."
- Mr Hoon said that the US had already begun "spikes of activity" to put pressure on the regime. In his view, January was the most likely timing for military action.
- Mr Straw stated that it "seemed clear" that President Bush had "made up his mind to take military action, even if the timing was not yet decided".
- Lord Goldsmith warned that the desire for regime change was not a legal basis for military action. Self-defence and humanitarian intervention could not be the basis for military action in this case.
- Mr Blair had stated: "The two key issues were whether the military plan worked and whether we had the political strategy to give the military plan the space to work."
- Adm Boyce did not yet know if the US battleplan was "workable". There were "lots of questions", for example "the consequences if Saddam Hussein used WMD on day one, or if Baghdad did not collapse and urban warfighting began".

[188] Minute Rycroft to Manning, 23 July 2002, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meeting, 23 July'.

- Mr Straw "thought the US would not go ahead with a military plan unless convinced it was the winning strategy", but there "could be US/UK differences" on the political strategy.
- Mr Scarlett assessed that "Saddam would allow the inspectors back in only when he thought the threat of military action was real".
- Mr Hoon stated that if Mr Blair wanted UK military involvement, an early decision would be required. Mr Hoon cautioned that "many in the US did not think it was worth going down the ultimatum route". It would be important for Mr Blair "to set out the political context" to President Bush.

440. In relation to the military option, Mr Rycroft recorded that the meeting concluded:

- We should work on the assumption that the UK would take part in any military action. But we needed a fuller picture of US planning before we could take any firm decisions. CDS should tell the US military that we were considering a range of options.
- The Prime Minister would revert on the question of whether funds could be spent in preparation for this operation.
- CDS would send the Prime Minister full details of the proposed military campaign and possible UK contributions by the end of the week."

441. Mr Rycroft sent a separate letter to Mr Straw's Private Secretary on 23 July, which very briefly summarised the action points for the FCO, the MOD and the Cabinet Office.[189]

442. In his memoir, Mr Blair recorded that Adm Boyce had made it pretty clear at the meeting that "he thought the US had decided on it [military action], bar a real change of heart by Saddam".[190]

443. In his account of the meeting, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had "said he needed to be convinced … of the workability of the military plan."[191]

444. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that he did not have a specific recollection of the meeting but he did not recall it as a key meeting, rather it was part of an "iterative process".[192]

445. Mr Hoon subsequently wrote that there was "a very full discussion of the relevant issues" at the meeting, and that:

> "Arguments both for and against UK involvement as well as relevant legal opinions were set out and recorded in the minutes of the meeting. All of the reservations set out in the summary prepared by my Private Office were fully debated in the meeting.

At such a meeting I would not have thought it necessary to repeat arguments already made by others … unless there was some specific benefit in doing so."[193]

446. In his Note to President Bush of 28 July on the strategy on Iraq, Mr Blair suggested a build-up of military forces in the Gulf in the autumn as a signal of intent to encourage international support and demoralise Iraq.

447. Mr Blair's Note to President Bush on 28 July and his and Sir David Manning's subsequent discussions with President Bush are addressed in Section 3.3.

448. Mr Blair's Note of 28 July began:

"I will be with you, whatever. But this is the moment to assess bluntly the difficulties. The planning on this and the strategy are the toughest yet. This is not Kosovo. This is not Afghanistan. It is not even the Gulf War.

"The military part of this is hazardous but I will concentrate mainly on the political context for success."[194]

449. In a section setting out the elements of a strategy to secure a political coalition, if not necessarily a military one, Mr Blair wrote:

"It goes without saying that the Turks and Kurds need to be OK. Strangely I think they are going to be the easiest, despite the Turkish elections. They both want our help badly and will play ball if offered enough."

450. In a section headed "The Military Plan", Mr Blair wrote:

"Finally, obviously, we must have a workable military plan. I don't know the details yet, so this is first blush.

"The two options are running start and generated start.

"The first has the advantage of surprise; the second of overwhelming force. My military tell me the risks of heavy losses on the running start make it very risky. Apparently it involves around 15-20,000 troops striking inside Iraq, with heavy air support. The idea would be to catch the regime off balance, strike hard and quickly and get it to collapse. The obvious danger is [that] it doesn't collapse. And there is the risk of CW being used.

"For that reason, a generated start seems better. It could always be translated into a more immediate option, should Saddam do something stupid. Also, the build-up of forces in such numbers will be a big signal of serious intent to the region and help to pull people towards us and demoralise the Iraqis. This option allows us to hammer his air defences and infrastructure; to invade from the South and take the oilfields; to secure the North and protect/stabilise the Kurds. Then effectively with huge force we go on to Baghdad."

451. Mr Blair concluded:

"We would support in any way we can.

"On timing, we could start building up after the break. A strike date could be Jan/Feb next year. But the crucial issue is not when, but how."

Definition of UK force "Packages"

MOD advice, 26 July 2002

452. In response to Mr Blair's request for full details of the proposed military campaign and possible UK contributions, the MOD advised No.10 on 26 July:

- US military planning was still evolving and the Chiefs of Staff were not yet able to judge whether the US had a winning concept.
- Three possible options were identified but no recommendation was made about which option should be selected.
- The largest option comprised the deployment of a division, but the MOD was also examining the possibility of deploying an additional light brigade and providing the framework for a UK-led Corps headquarters.

453. Mr Hoon expressed caution about both the robustness of the estimates of the timescales for a UK deployment and the impact of Operation FRESCO – potential industrial action by the Fire Brigades Union in the autumn.

454. Mr Hoon's view was that the UK should present its options to the US positively, but without commitment at that stage.

455. Mr Blair was advised that no decision was needed at that stage.

456. The three options identified by the MOD, which made no explicit reference to possible post-conflict commitments, provided the broad framework for discussions until the end of 2002.

457. Following Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July, Mr Watkins commissioned further work, including a paper on all aspects of the military options for Mr Hoon to send to Mr Blair in time for his weekend box: a paper on military preparations, including the impact of the firefighters' strike; and a draft script for Maj Gen Wilson to use at the CENTCOM meeting on 1 to 2 August.[195]

---

[195] Minute Watkins to PSO/CDS, 23 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

458. Maj Gen Fry provided PJHQ advice on 25 July, including a paper entitled 'Discrete UK northern options through Turkey'.[196] That stated that the US would not be able logistically to sustain simultaneous assaults from the north and south, and that the "northern approach therefore remains a possibility for a self-sustaining UK force package as part of the overarching US campaign plan".

459. The paper identified that the objective could be to either "defeat" or to "fix" Iraqi forces. The basic UK package would be an armoured division with two "square" brigades.

460. Maj Gen Fry advised:

> "… what is beginning to emerge in the development of our work is the need for a possible post-conflict stabilisation force in order to meet the grand strategic end state of a new acceptable government."

461. Maj Gen Fry suggested that there would be a need for a three-star headquarters, including to co-ordinate air assets.

462. The development of thinking on force levels in a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq is addressed in Sections 6.4 and 6.5.

463. Mr Bowen sent Mr Hoon's Private Office a fuller analysis of the options for a UK contribution on 25 July.[197] He advised that:

- Some British contributions, such as making available Diego Garcia and the Cyprus bases or employing air and maritime forces already engaged in operations against Iraq, could be achieved quickly.
- It would take another couple of months to increase forces to medium scale.
- "To meet probable US time-scales" it would "not be possible to deploy a fully prepared, fully sustainable armoured division for war-fighting." A fully prepared and sustained armoured division (one which could fight a significant Iraqi force) would take 10 months.
- Deployment of an armoured division (minus) would only be possible "within six months of a decision to deploy", and would have "limited sustainment and reach".

464. The limited UK capability available after six months, with no more than 10 days ammunition and limited reach, could not mount a deliberate attack on large-scale Iraqi forces. The potential strategic advantage would be that the "actual deployment, even the preparation, should have an impact on the Iraqi regime and prevent single focus attention on the US forces in the South". So long as it did not have to engage in all-out "war-fighting", it could be enough to "sow the seeds of uncertainty in the minds of the decision-makers in Baghdad".

465. "In several significant ways," the northern option was "very attractive". It offered the UK the "opportunity to make a discrete contribution to the operation, but it also offers an opportunity to integrate other allies into the operation". It would, however, be "highly challenging" and would require "not only Turkish acquiescence, but also full Turkish support along the line of communication". That would require US involvement.

466. Because "a good proportion of UK maritime and air assets" would be integrated into the wider US effort, the force in the North would need to be confident that support from the US would be available "as and when required". That was an issue that remained to be explored.

467. Mr Bowen also reported that CENTCOM understood the strategic benefit of a UK-led "northern effort", but it was "not yet clear how important it is to their overall plan".

468. Mr Bowen advised Mr Hoon that it was "also assessed as militarily unwise to integrate anything less than a division into the US land component", and that "it would be militarily unattractive to commit UK land forces to US operations from Kuwait."

469. On 26 July, the MOD provided advice on options for a UK contribution to US-led military operations in Iraq in a letter to Mr Rycroft.[198]

470. The MOD advised that US military planning was "in full swing but it was still evolving". The concept was for an attack launched by forces deployed in Kuwait and from other Gulf States and from ships in the Gulf and elsewhere. The plan was "neither fully developed nor finalised". The Chiefs of Staff were "not yet able to judge whether this is a winning concept". Greater clarity would be needed "before any UK option could be recommended".

471. The MOD stated that it was "clear that the US plan of attack from the South" did not "need British land forces":

> "… in the time available there is very little scope for the preparation and integration of British land forces into the US order of battle; moreover the logistic space available in Kuwait, with five divisions worth of equipment and logistics support entering through only one airhead and a single port would already be confined …"

472. Adm Boyce had recommended three options:

- Package 1: an "in-place support package" using forces already in the region.
- Package 2: an "enhanced support package" comprising Package 1 with additional air and maritime forces. This package could include forces that would be "of particular interest to the US because of their own deficiencies, e.g. mine clearance vessels and air-to-air refuellers for their carrier-based aircraft". While no conventional land forces could meet the timescales for the deployment of maritime and air forces "Special Forces could be deployed very rapidly to match US timescales and priorities. This is likely to be very attractive to US planners, and their contribution to success would be significant."

[198] Letter Watkins to Rycroft, 26 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

- Package 3: a "discrete UK package" based on deployment of an armoured division which the MOD envisaged would be used in northern Iraq, in addition to the forces in Package 2. The MOD stated that a force that was "credible" would be required: "Even to create uncertainty in the mind of Saddam", and the contribution of a division "would probably require command and control at Corps level. The UK might consider providing an armoured division either as part of a US-led Corps or as part of a larger coalition force possibly led by the UK using the framework of the NATO Allied Rapid Reaction Corps [ARRC]."[199]

473. The MOD advised:

> "… it would take six months for the whole division to be in place and then with such limited sustainment and reach that it would be unsuitable for a deliberate attack on large-scale Iraqi forces. An optimum capability for a sustained campaign inside Iraq could take about […] to achieve".

474. The MOD also stated that the "deployment of a light brigade with an air mobile capability" was "an additional possibility". That:

> "… would have the task of securing the deployment area in Turkey ahead of the arrival of the full division and preparing for operations short of armoured war fighting. These could involve a role in the Kurdish Autonomous Zone if it were subject to the threat of an Iraqi attack and/or post-conflict operations following the defeat of Iraqi forces. The actual deployment of forces, even their preparation, should have an impact on the Iraqi regime and prevent its single-focus attention on the US forces in the South."

475. The MOD highlighted problems with:

- the concept of a "Running Start";
- the fragility of the logistic chains; and
- vulnerability to chemical or biological weapons.

476. The MOD stated that "thinking about dealing with the aftermath of a successful attack remains sketchy".

477. Finally, the MOD drew attention to the funding which would be required once a decision in principle was made to participate in military activity.

---

[199] Letter Watkins to Rycroft, 26 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

478. Mr Hoon attached "two large caveats" to all three options:

- First, the timescales were "best planning estimates" and made "sweeping assumptions" about basing, transit routes and overflights. They also assumed that funding would be available to improve sustainability and implement UORs.
- Secondly, if the armed forces were required to provide 18,000-20,000 people for an emergency fire service in the event of a nationwide firefighters' strike (Op FRESCO) and the US started military action in winter 2002/3, only the in-place support package and Special Forces would be available.

479. Mr Hoon had commissioned further work with a view to expediting what would need to be done once a decision in principle had been taken. UK representatives at a CENTCOM planning meeting the following week would be instructed "to set our options positively but without committing us to any specific ones". The MOD would write again as soon as there was "greater clarity about the US plan, such that the Chiefs can update their assessment of it (and the risks involved) and the Defence Secretary can make recommendations about the best option to pursue".

480. Copies of the letter were sent to Mr Straw's and the Cabinet Secretary's Private Offices, and to Mr Scarlett.

481. The advice was sent to Mr Blair on 31 July, as one of several "background papers" he had commissioned at his meeting on 23 July "for summer reading".[200]

482. Mr Rycroft commented to Mr Blair:

> "The military are not yet ready to make a recommendation on which if any of the three options to go for. Nor can they yet judge whether the US have a winning concept. They are continuing to work with the US military. You do not need to take decisions yet."

483. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that Mr Blair had said that:

> "… he didn't want to take any decision or accept any of these options. I think in retrospect … this was because … this was the time … when we were pressing for the Americans to consider the UN route. I think he didn't want to give any signal that he was keen to think about a military alternative …"[201]

484. A minute from Mr Hoon's Private Office on 31 July stated:

> "The question of whether funds could be expended in preparation for an operation in Iraq is being considered separately elsewhere."[202]

Developments during August 2002

486. A minute to Sir David Manning on 1 August advised that, with US assets returning from Afghanistan, the coalition was "reasserting control over all the southern No-Fly Zone".[203]

487. At a meeting on 2 August, the UK informed CENTCOM that, while no decision had been taken for action in Iraq, the most obvious option for a UK land contribution was through Turkey. The UK needed more information on what effect was desired and further guidance on the political context.

488. Mr Hoon received a submission from PJHQ on 26 July outlining themes Maj Gen Wilson might use at the CENTCOM meeting on 2 August.[204]

489. When Adm Boyce spoke to both Gen Franks and Gen Myers on 29 July, about Afghanistan and Iraq, he stressed that the UK's input to planning on Iraq was heavily bound with caveats.[205]

490. The record of the discussions reported US interest in both UK participation in the North and the potential contribution from HQ ARRC.

491. On 30 July, an MOD official provided Mr Hoon with a "best estimate" of the equipment enhancements that might be necessary in order to deliver the potential UK force packages.[206]

492. The official reported that there was a shortfall of essential NBC equipment for Packages 1 and 2 that would be required to treat casualties in the event of an Iraqi biological attack. The MOD had "low confidence" that it could be obtained within six months. It could take "up to nine months" to procure certain stocks from industry but further work was needed to identify other possible sources.

493. For Package 3, the MOD had "lower confidence" in the ability to deliver measures for tanks "for the fully sustained war-fighting role", which it judged "would take around ten months". There would also be a shortfall in NBC protection and biological detectors if Package 3 were to be adopted. Further work was being done to see how quickly this could be acquired.

494. The 30 July advice and the response are addressed in Section 6.3.

495. Responding to a request from MOD officials for urgent approval to widen the group involved in contingency planning to improve the estimates of the time and costs of enhancements likely to be needed to support military operations, Mr Hoon concluded that that would be premature.[207]

496. On 30 July, in a meeting with Adm Boyce, Sir Kevin Tebbit, Lt Gen Pigott and Mr Bowen, Mr Hoon discussed the line that Maj Gen Wilson should take in the CENTCOM meeting the following day.[208]

497. Mr Hoon acknowledged that "striking the right tone and balance … was difficult. Ministers would wish the SBMA [Maj Gen Wilson] to be positive without, at this stage, committing the UK to any specific contribution". The draft provided by PJHQ on the northern option "risked over committing us".

498. Mr Hoon concluded that Maj Gen Wilson should warn the US of the political difficulty created by the need, in "the absence of pre-positioned assets", for a move of UK armour to Turkey, which "would have to take place early and be very visible".

499. After considerable debate, an agreed text was sent to Maj Gen Wilson on 1 August, and forwarded to Mr Hoon's Office for information.[209]

500. Maj Gen Wilson's address emphasised that the UK fully understood and sympathised "with the US position on Iraq, and Saddam Hussein", and shared US "concerns about leaving him to develop his WMD aspirations" and the potential threat he posed.[210] The UK was "deeply appreciative of the opportunity to … contribute towards the US … planning process" and had been "working hard to identify forces" that could "in principle" be made available to support the US plan. But he was "bound to reiterate" that the UK had "made no decision in favour of action in Iraq" beyond its involvement in enforcing the No-Fly Zones.

501. Maj Gen Wilson offered "observations" on the US plan, including:

- The UK would be able to build on existing activity and be in support of the US "from Day One". The "fullest possible deployment of maritime, air and SF" could be operational "relatively quickly".
- In relation to land options in the South, "once the logistic in-load has begun" it was "going to be very busy in the South". While it would be "wrong" to make "any definitive judgements" until planning was complete, it was difficult to see how the "UK could contribute". In the time available under "current planning", "integration would also be difficult".

- The UK knew that the US had "been looking at how else land forces might be used", which raised the issue of "Turkey and the … 'northern option'". "To maximise the military prospects of success" that "must be an essential part of your [the US] plan … Indications are that Saddam is expecting something to happen in the North. Why disappoint him and make his decision process easier?"

502. Maj Gen Wilson added that there would be difficulties "particularly for the UK".

- First, it would need "active Turkish support and engagement, not just acquiescence", and there "may be scepticism in UK about whether active Turkish engagement could be delivered".
- Second, the UK "could probably not get there as quickly … as you might want us".

503. Before the UK Government could agree to exploring a military contribution seriously, it was likely to need:

"
- a much more refined mission, with a better understanding of the effects required; and
- a better understanding of the level of US support that will be available."

504. It could be possible to achieve "certain military effects in the North … without pitched battles with the Iraqis", but defeating Iraqi forces on the way to securing the northern oilfields would "probably" require a "heavy Division", and it was "doubtful that that would be possible" within US timescales. The UK had:

"… thought about North, but we have now taken our thinking about as far as it can go without more detail from you. What we now need from you is to know what you really want; and most importantly more on what effect you would want us to achieve."

505. Maj Gen Wilson offered "three other observations":

- Unless political and legal issues were resolved, it would be "difficult to even deliver basic support".
- The UK Government would "find it easier to engage politically" if the campaign was multi-national and, if a multi-national force was considered for the northern option, "that might be a role for the UK-led Allied Rapid Reaction Corps". Multi-nationality brought "complications", but the use of the ARRC HQ would bring advantages, including that it had "already been focused on the region for years" which could "help save deployment time" and could "achieve the combat power for certain tasks more quickly than a purely UK force".

- It would be "helpful … to have a better feel for the 'post-conflict' thinking and aftermath management". The experience of Afghanistan had shown it was "as important to win the peace" as it was to win the war. That was "fresh" in the UK's mind, and it was "undoubtedly true that both UK politicians and … military colleagues would like to know what we are getting ourselves into in the longer term".
- Maj Gen Wilson concluded that the "involvement of significant UK land forces" would be a "challenge". The UK agreed "that the most obvious option" was "through Turkey"; but more information was needed on what effect was desired and "further guidance" was needed "on the political context".

506. Maj General Wilson stated that he could not stress too much that he "would have been shot" if he had extended his brief. There had been "no questions" and he had been "the last to speak".[211] Asked about the reaction to his talk, Maj Gen Wilson told the Inquiry: "Probably 'yoo-hahs' and a few of those delightfully American idiosyncrasies."

507. Lt Gen Reith reported that Gen Franks saw great value in a northern axis led by the UK, but UK preparations needed to begin.

508. Between 5 and 7 August, Lt Gen Reith visited the US Army Central Command (ARCENT) HQ and CENTCOM.[212]

509. Lt Gen Reith reported to ACM Bagnall:

> "The indicators point to CENTCOM being ready to commence operations from about mid-Nov 02, with the main attack to launch from early Jan 03. Gen Franks is keen for strong UK participation. He sees great value in an axis from TU [Turkey] led by UK."

510. There was, however, concern about Turkey's position. If an attack was not possible from the north then the Kurdish oilfields would still need to be secured from the south. Lt Gen Reith reported that Gen Franks had suggested that could also be a "worthwhile discrete task for the UK". There was a general readiness to provide US support if that would make it possible for UK forces to arrive earlier.

511. Lt Gen Reith concluded:

> "With the US clock ticking, from an operational perspective, we ought to start our own. We need political and financial approval as soon as is feasible to prepare, but without committal to deploy. Without this the PM's choices will be limited and he may not be able to fulfil what are clearly high US expectations."

512. Lt Gen Pigott issued military planning guidance on 8 August.

[212] Minute Reith to MA/VCDS, 8 August 2002, 'Visit to ARCENT/CENTCOM 5-7 Aug 02'.

513. Reporting on a meeting held by Lt Gen Pigott on 8 August, Mr Drummond informed Mr McKane that the US seemed:

> "… undecided on the importance of a front in the North … He [Gen Franks] seems to think that a campaign mounted from the South could be sufficient but it would require more resources … MOD will continue with their planning during August using small teams."[213]

514. Lt Gen Pigott issued updated planning guidance for possible military operations in Iraq to Lt Gen Reith and MOD staff on 8 August.[214]

515. Significant points in the guidance included:

- MOD's "planning posture" was "on the basis of being 'as positive as possible' but without implying premature political commitment". Ministers had "not yet authorised any expenditure" on force preparation.
- The impact of Op FRESCO needed to be factored into planning.
- Maintenance of operational security was "critically important". Mr Hoon's "Intent and Direction" [that only named individuals could be involved] was "very clear" and the implications were "understood and accepted".
- PJHQ should focus its effort on the issues which would inform judgements on whether there was a "Winning Mil Strategic Concept/Plan", including:
  - a military plan within an integrated political strategy;
  - intelligence that was "good enough to give high confidence" that the elimination of WMD, the replacement of the regime, post conflict operations and minimising unintended consequences, could be achieved;
  - the strategy for the North was "joined up";
  - an information campaign was "in place and effective";
  - the "Coalition dimension" being "adequately covered";
  - CBRN judgements affecting combat operations were "sound"; and
  - arrangements for logistics, "correlation of forces" and "rear" operations were "sound".
- PJHQ should "Continue to scope" Package 3 scenarios with the US whilst making it clear that was "currently without firm commitment".

516. Updates were to be provided for the Chiefs of Staff "Think Tank" on 6 September.

517. The decision to confine planning to a named list of individuals in the MOD and PJHQ respectively (the "Centurion" and "Warrior" groups), and the detailed planning for UORs which began on 22 August, is addressed in Section 6.3.

518. The MOD reported on 12 August that President Bush had authorised preparatory military activities.

519. The MOD continued to warn No.10 against any assumption that the UK could take the lead in the North within the timelines being considered by the US.

520. A meeting of the US National Security Council was held on 5 August to review what Vice President Cheney described as "the latest iteration of the war plan".[215]

521. Gen Franks described his strategic objective as regime change and his operational objectives as securing the oilfields and water infrastructure, while preventing Iraq's use of long-range missiles and WMD.[216]

522. A letter from Mr Hoon's Private Office to No.10 on 12 August reported that President Bush had authorised preparatory military activities costing US$1bn and that an inter-agency process in Washington had been launched.[217]

523. The MOD reported the emergence of a "hybrid option", combining elements of both the generated and running start plan. The US could be in a position to take action in November and there was:

> "… growing enthusiasm in the US for action in northern Iraq led by the UK … we will need to guard against US assumptions of UK leading ground operations in northern Iraq … General Franks has indicated his interest in seeing the UK lead such forces."

524. Sir David Manning wrote alongside the point above: "An idea our own MOD are v. keen on; may be some ventriloquism here".[218]

525. The MOD advised that the projected timelines for the deployment of a UK division, "albeit with limited sustainment and reach", bore "no relation to the timescale of US plans". It might be possible to reduce deployment times if the US provided support, but the UK would need time for preparation.

526. The MOD concluded:

> "It will be important, therefore, in the coming weeks, to guard against any assumption that the UK will take the lead from the north or could do so on the basis of current US timelines. Apart from the impossibility of making military commitments in advance of political decisions, there are practical constraints, one of which is the potential requirement to provide emergency cover during any fire strike in the autumn – not so far revealed to the US."

JIC ASSESSMENT, 21 AUGUST 2002: 'SADDAM'S DIPLOMATIC AND MILITARY OPTIONS'

527. A JIC Assessment of 21 August concluded that in a conflict Saddam Hussein would order missile strikes and the use of CBW against coalition Forces, supporting regional states and Israel.

528. The JIC had little intelligence on Iraq's CBW and little insight into how it would fight. Its conclusions reflected the Committee's own judgements.

529. At the request of the MOD, the JIC issued an Assessment on 21 August considering "what diplomatic options Saddam has to deter, avert or limit the scope of a US-led attack".[219] It also considered his "military options for facing a US-led attack" and how his analysis about each course of action might "change as an attack becomes increasingly imminent".

530. The JIC examined Iraq's options for the short term, whether Saddam Hussein might seize the initiative, how Iraq might respond to a US military build-up, Saddam's options in "war" – including the use of missiles and WMD and "alternative scenarios and at the death".

531. The JIC's Key Judgements on the military options were:

- Much as Saddam Hussein would like to seize the initiative before a US attack, his options remained limited. He was "likely to be cautious about using force early. But the closer and more credible an attack seemed, the more risks he will be willing to take, perhaps including deniable terrorist attacks, most likely in the Gulf region – though we cannot exclude a threat to the UK."
- "Early on in any conflict, Saddam would order missile attacks on Israel, coalition forces and regional states providing the US with bases."
- "Saddam would order the use of CBW against coalition forces at some point, probably after a coalition attack had begun. Once Saddam was convinced that his fate was sealed, he would order the unrestrained use of CBW against coalition forces, supporting regional states and Israel."
- "Iraq would probably try to ride out air strikes while conserving its ground forces. Iraq's likely strategy for a ground war would be to make any coalition advance as slow and costly as possible, trying to force the coalition to fight in urban areas."
- "There is a significant potential for Saddam to miscalculate, either by escalating a crisis at an early stage, or by making concessions too late in the day to avert an attack."

[219] JIC Assessment, 21 August 2002, 'Iraq: Saddam's Diplomatic and Military Options'.

532. In relation to Saddam Hussein's options for seizing the initiative, the Assessment stated:

- A "concerted attempt" to bring down an aircraft in one of the No-Fly Zones was "a possibility".
- A pre-emptive attack on the Kurds or Kuwait was judged "unlikely".
- Saddam Hussein "would probably … order preparations for a campaign of terrorism and sabotage in the region".
- "… we know that Iraqi Special Forces and other organisations, such as the 'Saddam Fedayeen', also possess the capability to conduct sabotage or terrorist attacks."
- It was "possible that Iraqi terrorist attacks could be conducted against other [non-military] interests or the leadership and economic (e.g. oil industry) targets of regional States".
- The JIC did not "know enough about Iraqi capabilities to discount the threat outside the region, including within the UK, though previously Iraqi attempts to mount terrorist attacks, or engage proxies to do so on their behalf, have been largely ineffective".

533. In relation to missile attacks, the Assessment stated:

- "Saddam would probably order missile attacks …"
- Attacks on Israel would be an attempt to attract Israeli retaliation and thus widen the war, split the Coalition and arouse popular opinion in the Arab States.
- Missiles "could be armed with chemical or biological warfare (CBW) agents".
- "Saddam might be deterred at least initially by the threat of Israeli nuclear retaliation."
- Attacks on coalition forces in Kuwait would require Iraq to deploy short-range missiles into the "No Drive Zone".[220]
- A pre-emptive missile attack on Israel was "less likely because it would show Iraq had been lying about its retention of long range missiles".

534. The Assessment stated that the JIC had:

> "… little insight into how the Iraqi military might plan to fight any ground war … At present we have little evidence to judge whether Iraq sees urban or guerrilla warfare as feasible options. Iraqi effectiveness would be mitigated by problems of command and control, inadequate training and poor morale. We doubt that guerrilla activity would be very effective; urban warfare is more plausible …"

535. The judgements about Saddam Hussein's potential use of chemical and biological weapons are addressed in Section 4.2. The firmness of those judgements, which bear similarities to the assumptions in the 13 June SPG paper, reflected the views of the members of the Committee.

536. The judgements were incorporated in a revised SPG paper produced on 4 September.

537. The assessment of Saddam Hussein's diplomatic options is addressed in Section 3.4.

THE IMPACT OF OPERATION FRESCO

538. From late July it was clear that the possible requirement to provide cover in the event of a nationwide firefighters' strike (Op FRESCO) would limit the UK's ability to deploy ground forces.

539. The MOD continued, however, to promote the advantages of the northern option to both UK Ministers and US military planners.

540. In August UK military planning actively focused on identifying the maximum contribution which the UK might be able to offer to the US.

541. The MOD advised No.10 on 28 August that if Op FRESCO was implemented in full, the UK would be able to provide only a brigade for land operations; and that the US should be informed.

542. During the period leading up to the invasion of Iraq a dispute over pay and conditions with the Fire Brigades Union led to a requirement for an MOD contingency plan, Op FRESCO, to provide a replacement fire-fighting capability to which some 19,000 Service Personnel were assigned.[221]

543. Military advice about the UK's ability to generate ground forces changed radically between the end of July and the end of August. The evidence clearly demonstrates the focus on identifying the "maximum effort" and giving the UK a combat role in ground operations.

544. Mr Hoon was sceptical about the wisdom of that approach and sought to ensure that No.10 was given a more balanced perspective.

545. No.10 was warned on 26 July about the potential impact of a firefighters' strike on the UK's ability to deploy land forces for operations in Iraq.[222]

546. On 22 August, in the context of a predicted discussion between the US and Turkey on a possible northern option, ACM Bagnall commented to Air Vice Marshal Clive Loader, Assistant Chief of the Defence Staff (Operations) (ACDS(Ops)), that a MOD meeting held on 21 August had concluded:

---

[221] Report MOD, Operations in Iraq: First Reflections, July 2003.
[222] Letter Watkins to Rycroft, 26 July 2002, 'Iraq'.

> "… we will need to decide whether we wish to influence US planning in developing any northern option. This may well be necessary sooner rather than later."[223]

547. The MOD has been unable to provide any record of the meeting on 21 August.[224]

548. On 27 August, Dr Cholerton sent Mr Hoon an update on Iraq-related developments, including the potential impact of Op FRESCO.[225]

549. Dr Cholerton reviewed recent political and diplomatic developments and its understanding of US planning, including that:

> "Operations in Northern Iraq are increasingly seen by the US planners as highly desirable and an important addition to the campaign plan. The overwhelming effect of simultaneous action against Saddam is one of the principal features of the campaign design. It is increasingly accepted that action in the North would play an important part in that; adding a significant additional complication he will have to overcome."

550. In relation to the UK's ability to deploy forces while supporting Op FRESCO, Dr Cholerton advised that "a more refined set of force packages", which would be "more flexible in composition" was being developed; and that the position was "significantly better" than the MOD had reported to No.10 on 26 July. Further work had shown it would be possible to produce Package 2 if a firefighters' strike lasted no longer than three months. That package could include substantial maritime and air capabilities and Special Forces. The ability to deploy a Royal Marine Commando Group after October 2002 was included in an Annex showing an "illustrative" Package 3.

551. If negotiations with the Fire Brigades Union broke down and a decision was taken to begin full-scale training for Op FRESCO, it would not be possible to deploy a division, but it would be possible to release forces for a single brigade tailored to operational needs. That would fall well short of the contribution required to enable the UK to carry out a "discrete" role in the North.

552. A smaller contribution could raise "some of the integration issues which led the Chiefs of Staff to view our offering conventional land forces for operations in southern Iraq as impractical". The UK would, however, continue to "explore ideas of how such a contribution could be made to work alongside other potential partners and drawing heavily on US goodwill and resources".

553. There were suspicions that US planners continued to believe that the UK could deliver a division if it were supported by the US, although there were "signs" that it was "looking at the provision of US forces" if the UK could not provide a division. A draft planning directive to EUCOM, who would be responsible for the northern option, tasked it to provide logistic support for a division-sized force, either coalition or US only.

554. Dr Cholerton advised Mr Hoon that it would be "important to guard against any false assumptions the US might make about the UK's potential contribution to any military action". The UK should explain the consequences of Op FRESCO to the US once a decision had been taken to commence training.

555. In relation to forthcoming US/Turkish discussions in Washington, the UK had made it clear to the US that:

> "… in advance of UK political decisions, it would be wrong to discuss potential UK participation in ground operations from Turkey with the Turkish General Staff."

556. Commenting on a draft of the advice to Mr Hoon, a civilian in PJHQ had pointed out that "a discrete UK option need not necessarily mean a northern attack through Turkey".[226]

557. On 28 August, the MOD's revised assessment of the implications of Op FRESCO was set out in a letter to Sir David Manning.[227]

558. The MOD also stated that Mr Hoon:

> "… considers it particularly important that we guard against any false assumptions that the US might make about the UK's potential contribution to any military action … Explaining the impact … to the US would … serve to focus US planners on the real practical limitations we would face, were political decisions taken to join the US in military action."

559. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Powell that he was not clear where the Fire Brigades issue stood; and that he would be "grateful for a word ab[ou]t what to say to Washington and when".[228]

PJHQ ADVICE, 30 AUGUST 2002

560. PJHQ reported on 30 August that Land Command believed it would be able to deploy a division.

561. PJHQ also identified the risks associated with the northern option.

562. On 30 August, Lt Gen Reith submitted an update on the timelines for deploying a division (minus) to Lt Gen Pigott.[229]

563. On the same day, Maj Gen Fry provided advice for the Chiefs of Staff, reviewing planning for operations in Iraq as requested by Lt Gen Pigott on 8 August.[230]

564. Maj Gen Fry reported that the US was now working on a "hybrid option", which contained elements of both the running and generated start. The "importance of the development of an axis in the North is now fully recognised", and a contingency plan was being developed to commit significant US forces, possibly in addition to any coalition contributions.

565. The most significant development was that Land Command now believed it could deploy HQ ARRC, HQ 1st (UK) Armoured Division, one triangular brigade, 16 Air Assault Brigade and a logistic brigade some 124 days after a political decision to allow overt preparations for deployment. There would be some risk to the UK's ability to deploy forces in 2004:

> "… the overall penalties … would be severe, some roulement tour lengths would be extended to 12 months and the generation of armoured and mechanised HR [High Readiness] forces in [20]04 would be put at risk."

566. Maj Gen Fry advised that:

- "The northern approach offers the opportunity for greatest effect but probably carries the highest risk."
- If a northern option for a land package was not viable, a western approach through Jordan could offer "very similar effects at less risk".
- "A timely effect in the South could probably only be achieved by the ARG [Amphibious Ready Group] in support of the US MEF [Marine Expeditionary Force]."

567. The risks of the northern approach were listed in an Annex as:

- The need to be deployed in time to secure parts of the oilfields around Kirkuk from Iraqi destruction.
- The weather from January to March could severely restrict air operations.
- The distance to be travelled overland would be more than 1,000km.
- The terrain would constrain manoeuvre and considerable US engineer support would be needed to cross the river Tigris.
- Long lines of communication and challenges to sustainability.

568. The paper invited the Chiefs of Staff to agree that potential UK force contributions could be exposed to US planners to inform the CENTCOM planning conference scheduled for 23 September; and that, if the UK was "to retain a claim to leadership in the North then we must participate in the forthcoming CENTCOM/EUCOM recces in Turkey".

569. On 31 August, Maj Gen Wilson reported to Adm Boyce that "CENTCOM clearly hope the UK will run with" the northern option.[231] He advised:

> "Whilst I am continually reinforcing the UK policy line to US colleagues in CENTCOM (discreet planning and scoping, but without political endorsement or commitment), the demands of US operational planning necessitate input on UK planning data and separately, our intent for key evolutions [activities] such as ground recces to Turkey and [Exercise] Internal Look. In terms of expectation management, and without over stating it as seen from here, the time for putting more UK military cards on the CENTCOM/EUCOM tables (caveated as necessary) is fast approaching."

570. Maj Gen Wilson also reported that he had been asked about Op FRESCO, and its potential impact on the UK's ability to contribute to Iraq, which he had "played long".

Preparations for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, Camp David

571. Despite military advice that the UK might be able to deploy HQ ARRC and "division-scale forces", Mr Hoon advised continued caution about the UK's ability to deploy land forces.

572. No decision on a possible UK military contribution to US operations was taken before the meeting with President Bush, but the MOD advised that there could be a need for tough decisions within two weeks.

573. Mr Blair decided that the UK should not inform the US about the potential impact of Op FRESCO at that stage.

574. The discussions between the UK and US on the policy on Iraq, Mr Blair's press conference in Sedgefield on 3 September, and the decision that he and President Bush would meet at Camp David on 7 September following a meeting of the National Security Council which would have been briefed by Gen Franks, are addressed in Section 3.4.

575. In response to the MOD advice of 28 August, Mr Blair's view, as reported on 3 September by Sir David Manning, was for "nothing to be said to the US about Op FRESCO for the moment".[232] Mr Blair hoped it would be possible to discuss the issues with Mr Hoon the following week before he flew to Washington.

576. Reporting an MOD meeting on 3 September to Mr Straw, Mr Stephen Wright, FCO Deputy Under Secretary Defence and Intelligence, stated that, in the MOD's view, the Pentagon's plans had not firmed up significantly during August.[233] It was still working on the basis of a December to February window for military action. Because of continuing uncertainties, including over Turkey, the MOD did not feel able to advise Ministers whether the US had a "winning concept".

577. Mr Wright also wrote that the MOD "sense a mounting desire on the part of US military planners to learn more about the possible levels of UK force commitments".

SPG PAPER, 4 SEPTEMBER 2002

578. A revised version of the SPG paper 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq' was produced on 4 September.[234] The paper contained significant new analysis about the US intentions and their implications for UK planning.

579. The SPG assessed that the US had "sufficient combat power to destabilise, and overthrow the current Iraqi regime" by itself, but it required a "minimum coalition" to provide basing and transit, including use of UK bases in Cyprus and Diego Garcia. The paper also set out the current CENTCOM concept and plan, including an assessment that "shaping operations" (described as including a "series of activities designated as spikes by the US", which were "intended to progressively increase the level and tempo of military activity") had "already begun" and the UK was "implicated in their conduct".

580. A number of key issues would "need to be resolved" to evaluate the design of the campaign. Those included:

- avoiding a tactical victory at the cost of strategic failure;
- determining the "strategic effect" the UK was seeking from participation in the campaign;
- demonstrating "US/UK solidarity (delivering the Special Relationship)";
- adding "value through sharing the planning burden, and acting as a moderating influence" on the US; and
- demonstrating that the UK was "an active, determined and capable nation by making an operationally significant contribution, in a discrete role that satisfies a clear military objective".

581. The potential UK strategic objectives identified by the SPG were to:

- Stand alongside the US as a junior partner, sharing both the strategic and operational risks and burdens, to:
  - preserve the Atlantic Alliance; and
  - encourage the US to continue to exercise its power via established international bodies and norms.

---

[234] Paper [SPG], 4 September 2002, 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq'.

- Remove the threat that any Iraqi regime may pose to the UK, UK interests and regional stability through its failure to comply with international law and agreements. That implied:
  - verifiable destruction of Iraq's WMD capability; and
  - establishing a regime that had the trust of the international community.
- Reintegrate Iraq into the international community.
- Support and where possible enhance regional stability. That implied:
  - preventing the establishment of a Shia dominated Islamic fundamentalist state; and
  - ensuring the impact of military operations was "at the very minimum … neutral in terms of regional stability".
- Prevent the Iraqi regime from perpetrating further humanitarian disasters.
- Enhance the security of the UK's long-term economic interests, including oil supplies.

582. The SPG defined the UK's "Military Strategic Objectives" as:

- provide US Commanders "with support necessary for the execution of [the] approved campaign plan, focusing first on delivery of critical capabilities";
- assist the US to create conditions to deny Iraq's ability to use its WMD;
- create conditions for a changed Iraqi regime;
- create conditions to strengthen regional security and stability; and
- assist US forces in securing Iraq's oil infrastructure and production facilities.

583. Other key points in the paper included:

- No clear picture had "yet emerged" on how the US planned to "effect … regime change (other than … military defeat and subsequent elimination of Saddam Hussein".
- Iraq was experienced with chemical weapons and had experimented with biological weapons. There was "every reason" to believe they would be used if regime survival was threatened.
- US and UK policies on a "deterrent response to Iraqi first use of WMD" needed to be reviewed.
- There was a need to determine what would constitute "success for an inspection regime".
- Package 3 was defined as including "UK Force Elements with a discrete role in the North, within an integrated US-led campaign".
- The risk analysis was based on the provision of a division (minus).
- An illustrative force package included a Royal Marine Commando Group which would be available after October as part of the maritime element, an armoured division including two square armoured brigades, and a light "Air Assault capable" brigade.

584. The SPG advised that, in the absence of clear post-conflict plans, the potential scale of the UK military engagement remained unknown. In the worst case, the UK needed to be prepared for "a substantial long-term commitment".

585. The SPG's conclusions on post-conflict issues are addressed in Section 6.4.

586. The SPG concluded that the "key military question" which had to be addressed was: "Is there a winning military concept and plan?"

587. The paper set out lists of the conditions that would need to be met for the UK to answer yes, and the reasons why the UK should not offer to participate in the CENTCOM plan.

588. The Chiefs of Staff met on 4 and 6 September, but no discussion of the military options for Iraq is recorded in the minutes.[235]

MOD ADVICE, 6 SEPTEMBER 2002

589. Sir David Manning asked the MOD for advice in preparation for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Camp David on 7 to 8 September.[236]

590. An initial draft of the advice, submitted by Dr Cholerton, described the meeting at Camp David as "to discuss Iraq", the possibility of an ultimatum to Iraq on the return of weapons inspectors, and Mr Blair's candid reference the previous day to regime change and the planned publication of a dossier (see Section 3.4).[237]

591. Dr Cholerton advised that further work in PJHQ and Land Command suggested it might be possible to generate "up to 'division scale' forces … 4 months after an overt political decision" as well as HQ ARRC; and that the Chiefs of Staff would look at whether the US military plan would deliver the UK's desired end state.

592. Dr Cholerton advised that Mr Blair "should be cautious in discussing UK's ability to contribute to military capability" with President Bush.

593. Mr Hoon requested further advice on the costs of the packages and the number of personnel involved.[238]

594. On 5 September, Mr Hoon discussed the draft letter to No.10 with Adm Boyce, Sir Kevin Tebbit, Lt Gen Pigott, Maj Gen Fry and Mr Ian Lee, who had replaced Mr Bowen as MOD Director General Operational Policy.[239]

595. The note of the meeting recorded that they concluded there was now slightly more clarity on the window for military action (then considered to be between December 2002 and May 2003), and the possibility of a simultaneous entry into Iraq from the north and south. The Chiefs of Staff were not yet in a position to determine if the US had a winning concept, and were focused on the ability to mount an operation from the north.

596. Mr Hoon pointed to the complication resulting from the shift in the diplomatic context, which raised the question of the "necessity or otherwise to move assets" while the UN process was under way "and before Parliament returned in mid-October". That "was especially acute for Package 3". A requirement to support Op FRESCO "effectively precluded our offering a fully capable fighting division". That meant that the UK should assume that the US would deploy its 4th Infantry Division to the North. It would be difficult to integrate UK forces with that Division; the Chiefs of Staff would "consider whether we could offer some land force components of a larger coalition" force in the North. Even Package 2 would require early decisions on UORs, including desertisation of equipment.

597. In Mr Hoon's view, the draft advice for No.10 underplayed "the scale of the contribution provided by Package 2 and the degree of influence which it would give us on US military planning".

598. Mr Blair discussed the UK's military contribution with Mr Hoon on 5 September.[240] Mr Straw was also present.

599. Mr Watkins recorded that Mr Blair, Mr Hoon and Mr Straw had discussed the packages, and that Mr Hoon had highlighted the benefits of Package 2. "No decisions were taken" and Mr Blair "did not expect President Bush to commit himself imminently to a military campaign".

600. Mr Watkins also recorded that Mr Hoon had met Mr Brown to discuss the options and alert him to the likely costs of Package 2.

601. There was no No.10 record of the meeting.

602. Mr Lee provided a revised letter to No.10, advising caution because the advice had been "assembled in a short space of time from a necessarily limited group".[241]

603. Mr Watkins responded that Mr Hoon had asked for the letter to be recast to explain more fully why the UK was not able to offer a fully capable division; and that the possibility of a land "Task Force" should be more heavily caveated as Mr Hoon remained "of the view that we should not offer now more than we are certain we can deliver".[242] Mr Hoon also asked for a reference to be included to the fact that a land task force would "lend itself to involving other countries should they so wish". He would consider the text again the following day.

604. On 6 September, Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning, providing an update on US military planning and "the factors informing decisions on any UK military contribution".[243] He cautioned that the MOD's assessment was "necessarily provisional", partly because the US plan was still evolving, and partly because there had not yet been "detailed joint planning with the US".

605. The MOD had identified three options ranging from minimum to maximum effort. That included a further revision of the impact of Op FRESCO, which meant that:

> "Were we to throw in everything we are likely to have, the UK could potentially generate up to a divisional headquarters, an armoured brigade, 16 Air Assault Brigade and a logistic brigade".

606. The MOD was also "examining whether a Royal Marine Commando Group could form part of Package 2 [the air and maritime forces packages]".

607. A land task force would "offer significant capability to a US-led northern force, although it would not be fully suitable for involvement in decisive war-fighting operations". It would also require switching units assigned to Op FRESCO training, and visible activity such as the call-out of "hundreds of key Reservist personnel". A decision to commit all those elements (some 40,000 personnel, of whom 10,000 could be Reservists) would have "wide-ranging downstream consequences".

608. The MOD cautioned "against betting the whole store in this way on one operation", and urged continued caution in discussing "the scale of UK's ability to contribute military capability".

609. Mr Watkins stated that, "even were [Op] FRESCO to end soon, we could not provide a self-standing division within US timescales" of having an offensive capability in place in the Gulf by December/January. He continued:

> "There would simply not be enough time to carry out the preparations we would need to make. We would not have enough time to engage industry in order to improve sustainability (ammunition, etc) and implement UORs to optimise forces for the theatre and interoperability with the US."

[243] Letter Watkins to Manning, 6 September 2002, 'Iraq: Military Planning'.

610. The MOD reported that US planners increasingly considered operations from Turkey were "integral to the success of the campaign plan" (earlier drafts said "key"), although the US Joint Chiefs of Staff had yet to be briefed on this plan.

611. The MOD also drew attention to the "sketchy" post-conflict plans and the importance of keeping in mind the US timetable when identifying the potential contribution the UK might offer and the influence it was hoped to bring.

612. The MOD advice concluded that, should "US military preparations continue at their current pace, we will face some early tough decisions within two weeks of your return from Camp David".

613. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Sir Andrew Turnbull, who became Cabinet Secretary in September 2002, and to Mr Desmond Bowen, who succeeded Mr McKane as Deputy Head of OD Sec.

614. On 5 September, Lt Gen Pigott's staff also provided Adm Boyce with a list of key questions he might pose to Gen Myers and the Supreme Allied Commander Europe (SACEUR, a NATO post held by a US commander, who also commands EUCOM), to inform the UK's thinking and assess the merits of US plans.[244]

615. The questions included:

- the robustness of the plan to withstand a CBRN attack and the lines of communications to withstand asymmetric attack;
- whether the northern axis was fundamental to the US plan;
- if the US required a UK ground forces presence, would it be prepared to wait;
- US views on the length of post-conflict engagement;
- regional reactions; and
- the best and worst post-conflict outcome they envisaged.

616. The MOD has been unable to find a record of Adm Boyce's discussions.[245]

617. On 5 September, Maj Gen Wilson told Maj Gen Fry that Gen Franks was "comfortable" with having US troops under UK command; and that he saw "more political attraction in UK, rather than the US leading 'in the North'".[246]

618. Lt Gen Pigott accompanied Mr Blair on his visit to Camp David.[247]

Attack in Iraq, 5 September 2002

In response to hostile acts against Coalition aircraft monitoring the southern No-Fly Zone, US aircraft, with UK aircraft in support, attacked an Iraqi air defence facility in western Iraq on 5 September, prompting press speculation that it was a prelude to Special Forces attacks and more general military action.[248]

The outcome of the meeting at Camp David

619. Mr Blair cautioned President Bush about his assumption that the UK would be ready to lead a strike into northern Iraq. But he told President Bush that the UK would take a significant military role if it came to war with Iraq.

620. Mr Blair told Mr Hoon that he had been alarmed by the US expectations that the UK would lead the northern axis and there should be no visible preparations for a month or so. But Mr Hoon was not sent a copy of Sir David Manning's record of the discussions at Camp David.

621. Mr Blair met President Bush and Vice President Cheney at Camp David on 7 September.[249]

622. Before his meeting with Mr Blair, President Bush held a meeting of his National Security Council at Camp David which was given a briefing by Gen Franks, who introduced his concept of a campaign comprising five simultaneous "operational fronts" in Iraq.[250]

623. The meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush, the press conference which preceded it, and President Bush's decision to take the issue of Iraq to the UN, are addressed in Section 3.4.

624. In relation to the discussion at Camp David on military action, Mr Blair said that he was in no doubt about the need to deal with Saddam Hussein; and that the likelihood was that this would mean military action at some point:

> "If it came to force, we could hope that we would secure the relatively quick overthrow of Saddam. But even if we did, we would, still be faced with the big issue of what followed his departure."[251]

625. President Bush and Mr Blair discussed the prospects for a military campaign, including the possibility of leaving Saddam Hussein "bottled up" in Baghdad.

626. Sir David Manning recorded that Mr Blair expressed caution about the US assumption that the UK would be ready to lead a strike from Turkey into northern Iraq and provide two thirds of the force. But Mr Blair had emphasised that the UK would indeed take "a significant military role" if it came to war with Iraq.

627. Mr Hoon was not sent Sir David Manning's record of Mr Blair's discussion with President Bush.[252]

628. Mr Blair telephoned Mr Hoon on the evening of 8 September, to give him a read-out of his discussions with President Bush and Vice President Cheney, and the US position on the UN route, in advance of Mr Hoon's visit to the US.[253]

629. Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Blair said:

> "… he had been alarmed that [President] Bush had understood that the UK would be 'leading the invasion' from the North of Iraq. This required very careful handling. Having received the military advice, the Prime Minister's view was that we could not offer Package 3 in the timescale required and given the constraints of Operation Fresco. But we might be able to offer Package 2, plus some further elements. There should be no visible preparations for a month or so."

630. A minute from Mr Hoon's office to Sir David Manning on 12 September reported that, following the discussion, Mr Hoon had taken "a small number of decisions", related to participation in US planning and exercises "necessary to keep these options open".[254] They included:

- a reconnaissance visit to Turkey;
- preparations for participation in Exercise Internal Look, a US exercise to develop command arrangements for any future military operation against Iraq, including a visit to Qatar, pending a final decision on participation; and
- participation in a CENTCOM planning conference starting on 23 September, at which it would be necessary to define, without commitment, the detail of any military involvement.

631. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Powell and Mr Rycroft: "Looks OK".[255]

632. There is no evidence which explains how President Bush was advised that the UK would play a leading role in the North in the event of an invasion. The most likely routes would have been the briefings from Gen Franks on 5 August or the briefing of the National Security Council before Mr Blair's arrival at Camp David on 7 September.

633. The Inquiry can only conclude that the US understanding was based on military discussions over the summer; and that it would have reinforced the messages that had been reported in the late spring of 2002.

JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002

634. The JIC issued an Assessment of Iraq's possession of chemical and biological weapons and possible scenarios for their use on 9 September.

635. Following Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July, Sir David Manning asked Mr Scarlett for further advice on Saddam Hussein's military capabilities and intentions, in particular in relation to the possible use of chemical and biological agents.[256]

636. The JIC Assessment was issued on 9 September.[257] The Key Judgements stated:

- Iraq has a chemical and biological weapons capability and Saddam is prepared to use it.
- Faced with the likelihood of military defeat and being removed from power, Saddam is unlikely to be deterred from using chemical and biological weapons by any diplomatic or military means.
- The use of chemical and biological weapons prior to any military attack would boost support for US-led action and is unlikely.
- Saddam is prepared to order missile strikes against Israel, with chemical or biological warheads, in order to widen the war once hostilities begin.
- Saddam could order the use of CBW weapons in order to deny space and territory to Coalition forces, or to cause casualties, slow any advance, and sap US morale.
- If not previously employed, Saddam will order the indiscriminate use of whatever CBW weapons remain available late in a ground campaign or as a final act of vengeance. But such an order would depend on the availability of delivery means and the willingness of commanders to obey."

637. The Assessment and the basis for its judgements are addressed in Section 4.2.

Decisions to offer ground forces to the US for planning purposes

MOD planning for a UK land contribution, September 2002

638. Reflecting the discussion with Mr Blair on 8 September, Mr Hoon told Secretary Rumsfeld on 11 September that the UK would not want to offer more than it could deliver and was therefore expecting to offer maritime and air assets for any military campaign.

639. MOD planning for a land contribution and discussions with the US continued.

640. Lt Gen Reith continued to report a military perception that the US wanted a UK-led force in the North.

641. In preparation for Mr Hoon's meeting with Secretary Rumsfeld on 11 September, Dr Cholerton provided a list of questions seeking clarification on a number of issues.[258] He identified Turkey's attitude and the US perspective on the northern option as "the key points" on which "more clarity" was needed from the US.

642. In a meeting with Mr Hoon on 11 September, Secretary Rumsfeld raised the firefighters' strike.[259] Mr Hoon explained that, partly for this reason but also because "movement of UK ground force assets could become visible prematurely in relation to the diplomatic/UN process", the UK would not want to offer more than it could deliver and was therefore expecting to offer maritime and air assets for any military campaign.

643. On 12 September, Lt Gen Reith submitted further advice to Lt Gen Pigott on "the UK component options available to contribute to US action in decisive operations against Iraq".[260]

644. Lt Gen Reith provided a detailed analysis of the individual components which could contribute to the operation and the assumptions surrounding them. He understood that the Chiefs of Staff were now content with the UK Special Forces, air and maritime contributions. He focused on the land component, where a decision was "now required". A number of factors were considered, of which "US requirements" were judged to be the "most important".

645. Lt Gen Reith identified a spectrum of options from the deployment of a Royal Marine Commando Group with the Amphibious Response Group for operations in the Gulf to a divisional headquarters with a square armoured brigade and 16 Air Assault Brigade for operations in northern Iraq. The emphasis was on options to be used in the North, although Lt Gen Reith stated:

> "… a contribution could still be offered (albeit under significant constraints) for use … in the South, if movement through Tu[rkey] became politically unacceptable."

646. Lt Gen Reith recommended an option to deploy a UK divisional HQ and an armoured brigade comprising three battalions or regiments (a "triangular" brigade) alongside a US brigade:

> "This option best balances the key requirements of providing a worthwhile military contribution, with appropriate political profile, although above the target figure of 20,000."

647. Adm Boyce asked in a manuscript comment:

> "How is this conclusion reached? There is no analysis of the pluses and minuses of the options and the extent to which they meet essential criteria."[261]

648. Lt Gen Reith also wrote: "It is perceived that CENTCOM would prefer the land operation in the North to be commanded at the tactical level by the UK."[262]

649. Adm Boyce questioned in a manuscript comment: "Has he asked for this or is it an assumption?"[263]

650. Lt Gen Reith submitted revised advice on 13 September, which recommended the deployment of a square brigade comprising two armoured regiments and two armoured infantry battalions.[264] He also stated that Gen Frank's "strong preference" was for the UK "to provide the tactical lead for the North".

651. There was no explanation in the paper for the revised recommendation.

652. Knowledge of the consideration of military options continued to be kept to a very tight group of people and the sensitivities about potential leaks remained.

653. Mr Drummond alerted Sir David Manning on 16 September to a prospective request from the MOD on military options. He had advised that the "PM would want first sight"; and that No.10 would advise on circulation.[265]

654. In response to the minute which Mr Drummond had classified "Confidential", Sir David Manning commented: "Please ensure all minuting is Secret and Personal – and keep circulation to [the] barest minimum."[266]

655. Although significant concerns were identified about the viability of an operation through Turkey, the northern option remained the preference of the Chiefs of Staff.

656. Military planners also advised that deployment of anything above a small scale land force would commit the UK to three medium scale operations.

657. In the event of the deployment of UK land forces, there was a judgement to be made on whether the UK military should be engaged in the conflict or post-conflict phase. Both would be difficult to sustain.

658. Adm Boyce noted that it was "inconceivable" that the UK military would not contribute "in some manner" to post-conflict tasks.

659. A commentary on the military options, seeking judgements and decisions from the Chiefs of Staff to inform Ministerial decisions, was prepared by the SPG on 19 September.[267]

660. The SPG reported that US military planners and the Joint Staff in Washington had made it clear that the UN process would "not derail their current planning timelines" although it was clear that "political developments may yet overtake the military's contingency work".

661. The SPG identified continuing uncertainties in the potential shape and timing of a campaign and the Chiefs of Staff view was that it was not "yet" a winning concept:

- The northern option was not yet "firmly established as a viable axis" because of uncertainties about Turkey and the logistic feasibility of the operation. The Chiefs of Staff would "wish to assess whether there is yet sufficient operational emphasis being place upon it for the UK to commit forces".
- The [US] timelines determining UK "deadlines" were based on offering President Bush "the earliest opportunity for action, as opposed to 'the last safe moment' for a decision".
- There was no clear articulation of post-conflict scenarios and their demands.
- The UN track might "delay rather than advance decisions on the legality of any potential action".

[266] Manuscript comment Manning on Minute Drummond to Manning, 16 September 2002, 'Iraq: Pigott Meeting'.
[267] Paper SPG, 19 September 2002, 'Iraq Package Options – Military Strategy Commentary'.

662. A Royal Marine Commando Group deployed with the Amphibious Response Group offered "a high readiness, flexible small scale land contribution" which presented "an opportunity for 'boots on the ground' if the UK decision [was] not to commit beyond Package 2".

663. The SPG identified the land element of Package 3 as on "the critical path for both UK and US planning". It was clear from contacts with the US that there was:

> "… an expectation of UK ground force commitment, and although there is a genuine willingness to facilitate our being there, this is not without limit."

664. The section headed "Conflict vs Post-conflict" asked whether, if UK forces were to participate in the military campaign, "our effort should be against the need to meet US short-term planning for combat, or the equally demanding and pressing need for preparations for the post-conflict phase". It continued:

> "Conflict phase. Commitment to this phase may carry with it inherent risks with regard to post-conflict engagement with little choice on role, timing, location, or future extraction. An alternative approach that offers a UK lead, or UK participation in the post-conflict phase may be equally attractive to the US as our commitment to a land role in the conflict phase.
> "Post-Conflict. Given the wide range of possible post-conflict scenarios these forces would have to be combat capable forces at high readiness, and in all probability with key elements forward deployed during the conflict phase. The length and scale of our post-conflict commitment will determine our ability to fulfil a range of other operations, and most notable our Balkan commitment. An enduring medium scale commitment in Iraq would preclude continued medium scale engagement in the Balkans.
> "Strategic Balance. We are currently committed to two medium scale land operations (FRESCO and the Balkans), and a land commitment to Iraq at anything above small scale will commit us to three medium scale land operations. Although with a full Package 3 commitment to the conflict phase we retain the SLE [Spearhead Land Element], our ability to deploy and sustain even a small scale force package has yet to be determined, and anything above this Scale of Effort will be impossible … Recovery and recuperation will also be key to our judgements as to which phase to commit to. Hard and fast judgements are not possible, however, commitment of Package 3 will have an effect for at least two years."

665. The SPG concluded:

> "Assuming that UK land participation is a requirement, there is a judgement to be made on whether we should be engaged in the conflict or post-conflict phases. Both would be difficult to sustain."

666. The SPG recorded that the Chiefs of Staff had:

> "… already voiced clear reservations over the integration of substantial UK land forces in the southern theatre. Therefore, if we are to be engaged in combat operations the US and UK military preference is that we should be in northern Iraq."

667. The SPG identified a number of concerns, including:

- The "evident" complexities of the command relationship between CENTCOM and EUCOM, "against the need to deliver a compliant Turkey".
- The inability to conduct a detailed reconnaissance created a "significant risk".
- Northern Iraq was "a difficult area politically". Turkey still remembered the UK's role in creating an Iraq which included Mosul "and its associated oilfields". The Kurds remembered the UK's assistance in Op HAVEN [in 1991], but were "equally quick to remember that it was the RAF that effectively suppressed a number of Kurdish revolts". There was a "real danger that post conflict the UK, simply through our force location, would retain the 'lead' in the North, thereby splitting our lines of communication [with other forces in the Gulf] … and placing us in an intractable position for some time".

668. The SPG confirmed that there was "broad agreement between MOD and PJHQ staffs" on the option recommended by PJHQ.

669. Also on 19 September, the Chiefs of Staff discussed a draft submission to Mr Hoon circulated by Lt Gen Pigott.[268]

670. The minutes of the COS discussion recorded that "a simultaneous advance of forces in the southern and northern axes [would be] key to overwhelming the Iraqi decision making process"; and that Gen Franks "strongly favoured a UK-led force in the North" as an alternative to deploying a US infantry division.

671. A "Package 4" was being developed "to address the inevitable post-conflict tasks". Adm Boyce commented that it was "inconceivable that the UK would not contribute in some manner, to those tasks".

672. Lt Gen Reith strongly recommended offering a limited version of Option 3: a land option of a divisional headquarters and a square armoured brigade (with four battalions or regiments) operating alongside a US formation.

673. Gen Walker expressed some misgivings. Although the force package was about right, he "did not believe the plan as currently envisaged, to be a viable concept". He was concerned about the semi-autonomous nature of the UK forces and integration with the US as envisaged, the lack of an operational reserve, assumptions on Iraq combat capability, and the reliance on air power.

---

[268] Minutes, 19 September 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

674. Lt Gen Reith stated that it would be "easier, militarily, to ratchet down than ratchet up any forces offered", but the "COS acknowledged that it might be unattractive politically,[269] to deliver less than that which had initially been offered".

675. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that the package recommended by Lt Gen Reith was a viable option, subject to resolving the constraints which had been identified; and that an armoured brigade represented the smallest force that could act autonomously.

676. Lt Gen Reith told the Inquiry:

> "I got a briefing on the northern option from my own staff on the 18 September, having done operational analysis on it, and it was clear that we couldn't do it on our own, even with a full division."[270]

677. When Mr Hoon discussed the options with his most senior advisers later that day, Adm Boyce told him that there was "clearer [US] understanding of the importance of operations in northern Iraq to 'fix' Iraqi forces".[271] Gen Franks had indicated that it would be "helpful if the UK could provide in the North an armoured brigade and a 2-star tactical lead" which would command US forces.

678. Adm Boyce added that the Chiefs of Staff had continuing doubts about whether the US had a winning concept.

679. When Package 3 was discussed, Mr Hoon requested clarification of the length of time necessary to deploy a land contribution.

680. Adm Boyce said that early decisions would be needed on UORs, reserves and units which were allocated to Op FRESCO. Package 3 would also require a "£1bn premium", which "could exhaust the Reserve".

681. Mr Hoon agreed that, subject to No.10's agreement, Lt Gen Reith would be able to indicate to CENTCOM, for planning purposes and with the caveat that no final political decision had been taken, that two separate UK contributions could potentially be available:

- Package 2, which offered a "significant and useful contribution to any US led action"; and
- Package 3 as a possible add-on, with guidance that the US should also plan without it.

682. Mr Hoon also asked for a detailed breakdown of the estimated costs of UORs for a meeting with Mr Brown on 23 September.

[269] The Inquiry considers this to be a reference to the potential impact on US/UK relations, not a comment on the views of politicians.
[270] Private hearing, 15 January 2010, page 23
[271] Minute Watkins to PSO/CDS, 19 September 2002, 'Iraq: Potential UK Contribution to any US-led Action'.

683. On 20 September, the MOD sought Mr Blair's agreement to offer Package 3 as a "possible add-on" to CENTCOM "for planning purposes".

684. On 20 September, Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning, advising that two issues needed quickly to be addressed:

- what potential UK force contribution should be presented to a US planning conference the following week; and
- whether to replace army units already allocated to Op FRESCO so that they would be available if a land force contribution was approved.[272]

685. The MOD proposed that the air and maritime package with Special Forces (Package 2), should be presented as a potential UK contribution at the CENTCOM planning conference; and that further work was under way on whether the UK might also offer a Commando Group of around 1,700 Royal Marines for early operations in southern Iraq. It would need to be established whether that could be sustained in parallel with ground operations in the North.

686. The MOD had also considered the provision of a divisional headquarters together with an armoured brigade to operate with the US (Package 3). That would be "more complicated", but the Chiefs of Staff regarded that as the "minimum sensible" ground contribution to operations in the North. It would entail a commitment of around 28,000 service personnel in addition to the 13,000 in Package 2, and the call-out of around 6,000 Reservists – a decision that would need to be taken and announced in mid-October.

687. Mr Watkins told Sir David that Mr Hoon felt it would be "premature" to offer a ground contribution on the same basis as Package 2:

> "… we should indicate to CENTCOM that we are still considering this option and that they should model two plans in parallel, one including the UK land force contribution and one without it."

688. Mr Watkins also wrote that a "publicly visible measure" to remove units from Op FRESCO would be needed to keep the option of a ground force open. Mr Hoon recommended that Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons, which had been recalled to debate Iraq on 24 September (see Section 3.5), would provide the opportunity to make clear "as part of the Government's policy that the will of [the] United Nations must ultimately be backed up by the threat of force", and that the Ministry of Defence would be taking some prudent contingency measures to avoid foreclosing military options.

689. Some public acknowledgement that MOD was involved in contingency work would also allow "discreet discussions" to begin with industry. That was "increasingly urgent" and if it was not acknowledged publicly, there was "a clear risk of the information leaking, leading to accusations that we have been less than open with Parliament".

690. The letter made no reference to a possible UK contribution to post-conflict military operations.

691. Copies of Mr Watkins' letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw, Mr Brown and Sir Andrew Turnbull, and to Mr Bowen.

692. Mr Blair and Sir David Manning had reservations about the viability and costs of the MOD proposal.

693. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair:

> "The possibility that the military could make a land contribution in the North is a surprise. Until recently we were being told that covering the firemen's strike (Operation FRESCO) would make this impossible. Now, suddenly it isn't. The (militarily mouth-watering) prospect of being given tactical leadership of the campaign in the North … may have something to do with this volte face."[273]

694. Sir David advised Mr Blair to "register extreme caution" and to address a number of questions; in particular:

- How this was suddenly possible?
- What confidence there was that the Turkish angle would be sorted out?
- Whether the UK could sustain the numbers and, if so, for how long?

695. Sir David advised that Mr Blair should:

- give the MOD the "go ahead" provided the conditions they had identified were met, including that CENTCOM should "produce a parallel plan without a UK contribution" which "may well not be forthcoming"; and
- agree to the replacement of key units allocated to OP FRESCO.

696. Mr Blair wrote:

> "As discussed. Be careful of this Land idea …"[274]

697. In a meeting with Mr Hoon on 23 September, Mr Blair agreed limited contingency preparations for a land option, but asked for publicity to be minimised.

698. Following the discussion, the MOD informed the US that the UK was still considering a land option.

[274] Manuscript comment Blair on Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 22 September 2002, 'Iraq: Possible UK Military Contribution'.

699. That was not the No.10 understanding of what had been agreed.

700. In the context of the many issues which were being addressed on 23 September 2002,[275] the Inquiry has seen no evidence to indicate that the difference of view about what Mr Blair and Mr Hoon had agreed was anything other than a genuine misunderstanding.

701. Mr Blair discussed the issues with Mr Hoon on 23 September.[276]

702. Following that meeting, Mr Watkins informed officials in the MOD that:

> "The Prime Minister is content for us to proceed broadly as set out in my letter of 20 September. The Prime Minister remains very cautious about the viability of Package 3, not least because of its implications for our ability to meet other contingencies and the significant cost premium entailed. In the light of this, Mr Hoon believes that it is all the more necessary heavily to caveat this possibility in contacts with the US. We should emphasise that it is at the limits of what we could offer and that – because of other potential demands on our Armed Forces including FRESCO – we cannot be sure that we could deliver it. The US must therefore examine carefully how they would plan the campaign in the absence of such a contribution."

703. The packages that might be offered to the US were to be conveyed in terms cleared with Mr Hoon's Private Office.

704. Mr Blair had also confirmed that he was content to reallocate units from Op FRESCO and agreed that his statement on 24 September would contain a reference to the need for preparedness.

705. Mr Watkins made no reference to any discussion of post-conflict issues.

706. Sir David Manning's record of the meeting on 23 September, issued on 25 September, stated that Mr Blair had agreed that "we should present Package 2 as a potential contribution at the CENTCOM Planning Conference" and: "We should not be shy about presenting this as a significant and valuable offer."[277]

707. Sir David also recorded that Mr Blair had agreed that units for Op FRESCO should be replaced to maintain the possibility of a land force contribution, with minimum publicity. Mr Blair did not, however, want "any suggestion" that the UK might offer "a major land contribution to a Force in northern Iraq. We should not surface this possibility at the [US] Planning conference."

708. By the time Sir David Manning had produced his record of the discussion between Mr Blair and Mr Hoon, the MOD had already acted.

709. Mr Hoon's Office replied to No.10 immediately stating:

> "Separately and heavily caveated, we have indicated to CENTCOM that we are still considering a Land option … we agreed that the UK involvement … should continue on this basis. Defence staffs will continue actively to ensure that US expectations remain realistic."[278]

710. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Powell: "Just about OK" and referred to being "bounced" by the MOD.[279]

CABINET, 23 SEPTEMBER 2002

711. Neither the content nor the terms of the UK's offer to the US were considered by Ministers collectively.

712. On 23 September, Cabinet was told that there would be a future discussion of military options.

713. On 23 September, Cabinet was informed that the question of military action would arise "only if inspections were thwarted again".[280]

714. Cabinet was not given any information about the options under consideration. Mr Blair concluded: "If military action was required, the job could be done. There would be a discussion about the military options."

715. Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary from 1997 to 2003, told the Inquiry that Mr Blair had told her in September 2002 that he hadn't had a presentation on the military options; in her view that was "one of the many misleading things he said".[281]

716. As the evidence in this Section shows, Mr Blair had been offered advice on the nature of the options for a UK contribution to US-led military action from April onwards, but in September the MOD's thinking on the role it might be able to play was still evolving. The debate at that stage was about the assumptions the US should make in its planning.

Parliamentary debates, 24 September 2002

The dossier, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, was published on 24 September 2002.[282]

Both Houses of Parliament were recalled from recess on 24 September 2002 to debate the case for effective action in respect of the threat posed by Iraq.

Mr Blair's statement to Parliament on the publication of the dossier on 24 September and the subsequent questions and answers lasted for 90 minutes.[283]

During his statement, which focused on the history of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programme, its breach of United Nations resolutions and its attempts to rebuild that illegal programme, Mr Blair stated that "there must be genuine preparedness and planning to take [military] action" if diplomacy failed.[284]

Mr Blair's statement was followed in the House of Commons by a nine-hour debate.

There was also a debate in the House of Lords.

Mr Blair's statement and the debates in both Houses of Parliament are described in Section 3.5.

The content of the dossier and Mr Blair's statement are addressed in Section 4.2.

CHIEFS OF STAFF MEETING, 25 SEPTEMBER 2002

717. When the Chiefs of Staff discussed Iraq planning on 25 September, Adm Boyce emphasised that:

> "… expectation management with respect to UK caveats had to be taut. Package 2 … was a formidable contribution in its own right and Package 3, given its importance to the US, was not just a 'nice to have'."[285]

718. The Chiefs of Staff also discussed the post-conflict phase, "Phase IV". It was recognised that this Phase "would not have a clear-cut start" and that we should "guard against any accusation that the "US does the war-fighting while the UK does the peacekeeping". Not being involved in Package 3 at all "would be difficult to manage". The Chiefs commissioned the SPG to "scope the issues within Phase 4" (see Section 6.4).

719. Mr Ehrman reported that Adm Boyce had:

- directed that the Chiefs of Staff should meet every Wednesday to discuss Iraq; and
- said that it should be made clear to the US that they must deliver Turkey.[286]

720. On 26 September, Lt Gen Pigott wrote to Lt Gen Reith with guidance to "summarise the current baseline on … options and to flag up the key issues", on which addressees and their staff could draw on in discussion with US contacts.[287]

721. Lt Gen Pigott cautioned that aftermath and "Home Base" requirements were still to be addressed and "could impact on the final shape" of the force packages he was describing.

722. Lt Gen Pigott identified that there was:

> "… much work to be done if there is to be any prospect of a significant UK Land option from the North within current time windows … Until we have a much better feel for all the factors … we should be very cautious of giving US Commanders the impression that we can deliver something which events, most of them outside our control, simply preclude."

723. Lt Gen Pigott concluded:

> "Package 3 must at the moment have considerable caveats, and every effort must be made to dampen expectations that it can be delivered."

724. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

> "It was indeed decided that we would not expose the full large-scale option to the US at that point because of concerns about the UN process, because … lack of clarity … persisted, as to whether the Turks would actually provide the necessary facilities for the northern option which was the one mainly under consideration."[288]

725. Lord Boyce initially told the Inquiry:

> "I think that Package 2 would have disappeared as being a favoured option in about September, because the large-scale option was obviously more difficult to prepare, so our focus was on that."[289]

726. Asked whether he was aware of the size of the UK contribution that was on the table in September 2002, Lord Boyce subsequently told the Inquiry:

> "Package 2 was on the table then. No authorisation had been given by the Prime Minister or Defence Secretary to say that we could offer anything more than that. In fact, we were explicitly not saying that we were prepared to make available any land commitment, let alone a division commitment."[290]

SPG PAPER, 30 SEPTEMBER 2002

727. The SPG advised on 30 September that:

- A coercive strategy, "Force on Mind", was "the key instrument of military power" during a conflict prevention phase.
- Overt preparations for the use of military force were strategic elements of that strategy.
- The northern option was seen as strategically fundamental by the UK but was not seen as operationally fundamental by CENTCOM.
- More clarification was needed of the likely tasks for UK land forces and planning was still constrained by uncertainties about Turkey.
- The UN route and the timetable for inspections might not be compatible with the US timetable for the pursuit of regime change, which might pose a potential fault line between the US and UK.

728. A further version of the SPG paper 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq' was produced on 30 September.[291]

729. The paper stated that Ministerial statements highlighted a twin track approach to achieving the UK's "End State" for Iraq:

- Achieving a "significant change" in the "behaviour and posture" of the current regime, "with respect to WMD, and other UNSCRs, to prevent conflict".
- If the regime failed "to change its behaviour voluntarily", then it would "be compelled to change its posture through the application of force". If that resulted in regime change it would be "an unsought, but added benefit".

730. That was underpinned by a revised section on the principles for the campaign, which stated that the UK was "executing a strategic Force on Mind campaign" in which influence was "targeted against decision makers and their will to fight". During a conflict prevention phase, that was "the key instrument of military power":

- The crisis had reached the point where "constant coercive pressure" was "needed to keep up forward momentum".
- "Overt Force Generation and Force Preparation activities" were "strategic elements" in applying pressure.
- A "clear and unified declaration of intent" from "a wide and solid coalition" would deliver the most powerful message to Saddam Hussein.

---

[291] Paper [SPG], 30 September 2002, 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq'.

731. Other additions to the previous draft included:

- The section on potential UK strategic objectives in the 4 September draft was replaced by draft campaign objectives produced by the Cabinet Office, which are addressed in Section 6.4.
- As well as assisting the US to secure Iraq's oil infrastructure and production facilities, the section on "Potential UK Military Strategic Objectives" identified three additional tasks in the event of conflict:
  - ensuring that Israel's security was not threatened by Iraqi action;
  - ensuring Iraqi sovereignty post-conflict; and
  - minimising damage to Iraqi infrastructure.
- Draft objectives for a northern option, which were being considered by the Pentagon, were set out for the first time.
- The elements of an information campaign.
- A statement that the northern option was "only viable if Turkey can be delivered". There was "a lack of clarity in the US" about whether that was "achievable within current planning timelines". The need for "accurate assessments of likely success in delivering key states for the coalition (especially Turkey)" was one of the "conditions" for a "winning concept". A northern option was seen by the UK as strategically "fundamental" but was not seen as "operationally" fundamental by CENTCOM.
- A much expanded section on post-conflict planning.
- The identification of a possible scenario in which Saddam attempted "to distract coalition forces by a deliberate and sustained attack in the North, using all methods available to him (including CBW)".
- An updated analysis of the US plan and whether it constituted a winning concept, including that a division-size force would be needed for the North; but the tasks still required "more clarification". EUCOM planning was "much further behind" than CENTCOM planning for the South and was "still constrained" by the "inability to properly engage with Turkey".
- The UN route and the timetable for UN inspections might "not be compatible" with the US end state, which was focused primarily on regime change. That was "a potential fault line in the UK/US relationship". The UK might face a "choice of following the US or the UN route".

Concerns about Turkey

The JIC Assessment, 'Iraq: Regional Attitudes', issued on 19 April 2002, addressed regional attitudes to military action and how much support or opposition they might offer (see Section 3.3).[292] It stated that "Turkey, as a NATO ally, would probably provide basing if asked, despite its reservations, […]."

The FCO recognised that there could be difficulties with Turkey. In an internal minute of 30 July 2002, Mr Ricketts wrote:

> "Turkey is a special case. Would have to give active support for military operation, even if only the use of the airfields. Quite possibly a much more direct role. But the timing is exceptionally difficult: no Government until after 3 November. The Cyprus talks quite likely to fail, leading to a major train wreck with the EU at Copenhagen [EU Summit in December 2002]. The Turks are bound to use their strategic importance on Iraq as leverage. The UK cannot deliver what the Turks will want from the EU … The US … will have to work the Turkey case hard: it cannot be left to the Brits."[293]

At the request of the MOD, the JIC reconsidered the judgements in its 19 April Assessment on 5 August 2002.[294] That is addressed in Section 3.4.

In relation to Turkey, the JIC judged:

> "Turkey would be willing to provide basing for a US-led attack on Iraq."

The Assessment stated:

> "The Turkish Government has been reluctant to see an attack on Iraq. […] The exact extent of this Turkish help would have to be negotiated. Turkey would demand to be kept fully informed of US planning […]"

The FCO and Mr Peter Westmacott, British Ambassador to Turkey, exchanged views on whether or not the UK should engage in direct talks with Turkey.[295]

Mr Bowen wrote to Sir David Manning:

> "We are not committed to the northern option and our early participation in talks with the Turks may give the wrong impression."[296]

Sir David replied that he strongly agreed.[297]

A separate manuscript comment recorded that Sir David had asked the MOD to consult him about plans for consulting Turkey.[298]

The MOD request to offer ground forces

732. The offer of Package 2 was not enough to address growing MOD concerns that the caveats on Package 3 were leading the US to discount the contribution in its planning, closing off the option for UK ground forces to participate in the combat phase.

733. Concerns were expressed at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 2 October about the risk of irreparable damage to US/UK relations as a result of continuing uncertainty about a UK land contribution.

734. Adm Boyce was clear that should not be allowed to happen.

735. The UK's involvement post-conflict might be more onerous than war-fighting.

736. Elements of the "Force on Mind" strategy were still being discussed.

737. On 30 September, Lt Gen Reith provided an "illustrative critical decision and event matrix on timings", to provide a critical path for deploying Packages 2 and 3.[299] Timings within the matrix were "illustrative only". That included:

- decisions in the week beginning 7 October to begin the UOR process for priority equipments, nomination of a National Contingent Commander (NCC), and a decision on UK participation in Exercise Internal Look;[300]
- beginning overt preparations, including call-up of Reserves, by the end of October; and
- deploying the Amphibious Ready Group (ARG) and beginning pre-deployment training for the land component by the end of November.

738. Lt Gen Reith advised that the timelines assumed a US Presidential decision, on whether to take military action, on 6 January 2003. He also stated that it was anticipated that UN inspectors would begin work in mid-December, and were required to submit an initial report two months later. That "could offer the US a trigger to begin operations" which "could come forward" if a "strongly worded" resolution was adopted.

739. Lt Gen Reith separately sought endorsement of the command and control (C2) arrangements for potential operations in Iraq and the nomination of the individuals who would potentially fill key posts in time for them to participate in Exercise Internal Look.[301] That included the identification of the UK NCC, who would be collocated with CENTCOM's Forward HQ in Qatar.

[299] Minute Reith to MA/DCDS(C), 30 September 2002, 'Planning for Iraq – Critical Decision and Event Matrix'.
[300] Internal Look was a CENTCOM exercise planned for December 2002 which would be a mission rehearsal for possible future military operations against Iraq.
[301] Minute Reith to DCDS(C), 30 September 2002, 'Warrior Command and Control Architecture and Preparations for Exercise Internal Look'.

740. Lt Gen Reith also advised that, while it was "too early to judge" how Phase IV operations would be structured, it was "likely" that it would be "conducted under US leadership, with territorial sectors allocated to national or multi-national formations, perhaps akin to the Balkans model". The UK could be asked "to provide formation[s] such as HQ ARRC, a UK Div HQ, or UKAMPHIBFOR [UK Amphibious Force] to oversee national or multi-national 1* formations".

741. The Chiefs of Staff met on 2 October to discuss Iraq planning.[302]

742. Adm Boyce identified 15 October as a critical date for decisions, linked to whether or not to participate in Exercise Internal Look, when the "fudge option" would no longer be available. Some decisions might be delayed until the end of October, but that was an "absolute end stop".

743. The Chiefs of Staff "required a sitrep" which set out the key issues:

- Turkey's position and its implications;
- an appraisal of whether the northern option was essential and the UK's participation;
- an explanation of the UK's "coercive strategy and the Force on Mind gambit";
- the "need to maintain the impetus on UNSCRs [UN Security Council resolutions] using optimal, visible measures balanced against the resulting adverse PR";
- the "unpredictable consequences" that might arise from the "Saddam factor", including his reaction to the spikes in US military activity and response options;
- Special Forces options; and
- the linkage between CENTCOM's Exercise Internal Look and UK force planning.

744. The minutes recorded:

> "Keeping options open would be difficult if relations with the US, including those outside military circles, were not to suffer irreparably as a consequence and CDS was adamant that this should be avoided if at all possible. There were also implications for Force on Mind if the UK was perceived to be weakening its stance. Phase IV considerations needed to be clearly understood, given that the inevitable UK involvement might result in an even greater burden than war-fighting per se."

745. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that:

- Advice should be sent to Mr Hoon by 11 October.
- Lt Gen Reith should provide a paper "on land component options other than the northern option".

---

[302] Minutes, 2 October 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

- Lt Gen Reith's recommendations on the command and control structures for potential operations in Iraq and preparations for Exercise Internal Look.
- There was a requirement to identify UK headquarters that might be required to contribute to "follow on" operations.

746. The first paper that the MOD had been able to find on land options other than the northern option was produced by Lt Gen Reith on 18 November. That is addressed later in this Section.

747. Mr Drummond reported to Sir David Manning that the discussion at the Chiefs of Staff meeting had addressed the:

> "… importance of 'force on mind' as part of the campaign. The US was already using this tactic to good effect. We were not yet, because no decisions have been taken about the extent of our engagement in a possible military campaign. I said that the attention was focused on getting the right UNSCR, which would be the priority for the next few days."[303]

748. Mr Drummond also reported that there was:

> "A strong wish to do the northern Option 3. The military judgement was that this should be tactically possible. Not to do it would damage our relations with the US and might leave us with the even more onerous task of peacekeeping (Option 4). I rehearsed the Prime Minister's view that Option 2 would be a very substantial contribution."

749. There was "acceptance" that the US should lead on "persuading" Turkey, but a wish that the UK would be able "to engage early" if the northern option was pursued. There had been a "suggestion" that the US might be planning a northern option without the UK; and that Turkey might find the presence of British troops "difficult to contemplate".

750. On the basis of their perception of the US timetable, the Chiefs of Staff agreed on 9 October to seek a non-public Ministerial decision in principle to offer Package 3 to the US, ideally by 21 October.

751. The Chiefs of Staff recognised that UK withdrawal after Exercise Internal Look would have unpalatable diplomatic consequences.

752. On 8 October, Brigadier William Rollo, a member of Maj Gen Fry's staff, reported to Adm Boyce's Private Office that the US was likely to deploy its 4th Infantry Division in the North, "irrespective of subsequent UK decisions".[304] He also reported signs of Turkish nervousness.

[303] Minute Drummond to Manning, 2 October 2002, 'Chiefs Meeting'.
[304] Minute Rollo to PSO/CDS, 8 October 2002, 'Iraq Update on Warrior Planning'.

753. Draft advice to Mr Hoon was discussed at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 9 October.[305]

754. The Chiefs of Staff were informed that there seemed to be "increasing flexibility" in Washington over the timing of military activity and that "the weather would not be a limiting factor". That might affect UK decision-making.

755. Ministers "should be left in no doubt" that the northern option was a "fundamental part of US planning". From the Army's "perspective, Package 3 would guarantee long-term strategic influence with the US".

756. Air Chief Marshal Sir Peter Squire, Chief of the Air Staff, commented that Package 2 "did not entail a loss of influence", and sought "visibility of fallback options in the South".

757. In the context of predicted US discussions with Turkey on 21 October and reported indications from US military contacts that planning for one scenario whereby the US acted with the UK and another where it acted alone was "rapidly becoming untenable", the Chiefs of Staff considered that:

> "Ministers needed to be advised that a non-public 'decision in principle' to contribute was required, ideally by 21 October. In practice, because of the unpalatable diplomatic consequences of the UK's withdrawal after the completion of Ex[ercise] Internal Look … 15 Oct[ober] was also a key date."

758. Lt Gen Reith "observed that a meaningful discussion about, or leverage on, US planning with Gen Franks would not be possible until a decision (in principle) regarding the UK contribution had been made."

759. In addition, to maintain the UK's options, a call-out of some Reserves by the end of October might be required. That and visible action on UORs "would contribute to the 'force on mind' campaign". A successful coercion strategy was "key to the process".

760. The minutes also record the view that "it would be important to guard against the perception in the US that the UK's decision was a matter of legitimacy as opposed to a problem with mobilisation and public perception".

761. The Chiefs of Staff directed that the advice to Mr Hoon should be amended to reflect the discussion, including:

- the timing of US discussions with Turkey;
- a "decision in principle" on Package 3; and
- more explanation of the timelines for decision taking.

---

[305] Minutes, 9 October 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

762. Lt Gen Reith was also asked to provide a paper considering southern options for UK involvement if Turkey denied the northern option.

763. Reporting on the meeting to Sir David Manning, Mr Bowen wrote:

> "The military are pressing for a decision on whether the UK should be offering, with caveats, Package 3 … The argument for doing so is that the Americans now need to know in principle whether they should plan on our participation and that … our acceptability as a major player in the North needs to be broached early with the Turks.
> "The conclusion … was that the MOD should seek a positive decision in principle … [that] would expose to the US … the time lag … between a decision to deploy and deployment on the ground. The key decision to proceed in practice would be taken later …"[306]

764. Mr Bowen added that the MOD had underlined:

> "… that diplomacy ought to be backed by the threat of the use of force. In the game of coercion, military planning and preparation can have a beneficial effect in achieving a peaceful outcome. Moreover, in case the diplomatic track is brought to a halt, we should endeavour to reduce the gap between that point and the enforcement action we threaten. This would involve us being more up-beat about our contingency planning, without moving into war-mongering mode."

765. Mr Bowen also wrote that:

- A decision in principle in favour of Package 3 would help the UK to influence US thinking to a greater extent than had been possible up to that point, "especially in relation to the aftermath of any military action".
- In "making a decision in principle, without final commitment, we would stress that this reflected the UK political situation and was not specifically linked to authorisation through the UN".
- While it could be argued that agreeing in principle to provide Package 3 was "no different" from the position on Packages 1 and 2, there was "no doubt" that a commitment to deploy land forces was "a different matter from deployments in the air or at sea".

766. The MOD would be writing to No.10, and Mr Hoon was seeking a meeting with Mr Blair on 17 October to discuss the issue.

767. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Powell: "A foretaste of the line MOD will argue next week".[307]

768. Adm Boyce agreed with Gen Franks on 10 October that planning should proceed on the assumption that Package 3 would be available.

769. Adm Boyce spoke to Gen Franks on 10 October, stressing that Package 2 was "not an insignificant contribution".[308] The option of a UK operation in the South was being looked at if the northern option "fell away".

770. Gen Franks observed that a deployment in the South would be "very sequential because of the narrow entry front".

771. Adm Boyce told Gen Franks that the way ahead on Package 3 was "too close to call". In relation to the difficulties that posed for US planning, Adm Boyce was told that it was easier for the US to plan on having Package 3 rather than not having it. They agreed that "interests would be best served" by planning on the assumption that Package 3 would be available.

772. The arguments in favour of offering Package 3 to the US and for immediate clarification of the UK's position were set out in advice for Mr Hoon, agreed by Adm Boyce, on 11 October.

773. The need for a decision on the potential UK contribution to any US-led action against Iraq was set out in an urgent minute to Mr Hoon, from Mr David Johnson, Head of a newly created Iraq Secretariat in the MOD,[309] on 11 October.[310]

774. Mr Hoon was invited to note the increasing difficulty of maintaining the feasibility of Package 3 as long as its status was "unconfirmed". He was asked to either rule it out or move it to the same status as Package 2.

775. Mr Johnson told Mr Hoon that the US needed to know where the UK stood very soon:

> "In addition to pressure from US planners, it is in our interests to be clearer about our level of engagement, against the background of a series of key planning events from mid-October onwards."

776. Mr Johnson advised that the UN position was "a key element of the continuing strategic uncertainty". The UN inspections team was not expected to be fully operational before mid-February, but Iraqi non-co-operation "could occur at any point", including a refusal to accept the UN resolution. The "most likely scenario" was that "potential triggers for military action" were "moving to the right" but, "both the need to be ready for the worst case and the strategy of conflict prevention" pointed in the same direction: "continuing and visible military preparations". The main focus of US planning was "preparation to allow the commencement of offensive action in January (with contingency planning for an earlier start should that prove necessary)".

777. Mr Johnson stated that the northern option was:

> "… now seen as fundamental by US military planners, both in the Pentagon and in CENTCOM. There is an important role for the UK to play if we so wish. But if we decide not to play this role, the US will have to mobilise other US forces … The caveats we have so far attached to Package 3 have thus resulted in the US having to work on two separate plans, compounding what is already a complex process … CENTCOM … need a clear statement of the UK commitment, within the overall understanding that all the packages are subject to a general political caveat."

778. Mr Johnson advised that the need for the UK to clarify its position "will become increasingly acute"; and that:

> "From a purely national perspective, the lead-times for putting Package 2 and Package 3 in place mean that some publicly visible decisions … need to be taken well in advance of any deployment … But we do need to be prepared to take these decisions."

779. Gen Franks had told the UK that he would continue to run two plans "to preserve the possibility of incorporating Package 3". But the longer the US worked on that basis "the more disgruntled they will be if we subsequently rule Package 3 out".

780. Mr Hoon was given details of the decisions needed on both Packages 2 and 3 and their costs. Package 2, which included a Commando Group based in HMS Ocean, would cost some £464m-500m, excluding movement costs, ammunition and other consumables, and post-operational recuperation. On the same basis, Package 3 was estimated to cost an additional £508m.

781. Mr Johnson advised Mr Hoon that, in coming to a decision, Ministers would "need to take into account":

- The impact of visible decisions. In addition to their role in ensuring the viability of a UK contribution: "Overt preparations on the scale of Package 3 may make an impact on Saddam's perception of the seriousness of Coalition intent … They might also encourage key figures in the Iraqi regime to reflect further on whether their best interests continue to be served by Saddam's leadership … these measures would reinforce the coercive 'force on mind' approach that has already borne fruit".
- Cost. The costs of either package would be significant – Package 2 "could be not far short of £1bn"; Packages 2 and 3 together "could be between £1.5bn and £2bn".
- US expectations. The MOD had been "careful to manage" US expectations but a decision to rule out Package 3 would "inevitably disappoint" the US, with “knock-on effects”, which the UK would need to work hard to minimise. A decision to rule out Package 3 would need to be taken “very soon”. Adm Boyce recommended that, “unless a definite decision is taken to say ‘no’ now to Package 3, we must commit appropriate effort to [Exercise] Internal Look”.

- Burden-sharing. Package 2 could “justifiably” be presented as a “substantial contribution” but Package 3 would be “significantly more substantial” and “a vivid sign of a willingness to share the risks”. The shortcomings in the US tactical plan for the northern option “could be resolved if we were fully able to engage in planning and to flex resources to make it work”.
- Impact on readiness and capability for other tasks. Either package would impinge on the UK’s ability to respond to contingency operations, but Iraq was “the central issue” and there might be “a trade-off between committing to a military campaign and committing to an enduring follow-up operation”. A six-month war-fighting operation was “consistent with the Defence Planning Assumptions”.
- Aftermath management and the long term. US thinking on the “Day After” was “under-developed at present”, but there was “likely to be a need for a substantial, potentially long-enduring commitment of forces. Assuming that military action had taken place under a UN umbrella, it is likely that the US would look to Allies and the UK to play a major role in this, perhaps including providing a framework capability through the ARRC. We clearly have an interest in minimising the risk of a long lasting commitment … in a part of the world that will not be retention-positive for our personnel: in terms of Defence Planning Assumptions, a … medium scale PSO [peace support operation] in Iraq would only be manageable if our commitments elsewhere … were capped at small scale. The more substantial our contribution to military action in the first place, the more plausibly we will be able to argue that we have done our bit.”
- Turkey. Turkey’s attitude to UK forces might “remain uncertain for some time”. It was “possible that some or all of Package 3 might be able to play a role in the South (although space constraints might [have an] impact on timing)”.
- Wider context. In the context of securing influence, the MOD had “been taking soundings over what gives us influence over US campaign planning”. It was “clear that sharing risk – political and military” was “crucial to having a voice in how a military operation” was planned, and it also provided “a locus to influence the wider overall campaign”. There was “thus a longer-term and strategic dimension to the issue of Package 3: not joining will reduce the influence we have over planning”, including a change in the US “perceptions of the UK as a partner longer-term fostering a tendency to see us as a specialist in Peace Support Operations rather than a war-fighting ally, with potential knock-on effects on other areas of close bilateral cooperation (intelligence, nuclear, missile defence, equipment and network-centric capability, etc)”. Contributing Package 3 would mean that the UK Government would "be well placed to be more vigorous in pressing its views especially on better regional handling and 'day after' planning". If those components were not properly planned, a military operation might "not offer a worthwhile return". The UK "could and should offer a contribution on the understanding that these dimensions must be better addressed".

- Army morale. "If the Army does not participate in the biggest combat operation for over a decade, and particularly if it is subsequently committed to a potentially enduring aftermath task, this may foster a perception that the Army is no longer regarded as a war-fighting force (particularly if they are deployed on Op FRESCO duties) and may have knock-on effects on recruitment and retention. It will clearly present a leadership challenge. This should not be a critical factor in reaching decisions … but it is an issue which the Secretary of State will wish to have in mind."

782. Mr Johnson advised Mr Hoon that:

"A firm commitment in principle to Package 3 should give us better involvement in US thinking, especially in Washington, about the most realistic timings for military action. We may find that we have more time … but this is only likely to emerge progressively if at all. So if Ministers wished to place any caveats on the timescales or circumstances in which they are prepared to take the subsidiary decisions, we would have to make these clear to the US at the outset."

783. There would be:

"… a case for presenting visible deployment decisions more assertively, arguing that they are an essential ingredient of a successful coercive strategy. This might not persuade journalists to present them as anything other than a 'countdown to war'. But we would be less vulnerable to accusations of proceeding to war by stealth …"

784. Mr Johnson stated that Adm Boyce had seen and approved the minute.

MR HOON'S MINUTE, 15 OCTOBER 2002

785. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 15 October setting out the arguments for telling the US that it could plan on the assumption that the UK would make a land contribution.

786. At a meeting on 14 October, Mr Hoon asked for more work, in preparation for a meeting with Mr Blair on 17 October, on:

- a clear presentation of the key dates for visible activities, including the call-out of Reserves;
- the relationship between this activity and the likely diplomatic process;

- the impact of UK decisions on the Coalition; and
- a draft letter to Mr Alan Milburn, the Health Secretary, on the impact on the National Health Service.[311]

787. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 15 October, seeking a decision that week on whether to tell the US they could assume a UK land contribution in addition to the air, maritime and Special Forces package already offered for planning purposes.[312] In any event, there would be a need to be more robust in public about the need for essential military preparation.

788. In the context of the potential US timetable, and the need to maintain pressure on Saddam Hussein, Mr Hoon added:

> "Indeed, Saddam has conceded ground so far only because diplomacy has been backed by the credible threat of force. We must maintain and reinforce this effect."

789. The reasons for urgency included:

- a week-long CENTCOM conference, which started that day, during which the US military wanted to finalise their plans;
- discussions with Turkey; and
- the need to start visible preparations, including the call-up of Reserves.

790. Mr Hoon told Mr Blair that either Package 2 or Package 3 "would be a viable military contribution", but in describing the Packages, Mr Hoon added:

- The number of visible "boots on the ground" in Package 2 would be "small", which "could lead to some criticism here and elsewhere that UK support for the operation was half-hearted. The US may be disappointed that we are not offering more; the likely political reaction is more difficult to judge …"
- Package 3 would provide a "major element of the northern line of attack", which was judged "essential". Without UK land forces, the US would have to redeploy its forces from the South. UK forces "could therefore help both to shorten the campaign and secure a more decisive outcome".
- Package 3 "would have more impact" and "might provide a framework for integrating elements from other countries into a land force".
- "There was "likely to be a substantial and continuing post-conflict stabilisation task in Iraq". If the UK did not contribute Package 3, it might be "more vulnerable to a US request to provide a substantial force for this potentially open-ended task".

[312] Minute Hoon to Prime Minister, 15 October 2002, 'Iraq: UK Military Options' attaching Paper Ministry of Defence, 14 October 2002, 'Iraq: UK Contingency Planning'.

791. Mr Hoon wrote:

> "A critical – and the least quantifiable – factor in weighing the two packages must be the impact on our strategic relationship with the US. In principle, both packages could strengthen that relationship: Package 2 alone should easily surpass any other conceivable non-US contribution, except perhaps that of Turkey."

792. Mr Hoon stated that, while he had "sought to dampen" Secretary Rumsfeld's expectations of any sizeable land contribution, there might be disappointment that the UK was "not prepared to put significant numbers of ground troops in harm's way". That might translate into a cooler view towards our privileged links.

793. Mr Hoon added:

> "A further factor which cannot be entirely discounted is the negative reaction of many of our own military personnel – particularly in the Army – if we do not provide a land contribution. This could find its way into the media which would be quick to draw unfavourable comparisons between our contribution to this campaign and the Gulf Conflict in 1990/91."

794. Mr Hoon stated that an offer of Package 3 "must be subject to conditions":

- The UK would be dependent on US help to secure Turkey's agreement to the UK deployment.
- The UK "must be fully involved in developing the final plan on which a final decision to deploy would be based".
- The UK would want US help to reconstitute stocks, particularly of smart weapons.

795. A detailed MOD paper attached to Mr Hoon's minute set out the factors Ministers would "need to take into account" in coming to a decision and the detailed composition of the force packages, which was largely based on Mr Johnson's minute to Mr Hoon of 11 October.

796. Mr Hoon also sent his minute to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Sir Andrew Turnbull.

797. The Chiefs of Staff meeting on 16 October was informed that a Ministerial decision on the likely UK contribution was expected the following day.[313]

798. Lt Gen Pigott provided updates on US planning and UK strategy.

799. Adm Boyce commented that the UK position on support for US action "had to be clear", and that a "distinction between supporting the US with basing in Diego Garcia and the deployment of personnel into any battlespace was academic".

[313] Minutes, 16 October 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

NO.10'S QUESTIONS

800. Sir David Manning's private advice to Mr Blair expressed scepticism about a number of the arguments in Mr Hoon's minute.

801. Sir David Manning made a number of comments expressing scepticism about some of the arguments employed:

- In response to the argument that overt preparations would reinforce a strategy of coercion, Sir David wrote: "The opposite is also possible i.e. Saddam will conclude that we are interested only in [war]; he will therefore not co-operate."
- US expectations of UK ground troops had been "fuelled because MOD almost certainly aroused great expectations early on – without political authority".
- Sir David questioned whether the MOD had carefully managed US expectations, writing: "Have we? US only know about Package 3 because we talked it up."
- The UK would be "vulnerable" to a request for substantial forces post-conflict whether it provided Package 3 or not.
- Sir David did not "buy" the MOD argument that failure to offer Package 3 would change the US perception of the UK as a long-term partner.
- Adm Boyce was "worried" about managing the impact on army morale if it did not participate in combat operations.[314]

802. In addition, Sir David provided detailed advice for the Prime Minister on 16 October, flagging concerns about whether the assumptions underpinning the package were robust, and about domestic handling issues.[315]

803. Sir David summarised the key arguments in favour of Package 3 as:

"
- It would be a strong signal of our intent and would increase the pressure on Saddam;
- It is what the US is hoping for;
- It would buy us influence in the conduct of the military campaign against Iraq;
- US gratitude would make Washington correspondingly more inclined to be generous to us in other areas …
- It would reduce the risk that we would be expected to contribute large numbers of troops to help administer Iraq after hostilities;
- The British Army would like it; and would be correspondingly demoralised if no use were made of their war-fighting capability."

---

[314] Manuscript comment Manning to Powell on Minute Hoon to Prime Minister, 15 October 2002, 'Iraq: UK Military Options' attaching Paper Ministry of Defence, 14 October 2002, 'Iraq: UK Contingency Planning'.
[315] Minute Manning to Blair, 16 October 2002, 'Iraq: UK Military Options'.

804. Sir David commented that he thought some of those arguments were "pretty dubious":

- It was "not clear" whether Saddam Hussein would be much affected by signals of British military intent; "it was US intent that bothered him".
- The problem of US expectations on Package 3 might have been "self-generated". His "guess" was that the UK military had "been pretty forward leaning in their contacts with their US opposite numbers".
- He doubted that the UK "would have much say in the management of the military campaign".
- He was "not much persuaded by the argument about US gratitude: it should not be a key factor in our decision".
- He was "not much persuaded either, that if we help with the war-fighting, we shall be spared the post-conflict washing up. It didn't work like that in Afghanistan. Experience shows that once you are in, you're in deep, without queues of grateful countries waiting to take over when the shooting stops."
- "Army morale would have to be managed: we needn't fight every war."

805. Sir David suggested that Mr Blair should explore with Mr Hoon:

- What had changed since the summer when Mr Blair had been advised that the UK could not deploy Package 3, and whether the new assumptions were "really safe and robust"?
- Whether the UK could "bank on Turkish assurances given to the US about access, bases and supply"?
- Whether the UK would be able to fight in a "CBW environment", and "in summer temperatures if necessary"?
- Whether it made sense to commit the UK so heavily to Iraq and how the UK would respond to a sudden crisis elsewhere?
- Whether Package 3 was affordable?

806. Sir David concluded:

> "In sum, the MOD paper is special pleading for Package 3. You [Mr Blair] may want to go this route to signal your determination; and for US solidarity reasons. But there are risks and difficulties that need to be thoroughly explored; and there will be costs which are only sketchily dealt with here – and which might balloon.
> "Personally, I doubt whether there is a strong military case for Package 3. The US would like us along, but could certainly do the job without UK land forces. This is a political call."

807. Mr Blair responded: "This is a v. tough call"; and that he would "need to speak to the senior military in detail" before he committed to Package 3.[316]

808. Asked about his comments on army morale, Sir David Manning explained, to the Inquiry that he thought morale should not be a reason for participating in a land invasion.[317]

THE FCO PERSPECTIVE

809. The FCO advised Mr Straw to question some of Mr Hoon's arguments.

810. Mr Edward Oakden, Head of FCO Security Policy Department, advised Mr Straw to question whether the decision really had to be made that week.[318]

811. Mr Oakden wrote:

- Without a UN resolution preparations would look like UK determination to pursue the military option, "instead of backing the diplomatic route with a credible threat of force" and that it would be worth drawing out the MOD's thinking.
- Postponing the decision until a UN Security Council resolution had been agreed seemed "likely to make a real difference to how a move to military preparations would be viewed, both domestically and internationally".
- Third countries, including Turkey, would be unwilling to support preparation or participation until a legal basis was found.
- Once the forces were deployed, there would be no going back until Saddam Hussein was disarmed: "Pulling out without achieving this would cause severe strains with the US and serious harm to UK credibility. So the prospect is for a longish haul, with the UN inspectors likely to take some time to find what will be well-concealed WMD. We should look very hard before our first public leap."
- "Many senior Turks still [believed that] the UK" had "a secret agenda to create a Kurdish homeland in Northern Iraq"; and memories of the UK's efforts to dismember Turkey in the 1920s remained "surprisingly vivid". The UK should let the US conduct negotiations with Turkey.
- The MOD's suggestion that the UK could trade a more active role in fighting for "a smaller military role during reconstruction" seemed "optimistic": "On the contrary, if we have fought without international legal sanction, we could be left on our own with the US."

812. Mr Oakden concluded that the MOD had rightly highlighted real concern about longer-term damage to the US/UK relationship "if for the first time in recent memory the UK decides not to join the US on the ground", or if it complicated US military planning and put US timelines at risk. But he questioned whether that concern was at the military,

"rather than the political level". He suggested further talks with the US at a senior political level "if the Chiefs judge there is a real danger of US disaffection".

813. Mr Westmacott reported on 16 October that he had been told by a senior Turkish official that Turkey assumed that, if the UK decided it wanted to join the US in making military deployments in or through Turkey in support of a UN resolution, it would let Turkey know in good time.[319] Without Security Council authorisation, it was "quite possible" that Turkey would refuse to co-operate. Constitutionally the Turkish Parliament had to give its consent, and the constitution stated that it could only do so in the context of international legitimacy.

US Congressional authorisation for the use of force

On 10 and 11 October, the House of Representatives and the Senate passed a joint resolution authorising the use of military force against Iraq.[320]

Signing the joint resolution on 16 October, President Bush stated that it symbolised the united purpose of the nation and expressed the considered judgement of Congress.[321] Congress had authorised the use of force but he had not ordered that use, and he hoped that would not become necessary.

More detail is provided in Section 3.5.

Mr Blair's meeting, 17 October 2002

814. Mr Blair concluded that, while he wanted to keep the option of Package 3 open, the UK must not commit itself at that stage.

815. Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon met on 17 October to discuss the latest developments on the UN negotiations and the military options.[322] Adm Boyce, Mr Powell, Mr Campbell, Baroness Morgan, Sir David Manning and Mr Rycroft were also present.

816. Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce had "set out the options, as in the Defence Secretary's minute" of 15 October. Adm Boyce had "put the military arguments for agreeing to Package 3. But if we were to end up agreeing on Package 2, it would be better to tell the US now". Mr Straw had said "that the international case for Package 3 was strong".

817. Mr Blair "took these points" but:

> "… remained concerned about the costs. He concluded that he wanted to keep open the option of Package 3. But we must not commit to it at this stage."

818. The meeting also "agreed that there must be no leaks and no public announcements (for instance any notices to Reserves) until after the first UN resolution had passed and after a further discussion" with Mr Blair.

819. Copies of Mr Rycroft's record of the discussion on military options were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Hoon, Mr Straw, Mr Brown and Sir Andrew Turnbull, and to Mr Bowen.

820. The discussion on the progress and direction of negotiations on a draft UN resolution, which had reached a critical stage, was recorded separately and is addressed in Section 3.5.

821. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that Adm Boyce had said that he would have a real problem with the Army if they were not properly involved and that Mr Blair would have far greater influence with the US if the UK was there on the ground.[323] Gen Franks really needed to know what our answers may be. Mr Blair had said it was not no, but it was not yet yes. He wanted more work done analysing the cost.

822. Mr Watkins told officials in the MOD that Mr Blair "did not wish to rule out Package 3 at this stage but wished to give the matter further consideration": "In terms of our internal MOD planning, the position therefore remains essentially unchanged."[324]

The UK's draft strategic objectives

The preliminary objective for UK policy in Iraq agreed by Mr Straw and Mr Hoon in May, and recorded in Mr Hoon's minute to Mr Blair of 31 May 2002 (see Section 3.3), was revised in October.

Mr Bowen sent Sir David Manning draft strategic policy objectives for Iraq on 4 October, explaining that "Whitehall would find it helpful" to agree objectives "for the present phase of activity" and, "in particular, it would help us in formulating an information strategy".[325]

The Cabinet Office draft stated that the UK's prime objective was:

> "… to rid Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and their associated programmes and means of delivery, including prohibited ballistic missiles (BM) … in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolutions … an expression of the will of the international community, with which Iraq has persistently failed to comply, thereby perpetuating the threat to international peace and security."[326]

Other objectives included the desired end-state for Iraq, to which the words "and providing effective and representative government for its own people" had been added to the text agreed by Mr Straw and Mr Hoon earlier in the year.

The draft also identified the immediate priorities for the UK, including that continuing to "make military plans and preparations in case military action" was required to "force compliance with UNSCRs".

Mr Lee sent a copy of the draft to Mr Hoon's Private Office, commenting that, while the text was "helpful", it did not "go far enough in providing direction for current military activity and an information strategy".[327] Mr Lee did not expect the draft to move forward until there was a clear UN position.

Sir David Manning informed members of the Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy on 22 October that Mr Blair had agreed draft UK strategic objectives for Iraq.

The draft objectives agreed by Mr Blair were unchanged from those proposed by Mr Bowen on 4 October.[328]

The draft objectives underpinned subsequent policy statements both to explain the UK's position and to maintain the pressure on Saddam Hussein to comply with the demands of the international community.

The UK's objectives were formally announced by Mr Straw on 7 January 2003.[329]

Mr Blair's decision to offer Package 3 to the US, 31 October 2003

823. The Chiefs of Staff meeting on 23 October was informed that time was running out if the UK wanted to keep open the option of deploying ground forces in the combat phase of any military operations.

824. Adm Boyce directed that a further submission should be made to Mr Hoon.

825. An update from Lt Gen Reith to Lt Gen Pigott on 21 October, entitled 'The Northern Axis – Current Thinking', advised that, while the UK's "preferred option remain[ed] leadership of the Northern Axis", an independent British command was now unlikely.[330] He also advised that the package would need to be reinforced with a second formation to establish a "genuine manoeuvre capability"; and that analysis had indicated that "additional forces would be required for such tasks as protection of LOCs [Lines of Communication] and handling of EPW [Enemy Prisoners of War]".

826. The timelines for action were discussed at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 23 October.[331]

827. The Chiefs of Staff were informed that there was "no discernible position on UK forces" in Turkey. Lt Gen Reith suggested that a UK tactical lead on the northern option was possible and desirable but now "in the balance and time was running out". The end of October deadline for UK decisions was "inextricably" tied to military action from the first week of January. If the US start date was later, then the timetable for UK decisions could be later.

828. Adm Boyce was "not prepared at this juncture, to recommend that the UK offer a Package 3 type contribution that would arrive some time after the US [Main Effort] of end-Feb". He directed that further advice should be provided to Mr Hoon on the options for UK participation.

829. A report of the meeting from Mr Oakden observed that Adm Boyce understood the interaction between the United Nations Security Council resolution and a decision on Package 3, but "was emphatic that the UK forces had to be there for the start, or not at all".[332]

830. Mr Bowen reported the discussion to Sir David Manning, pointing out that the "the US did not think that land forces in Turkey were ruled out, but they certainly had not been ruled in either".[333] Following the Turkish elections in early November, it could be 45 days before a new government was formed. Mr Bowen concluded by stating that "the key question about Turkish attitudes is far from resolved".

831. Mr Bowen also reported that the MOD wanted a structure that would allow them to "integrate offers of coalition participation" and was concerned about the risk that someone else might take on that role.

CABINET, 24 OCTOBER 2002

832. Cabinet was informed on 24 October that negotiations on the UN resolution continued and progress was "slow".

833. Mr Blair said that Iraq would continue to be discussed at Cabinet, "including in due time the military options".

834. A draft resolution agreed by the US and UK was tabled in the Security Council on 23 October 2002.[334]

835. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 24 October that discussions with the Permanent Members of the Security Council and with others continued on a resolution on Iraq. It was a long drawn-out process and progress was slow.[335]

836. Mr Blair stated that Iraq would continue to be discussed in Cabinet, "including in due time the military options". The Government must "keep its options open in responding to future developments" after a resolution was achieved.

837. The negotiations on the draft resolution are addressed in Section 3.5.

MOD CONCERNS ABOUT THE US PERSPECTIVE

838. The MOD continued to argue that keeping open the option of a land contribution and being able to influence the US planning process required a clearer statement of the UK position.

839. Mr Johnson asked Mr Hoon on 25 October to note the "increasing difficulty of keeping options open" because:

- The US could not "continue much longer with the uncertainty" over the UK contribution.
- A UK contribution on the scale of Package 3 would "cease to be viable within the current US timetable on or around 31 October if no public acknowledgement is made" of the need for preparatory work on the availability of Reserves.[336]

840. Mr Johnson also asked Mr Hoon to consider the "need to re-establish with the US at the highest level whether their planning timetable [was] likely to change".

841. Mr Johnson advised that there might be constitutional difficulties in Turkey over hosting foreign forces in the absence of a UN resolution. It seemed "increasingly likely" that the "substantial" US forces would be committed to the North, and that they might "wish to exercise overall leadership there". Uncertainty about the UK contribution complicated the issues for the US and limited the UK's ability to influence the developing plan. Gen Franks remained "wedded to a UK role, not least as a possible framework for integrating contributions from other potential coalition members".

842. Adm Boyce would raise questions about the US timetable with Gen Myers and there might be "a case for following up at a political level". But, unless the US accepted later dates, a decision to permit preparatory action on Reserves would be needed if UK options were not to be closed off.

843. A meeting for Mr Hoon to discuss the issues with Adm Boyce had been arranged for 28 October.

844. Mr Watkins commented to Mr Hoon that there were potential tensions between the military and inspection timetables; and that there was "as yet … little irritation with our fence sitting at senior military level in the US".[337]

[337] Manuscript comment Watkins on Minute Johnson to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 25 October 2002, 'Iraq: Sitrep'.

845. The meeting between Adm Boyce and Gen Myers added weight to the view that US timelines were slipping, in part because of the UN process. There was "some sympathy with the UK position".[338]

846. CENTCOM was described as "coming round" to the northern option. That would depend on Turkey's co-operation. Gen Myers was reported to have:

- accepted Adm Boyce's "point that some overt preparations would send an entirely appropriate signal to Saddam immediately after" adoption of the UN resolution, "rather than doing nothing until actual signs of resolution-bending";
- recognised the value a UK divisional HQ "might bring in providing a 'home' for any coalition contributions"; and
- stated that "Much planning" was taking place in the US on post-conflict considerations.

847. The record of the meeting was sent to Sir David Manning, who commented to Mr Powell that it was "Evidence" that US plans were "now slipping" and that it put the UK decision "in context".[339]

848. The minutes of the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 28 October recorded that:

> "The US understood the reasons why the UK could not commit while the UNSCR was under discussion."

849. While US military staff "continued to work to planning timelines prescribed" by President Bush in August 2002:

> "Senior US officials had begun to acknowledge that there could be a requirement for these timelines to be altered. It would be important for the UK to try to influence a shift of several weeks rather than incremental shifts that mirrored the delay in the signing of the UNSCR."[340]

850. The minutes stated that the UK's ability to influence the US was diminishing as time advanced, "particularly as the US had now decided to commit" the 4th Infantry Division to the northern axis. Adm Boyce directed that "UK planning for either a western or southern axis was not to commence ahead of a political decision on UK commitment".

851. The minutes also stated that "it would be important to emphasise within forthcoming submissions that, although Package 3 might be considered expensive, the alternative of committing to op[eration]s during the aftermath would also require considerable resources".

852. On 29 October, Mr Bowen reported to Sir David Manning that the Chiefs of Staff were pressing for a decision in principle on Package 3.[341]

853. Mr Bowen stated that Gen Franks understood the UK position, "including the political dimension" and had "directed that planning should proceed on the basis of US forces only operating out of Turkey" and that the 4th Infantry Division would be "the main combat formation". Package 3 "would still be welcome as an addition and could have the particular task of integrating other coalition members' contributions".

854. Mr Bowen added:

> "The MOD argue that they are being excluded from detailed planning and their influence in discussing issues like the aftermath is diminishing."

855. Mr Bowen commented that some of the assumptions behind the MOD case were "fragile". The planning date of early January was "no more than a military [planning] assumption", and the willingness of Turkey to accept any ground forces was "still in doubt". But the military needed to make such assumptions if they were to "get on with the job of planning complex operations for extremely uncertain scenarios".

856. Mr Bowen wrote that the MOD would be arguing that:

- It was to the UK's disadvantage to be excluded from planning for the northern option.
- The "Turkish dimension" needed to be fully explored if the UK was to be involved.
- A commitment in principle did not lock the UK into a commitment in practice.
- The UK leadership of other coalition members' involvement could be prejudiced.

857. The MOD would concede that notification of the Reserves "could be postponed, on the basis that a commitment in principle would enable them to cause the US military to re-examine the assumptions with a view to negotiating a more realistic date".

858. In addition to Sir David Manning's questions about the implications of offering Package 3, whether it would be "realistic to think we could backtrack from a decision in principle" and whether the UK understood what it would be getting into, Mr Bowen identified the need to consider costs, "the overall profile" the UK wished to adopt, and the need to factor in slippage in the timetable at the UN and Turkish decisions.

859. Mr Bowen viewed the US decision to earmark the 4th Infantry Division as "helpful" because it showed it was "committed strategically" and would "take the lead", but he added that Turkey's position might mean that nothing would come of the northern axis.

---

[341] Minute Bowen to Manning, 29 October 2002, 'Iraq: Whether to Offer Package 3 to the US?'

860. Mr Bowen wondered whether:

> "A way through this … would be to make a commitment in principle to Package 3, but on the basis that we cannot accept the current planning assumption date for a Presidential decision. That would force the US military to exclude us or have a serious discussion about the realism of their timetable …"

861. Mr Bowen also suggested that the offer of Package 3 might be made "dependent on US leadership in the North and willing co-operation by the Turks".

862. Mr Bowen wrote that pressure on Saddam Hussein needed to be maintained. "Continued planning" together with activities that were "necessary to prepare for action" would "all play their part" in that. The UK should be "persuading the international community and our domestic audience that proper preparation for war" was "the best way to avoid it".

863. Mr Bowen concluded:

> "Overall, I fear we are enmeshed in a military planning cycle which operates out of synch with the political track. But it is only planning. Provided we enter the right caveats and get a realistic re-think about the timelines … I think there is advantage in our being involved in planning for the North (unless the political view is definitely that we should confine ourselves to the sea and air packages)."

864. The MOD advised Mr Blair on 29 October that its influence on US planning was reducing and the option to deploy UK ground forces was at risk of being excluded by default. The only way to avoid that was to offer Package 3 to the US for planning on the same basis as Package 2.

865. Package 3 could also significantly reduce the UK's vulnerability to US requests to provide a substantial and costly contribution to post-conflict operations.

866. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 29 October, to report that "US military planning [was] continuing, but increasingly assuming no UK Land contribution"; and that an option for a "significant UK land contribution" could be "sensibly kept open only by placing it on a similar basis" to Package 2.[342]

867. The MOD advised that it had "become clear over the past few days" that the US military had begun planning on the assumption that the UK would "not contribute ground forces and consequently, will not pursue the question of UK involvement with Turkey". The US had also decided to commit the 4th US Infantry Division:

> "… which would mean that the option of the UK commanding the operation from the North at divisional level has gone. This does not necessarily mean that we could not resurrect the option of a land contribution especially should timescales change. But it does mean that the prospect of a significant UK ground role in the North and our ability to influence that part of the US plan is reducing daily …"

868. The MOD advised that preparatory work on Reserves would need to go forward soon unless the US timetable changed. The UK had taken "discreet soundings" on whether the US timetable was realistic:

"The sense amongst US military planners is that the realistic starting date for the current plan is now slipping. But this does not have political endorsement, and we do not know when or if President Bush will be prepared to signal a later timetable, given the importance of sustaining pressure on Saddam and US domestic political considerations."

869. The uncertainty about whether the slippage would be "a matter of days or something more substantial" left two questions to be addressed.

870. First, in relation to a land contribution, the MOD stated that Package 3 was:

"… for practical purposes being excluded by default. If we are to keep the option open, and continue to have the strongest military cards to underpin our political influence, the Defence Secretary believes that we should indicate to the US that they should plan on the assumption that the land contribution would be available, subject to final political approval … This can be done without publicity. It is also worth noting that, while Package 3 is significantly more expensive in itself than Package 2, making it available could significantly reduce our vulnerability to US requests to provide a substantial (and costly) contribution to post-conflict stabilisation operations."

871. Second, Mr Hoon was concerned that he would appear disingenuous if he failed on 4 November to answer oral questions about the Reserves, were an announcement then to be made shortly thereafter.

872. Mr Watkins concluded that Mr Hoon recognised:

"… that these issues … cannot be disentangled easily from the political climate and the fate of the UNSCR negotiations which are currently in the balance. But, equally, he is concerned that we should continue to contribute to maintaining the pressure on the Iraqis which has so far shown some level of success."

873. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Brown, and to Mr Bowen.

874. On 30 October, Mr Watkins advised Mr Hoon to press for a decision to offer Package 3, on the same basis as Package 2, but on the understanding that the offer was subject to clarification of the Turkish position.[343]

875. Mr Watkins added:

> "Paradoxically, clarifying the status of Package 3 puts us in a stronger position to persuade the US that this timetable is no longer realistic …"

876. Mr Watkins wrote that Mr Hoon might want "to counsel against any simplistic suggestions" that Turkey, and the Turkish General Staff, could be persuaded to co-operate.

JIC ASSESSMENT, 30 OCTOBER 2002: 'TURKEY: ATTITUDE TO AN IRAQ CAMPAIGN'

877. The JIC assessed on 30 October that Turkey would support a US-led military campaign and that its opposition to UK forces could be overcome with US pressure.

878. At the request of the MOD, the JIC issued an Assessment of Turkey's attitude to any international campaign against Iraq, including Turkey's interests in Iraq, on 30 October.[344]

879. The JIC judged that Turkey did not want a war against Iraq, but it would support a US-led military campaign. Turkey appeared:

> "… opposed to UK troops. Such resistance is probably surmountable, but only by US pressure. Turkey will prefer international legitimacy for the campaign and require guarantees on the territorial integrity of Iraq."

880. The Assessment recounted Turkish concerns about the impact of war, including:

- regional instability, including if Israel was drawn in;
- the domestic impact of a possible outflow of Kurdish refugees; and
- the economic impact of war.

881. The JIC attributed Turkish sensitivity to UK military involvement in the region to its role in the creation of Iraq in the 1920s and stated that: "The involvement of UK troops in aiding Kurds after the 1991 Gulf War aroused suspicion of UK partiality towards the Kurds."

MR BLAIR'S MEETING, 31 OCTOBER 2002

882. On 31 October Mr Blair agreed that the MOD could offer Package 3 to the US on the same basis as Package 2.

883. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair that Mr Watkins' letter of 29 October was: "Further pressure from MOD on Package 3. This is based on military planning cycle … not the UN/Political realties."[345]

884. Sir David asked:

- Is the timing realistic any more?
- Would the Turks have us?
- Could we backtrack if we gave a firmer commitment?
- Can we afford Package 3?

885. Sir David also wrote alongside the MOD argument that Package 3 would reduce the UK's vulnerability to a US request for a substantial post-conflict contribution: "This supposes we w[ou]ld agree to such costly requests."

886. Mr Powell wrote a manuscript note to Mr Blair stating:

> "The military are making another effort to bounce you into a decision on option 3 … US timelines are slipping and we do not have to decide yet."[346]

887. On 31 October, Mr Blair, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce discussed the MOD wish to offer Package 3 to the US for planning purposes.[347]

888. Adm Boyce stated that US planning was proceeding on the assumption that there would not be a UK land contribution. The US was "unwilling to approach the Turks about a possible UK contribution until they had a firmer indication" of likely UK commitment. If the "UK wanted to keep open the option of a land contribution and be able to influence the planning process", the US needed to be told that the land package could be assumed on the same basis as the other two packages. That "would not be a final commitment to a UK land contribution".

889. Adm Boyce and Mr Hoon added that the US timetable was slipping beyond the possible early January start date:

> "As a result the earlier tight timelines on warning UK Reservists no longer applied … a warning notice would not be required until the middle of November."

890. Mr Blair asked about the additional costs of Package 3 and whether they had been discussed with the Treasury.

891. The record of the meeting does not indicate whether Mr Blair's question about the cost of Package 3, and whether that had been discussed with the Treasury was answered.

892. Adm Boyce was reported to have said that "he believed that if we made a major financial contribution through Package 3, we would be under less pressure to finance a big share of the post-conflict reconstruction effort".

893. Mr Rycroft recorded that Mr Blair concluded that the MOD should tell the US that the UK was "prepared to put Package 3 on the same basis as Package 2 for planning purposes, in order to keep the option open; but that no warning should be issued to the Reservists at this stage". Mr Blair "should be consulted again before any such warning was issued".

894. Copies of the record of the meeting were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Hoon, Mr Straw and Mr Brown, to Adm Boyce, and to Mr Bowen.

895. The MOD discussions with the Treasury on the costs of the military options and Mr Brown's involvement are addressed in Section 13.

Why did the UK Government decide to offer ground forces?

896. The decision to offer Package 3 was, as Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair, a "political call".

897. In military terms, the US did not need UK ground forces to launch an invasion of Iraq.

898. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that the US did not need a ground force contribution from the UK:

> "… if they had chosen to go on their own, they could have done so. They had the capability and the numbers to do so."[348]

899. According to Sir David Manning, the military importance of the UK contribution was:

> "… quite an important contribution, but not decisive.
>
> "The Americans could have done this operation without us. We always knew that … But nevertheless, I'm sure they were grateful to have a sizeable British contribution when, in the end, it came to military action."[349]

[348] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, page 37.
[349] Public hearing, 30 November 2009, pages 38-39.

Why did the UK offer a divisional headquarters and an armoured brigade?

900. The MOD started in spring 2002 from the assumption that if military action was required, the UK should participate; and that its contribution would be on a similar scale to the UK contribution to the US-led operation Desert Storm, the liberation of Kuwait in 1991. It stressed the importance of making a contribution which would be seen by the US as commensurate with the UK's capabilities and the demands of the campaign.

901. In addition, from the outset of the planning process, the military leadership was looking for a discrete UK role in ground operations. This reflected their concerns about the difficulty of integrating forces from different nations for ground operations.

902. That led to the identification of Package 3, which was described as a UK division, although its size, shape and component parts changed significantly over time.

903. From late July onwards, the need to provide cover for a potential strike by the Fire Brigades Union, which was equivalent to a medium scale operation, meant that the UK would have been unable to deploy a division of either two or three brigades within the timescales envisaged by US military planning.

904. Military planners concentrated on identifying the maximum practicable contribution the UK would be able to generate within the potential timescales for US action.

905. From August until December 2002, UK planning was based on providing a divisional headquarters and one armoured brigade for operations in northern Iraq.

906. Asked how the UK's options had been evaluated, Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that the assessment of the UK's contribution had been approached "in terms of what actually was achievable"; it had been "assumed that we would want to be helpful to the United States … and, therefore, how would we go about offering as much as was consistent with all the other pressures that we faced".[350]

907. Mr Hoon added:

> "My sense was that, generally speaking, the Prime Minister wanted us to be involved to the maximum extent that was possible … The Prime Minister was, generally speaking, anxious to do what the United Kingdom could to help."[351]

908. Mr Hoon stated that Mr Blair "would have accepted" if there were practical reasons why the UK could not offer Package 3, but his "assumption" was that "Downing Street" wanted to offer a land contribution "if it could be done".[352]

909. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that the Chiefs of Staff's view was that the UK contribution had to be "large enough to be able to integrate ourselves properly with the Americans"; and the UK "shouldn't be put in the position of expecting somebody else to defend us or sustain us".[353]

910. Asked by the Inquiry if he had a sense that the military were agitating to make sure that they had a role, Sir David Manning replied that he needed to be "very careful" about that. He had not seen any papers suggesting that and it seemed to him that the military adopted different positions at different times.[354] In the "spring/summer of 2002", the military wanted Mr Blair to understand the limits on what they could deliver. But, by autumn 2002, he sensed that "reluctance" had "shifted to an enthusiasm for taking part", and the "pressure" was to offer Package 3.

911. Asked by the Inquiry whether the US had requested a particular military scale of contribution from the UK, Mr Blair said:

> "No. He [President Bush] very much left this to us, to decide what we wanted to do, but I had taken a view that this was something that, if it was right to do, actually it mattered to have Britain there …"[355]

912. The military arguments for the UK offering to lead a division in the North reflected discussions with the US and the UK military assessment of the requirements of the operation.

913. Lt Gen Fry told the Inquiry there had been a view that converging axes from north and south, and avoiding logistic congestion in Kuwait and the risks associated with transit through the Gulf, made "eminent military sense". The northern option offered tactical advantages. He had been "slightly more sanguine" about the length of the lines of communication through Turkey than some of his colleagues. There would also have been more freedom of manoeuvre and fewer bridging operations in the North.[356]

914. Lt Gen Fry told the Inquiry that the co-ordination of ground manoeuvre operations was difficult and dangerous, and it was best to separate land forces from different states so far as that was possible.[357]

915. Lt Gen Fry emphasised that thinking had been driven by the tactical advantages of "a certain degree of national independence" and the avoidance of the need to co-ordinate ground operations, not national ambition.[358]

What was the UK's desire to influence the US seeking to achieve, and was it a determining factor in the decision?

916. The importance of influencing the US was stated repeatedly in the papers produced by the MOD between the spring and autumn of 2002.

917. Most MOD witnesses suggested that the scale of the UK contribution would have an impact on the degree of influence it would be possible to exert on the US, and in particular on military planning.

918. General Sir Mike Jackson, Commander in Chief Land Command in 2002, told the Inquiry that it was important to have a substantial land component to influence US planning and its execution.[359]

919. Asked by the Inquiry if there was a direct relationship between the size of the contribution and the degree of influence the UK would have, Gen Jackson replied that it was not "a linear relationship", but there was firm connection.[360]

920. Asked by the Inquiry why the UK was "so keen to send a division", Lord Boyce replied:

> "I think it was only by having something of that particular size that we thought we would have a reasonable influence on how the Americans were going to conduct the campaign."[361]

921. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

> "… unless and until we had ground force commitments, we did not have the inside track on planning or influence on the day after or the general conduct of affairs, including … holding the Americans to a multi-lateral track and … exhausting the arms control route and trying to deal with this through disarmament."[362]

922. Sir Kevin added that one of the lessons of the UK experience in the 1990-1991 Gulf Conflict was that:

> "In 1990, we learned that, once we committed ourselves to a ground force contribution, the planning process opened completely … and we were able to influence it, and that experience … still influenced the way we thought …"[363]

923. Sir Kevin subsequently stated that the lesson the UK had drawn from the 1991 Gulf Conflict was that only "ground forces in significant numbers" really secured influence; and that demonstrating commitment would put the UK in a better position to influence US behaviour "and the way in which Saddam and his regime perceived the seriousness of our position".[364]

924. Lt Gen Fry told the Inquiry that "the larger the contribution we made, the more influence we felt we would have over American planning and the ability to shape things in the future".[365]

925. Asked in what specific areas it was thought, in the second half of 2002, British influence could apply, Lt Gen Fry replied:

> "… we felt at a tactical level we might be able to influence the Americans in certain ways … about the conduct of operations, and to a certain extent that was true. I don't think we ever fundamentally influenced their level of military ambition or necessarily even their scheme of manoeuvre, but I think we did assist and shape their views in some ways.
> "But I think … the full benefit that this should have given the UK was never going to be visible to me, because it seems to me that it was the military contribution … which brought the influence which should then have been deployed at governmental and diplomatic levels."[366]

926. The debate in the MOD suggests that there was no unanimity about whether significant ground forces were required to influence the US or that could be achieved by the forces within Package 2.

927. On 9 October, ACM Squire stated that Package 2 would "not entail a loss of influence".

928. On 15 October Mr Hoon wrote: "In principle, both packages could strengthen that relationship: Package 2 alone should easily surpass any other conceivable non-US contribution, except perhaps that of Turkey."

929. Gen Reith told the Inquiry that he was not sure that it had been necessary to provide significant numbers to secure influence. It was the UK's "niche capabilities" and the quality of the advice it provided to US commanders that gave the UK influence.[367]

930. The advice to Mr Hoon and Mr Blair did not distinguish clearly between a desire and ability to influence US military planning on the one hand and wider and more strategic objectives on the other.

931. There was a perception that the UK would be able to influence, and if necessary delay, the timing of the military campaign. That was initially seen as desirable to give more time for inspections and the strategy of coercion to work and to build domestic and international support for action.

932. A later timescale was also desirable if UK ground forces were to be ready to participate in combat operations.

933. The argument that the UK would be unable to influence the conduct of the US military campaign without a significant and active role in combat operations is self-evidently true. The key question is, however, whether the influence achieved was commensurate with the scale of the UK contribution.

934. The degree to which the UK was able to influence the planning and conduct of the military campaign is difficult to determine, as Section 8 states.

935. The extent to which the offer of Package 3 rather than Package 2 was driven by the view that it would materially affect the UK's ability to influence the US at the political level, or that it would have a lasting impact on the strategic relationship between the US and UK is debatable.

936. Mr Blair regarded the decision as a strategic choice for the UK. He told the Inquiry: "If you are there with a bigger force alongside the Americans than otherwise, then, of course, you will be more intimately involved, but that's not really the reason."[368]

937. Asked whether he saw a correlation between the size of the UK contribution and its influence with the US, Mr Jonathan Powell told the Inquiry that he did not think that was true.[369]

938. Asked by the Inquiry whether he thought offering Package 3 had been essential, Mr Powell replied: "No"; the two reasons which had "militated in favour" of that decision were:

[368] Public hearing, 29 January 2010, page 62.
[369] Public hearing, 18 January 2010, page 91.

- First, the military wanted to participate at a command level and thought that standing by the US was important to the relationship with the US military "on which they crucially depended".
- Second, Mr Blair "felt that, if we were going to do it, we should be with the Americans properly".[370]

939. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that the reasons for participating in a land invasion "should be for state reasons, for political reasons".[371] In his view, what the US particularly wanted was use of bases, "Cyprus and Diego Garcia", Special Forces and aircraft.

940. Sir David Manning acknowledged that the relationship between the size of the UK contribution and the degree of influence it bought was "not a wholly spurious argument".[372] There had been Defence Reviews which:

> "… argued that we must be capable of fighting with the Americans in hot wars, and if we suddenly show we can't do that, we are not willing to do that, that changes the perspective."

941. But Sir David added that was, in his view, not a "clinching argument" in relation to Iraq. The UK's "willingness to take our fair share had been very clear in Afghanistan". He did not feel that the UK's "influence was likely to suffer particularly if we said there's a limit to what we can do".

942. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that the decision "was not a narrow military issue"; it should be considered in the context of Mr Blair's policy that the disarmament of Saddam Hussein was the most important single thing to do at that stage. In that broader context, it was, therefore:

> "… very valid for us to seek to make a significant contribution … to international stability."[373]

943. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that in his view it had been "recognised ultimately" that the decision on Package 3 "was a political judgement for the Prime Minister, in terms of the wider picture of the kind of things we had been discussing in terms of influence and coherence".[374]

944. Mr Hoon's minute of 15 October suggested that Mr Blair should attach conditions to the offer of Package 3. There is no indication that the UK did so.

What factors influenced the timing of the decision?

945. The uncertainties about the US timetable for military action, including the impact of the timetable for inspections following adoption of a UN resolution, made it hard to identify a precise date by when decisions on preparations would have had to have been taken.

946. The MOD was, however, anxious about the need to make timely preparations to equip, train and deploy the agreed force package if it was to keep the option of a land contribution on the table.

947. Package 3 in October 2002 was based on a square armoured brigade, which constituted only a medium scale capability, but the deployment of a divisional headquarters and the demands of the northern option for logistic support increased the number of personnel it was estimated would be required to a total of 28,000, including 7,700 Reserves.

948. Lt Gen Pigott had advised Mr Hoon on 24 May that three months' warning would be needed to deploy a medium scale joint force, and six months' warning would be needed to deploy a large scale war-fighting land force. The latter would be better prepared and carry fewer risks if nine months warning was available.

949. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

> "… if politicians wanted certain options, you had to have enough time to prepare …"[375]

950. In the event, as Section 6.2 shows, the size and shape of the UK contribution changed very significantly in January when the decision was made to deploy for operations in southern Iraq. The roles for two of the three UK brigades were not decided until March 2003.

951. The Government's stated objective was to keep the option of a significant UK land contribution open.

952. In the MOD's advice to Mr Hoon, and in his advice to Mr Blair, a range of arguments were set out of differing weight and significance in support of the MOD position that a decision was needed in October 2002 to offer significant ground forces to the US for planning purposes on the same basis as the forces in Package 2 if the UK was to have a significant role in ground combat operations.

953. The timing of the decision on 31 October to offer ground forces to the US on the same basis as Package 2 appears to have been driven primarily by the MOD advice of 29 October that the option of UK participation in ground operations through Turkey was at risk of being excluded from CENTCOM's planning by default, and Adm Boyce's advice in Mr Blair's meeting on 31 October that US planning was proceeding on the basis that there would not be a UK land contribution.

954. Mr Hoon's oral evidence to the Inquiry suggested that the US had given the impression that, in the absence of a firm decision, it was discounting a UK contribution.

955. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that, in October, the UK had:

> "… pretty much assumed that the Americans had discounted the prospect of … [Package 3] and were planning without our involvement, simply because we had not taken the decisions that were required in the timescale that was at that stage required."[376]

956. Mr Hoon stated:

> "… by October … we had had this discussion on several occasions … my understanding, by the middle of October, was that the Americans were assuming we wouldn't be there … on the land [option] … So essentially … what I was really saying to the Prime Minister was, 'You have got to decide. You have got to decide whether we are going to offer this third option and this package of an armoured division on the land' … eventually … probably as late as the very end of October, that decision was then taken."[377]

957. Evidence about CENTCOM's position in documents at the time, including Adm Boyce's discussion with Gen Franks on 10 October, Mr Johnson's advice to Mr Hoon of 25 October, and Mr Bowen's report of the Chiefs of Staff discussion on 26 October, indicated that CENTCOM continued to plan on the basis that the UK might offer a land contribution.

958. The US Administration wanted UK support and bases for political as well as military reasons.

959. It is not clear what specific information caused Adm Boyce and Mr Hoon to advise in late October 2002 that the US was planning on the basis there would be no UK land contribution.

Were the post-conflict implications for the UK, of a significant role on the ground in an invasion of Iraq, properly addressed?

960. The MOD advice and Mr Hoon's minute of 15 October argued that a combat role would be time limited, and that it would help the UK avoid a significant and protracted military involvement in Iraq post-conflict.

---

[376] Public hearing, 19 January 2010, page 36.
[377] Public hearing, 19 January 2010, pages 45-46.

961. As Sir David Manning foresaw in his advice of 16 October, however, far from reducing the risk of significant commitments post-conflict, contributing ground forces created significant obligations and responsibilities for the UK post-conflict.

962. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that there was a sense that it was better to be in Iraq at the beginning of any operation, rather than go in later for a peacekeeping operation without having prior experience and information.[378] There were also concerns that would require more troops for longer.

963. Sir Kevin Tebbit confirmed that one of the arguments for offering land forces for combat operations was that the MOD had not wanted "to get caught in the role of follow-on forces because then we could find ourselves even more bogged down and under even greater pressure to stay for longer than we felt … sensible".[379] The UK had been caught anyway, although Sir Kevin suggested that taking part in the invasion had made it easier to reduce UK force levels after the conflict than it would have been if the force had deployed only for post-conflict tasks.

964. The recognition of that responsibility in the planning for post-conflict operations is addressed in Sections 6.4 and 6.5.

Did the need to maintain the Army's morale influence the decision?

965. The MOD and No.10 both raised the question of whether there could be an issue of managing morale if the Army was not involved in combat operations.

966. The balance of the evidence suggests that none of the key decision-takers regarded that as a decisive factor in the decision, which would clearly have been inappropriate.

967. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that, at the meeting on 31 October, Adm Boyce had said that some inside the Army were irritated not to be more involved.[380] Mr Campbell commented that Adm Boyce was "hard to read, sometimes giving the impression none of them wanted anything to do with this, then at others giving the impression they all wanted to be off to the front line".

968. In his book, The New Machiavelli, Mr Powell wrote that Adm Boyce had told No.10 that the Armed Forces wanted to participate on the ground at "division strength with their own command"; and that it would damage morale if they were restricted to a mere supporting role from sea and air while the Americans and others carried out the ground campaign.[381]

969. Asked if the argument was that it would sustain morale in the Army had been a factor in the decision, Mr Powell told the Inquiry:

> "The military indicated to us that it would be important for morale that we were involved properly, yes."[382]

970. Asked about Mr Powell's evidence to the Inquiry on morale, General the Lord Walker, Chief of the General Staff from April 2000 to February 2003, told the Inquiry that that was "not something" he had had "any anxiety about". There might have been "expressions of exasperation" at the "lower levels" in the Army if it was not involved, but it was not an issue as far as he was concerned.[383]

971. Asked how important the issues of morale and the standing of the British Army had been in terms of not wanting to be left out of a major campaign, Gen Jackson told the Inquiry that, if it had gone ahead without a land component, he thought "the army would have been, to put it mildly, rather disappointed".[384]

972. Asked if the issue had been discussed by the Army Board, Gen Jackson stated that he could not remember precisely, but he had "very little doubt that the Army Board's view would have been as I have just outlined". He had been "mystified" in relation to the thinking behind the "opening offer", but over the autumn [of 2002] a "more balanced contribution came into being".

973. Asked whether the impact of Army morale had been a factor which had been put to him, and through him to Mr Blair, Mr Hoon replied:

> "I don't recall the argument being put to me in quite those terms. I … was well aware of the tremendous qualities of our Armed Forces and their desire to be used and … participate.
> "So there was a sense, particularly amongst the Army, that they didn't want to be left out. But … I wouldn't have regarded that … as something that you put on the table and say it was a major factor in the decision-making."[385]

974. Mr Hoon added that there was a sense that the Army "wanted to play their part", and that made the decision easier because they were saying "if necessary we can play our part".

975. Mr Hoon's own comments on that point in the minute he sent to Mr Blair, which differed from the MOD position, approved by Adm Boyce, set out in Mr Johnson's advice of 11 October, supports that position.

976. Mr Straw told the Inquiry:

> "The interesting thing … was that from an early stage it was the Chief of the Defence Staff who had argued very strongly that if we were going to get involved in the military action, the Army had to be there, because they would be unhappy and cross if they weren't. I don't trivialise the way it was put across … So we could have provided facilitation and then go[ne] in afterwards, which would not have meant standing down the troops we had in theatre and it was essentially what the Spanish and the Italians did."[386]

977. Asked about the weight he had attached to Adm Boyce's advice on morale, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he had asked:

> "… the military for their view, and their view in this instance was that they were up for doing it and that they preferred to be right at the centre of things … that was my view too. I thought, if it was right for us to be in it, we should be in it there alongside our principal ally, the United States."[387]

978. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that in late 2002, Adm Boyce had "said he would have a real problem with the Army if they were not fully involved".[388]

979. Asked about Mr Blair and Mr Powell's comments, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that, "of course the Army would want to be engaged in a war".[389] If they had been unable to deploy because of the firefighters' strike and:

> "… everybody else went to war you can imagine how they would have felt. They are trained to fight. They are the most professional army in the world. They would be sitting around and hosing down houses while the Marines, the Navy and Air Force would be busy. What do you think they would think? They would be disappointed they weren't involved. So yes. It would have been untruthful of me not to represent that to the Prime Minister which I did.
> "It was not a factor of saying if you don't do this the Army are going to mutiny or to want to go home or whatever. Of course not. It would be wrong not to have apprised him of the fact that the Army would be dismayed if they weren't engaged … particularly having been as successful as they had been during Desert Storm in 1991."

980. Asked whether, in relation to Package 3, the Chief of the General Staff had been reluctant to take on "yet another commitment" or was "nervous about being left out", Lord Boyce told the Inquiry he did not "recall … any reluctance"; "it was just a professional judgement … an option which he could deliver".[390]

Were the other risks of offering ground forces fully identified and considered?

981. The decision to offer ground forces (Package 3) to the US for planning purposes was a significant step. Once the offer was made, it would have been difficult to withdraw. This constrained the UK's subsequent policy choices.

982. There is no evidence that the extent to which the offer of Package 3 might constrain the UK's future choices was a factor in Mr Blair's decision.

983. The risks associated with the decision, and with other options, were not examined by senior Ministers in a collective discussion on the basis of coherent inter-departmental analysis and advice.

984. The decision to offer Package 2 – UK maritime and air forces, Special Forces and niche capabilities – to the US for planning purposes in September 2002 was relatively uncontroversial and was not seen as exposing the UK to significant risk.

985. The offer of significant forces for ground operations for planning purposes was not the same as a decision to commit the forces to military operations, but it did raise more difficult issues of both a practical and political nature.

986. The advice for Mr Hoon and Mr Blair in October 2002, however, did not explicitly address a number of crucial strategic issues which had previously been identified, including:

- the implications of the mismatch between US and UK strategic objectives;
- the risk of having to make a choice between the US and the UN route because of tension between the US military timetable and that for UN inspections;
- the degree to which offering Package 3 and deeper engagement in US planning might constrain future choices more than the offer of Packages 1 and 2; and
- the potential damage to the UK/US relationship if the UK subsequently decided it would not participate in military action.

987. Sir Kevin Tebbit had set out his concerns in his minute to Mr Hoon of 3 July and his letter to Sir David Manning of 19 July.

988. The issues had also been identified in the papers prepared for the Chiefs of Staff.

989. While it would theoretically have been open to the UK to withdraw the offer at any time, the Chiefs of Staff themselves considered, on 9 October, that a UK withdrawal after Exercise Internal Look, in December 2002, would have unpalatable diplomatic consequences.

990. Mr Hoon's minute of 15 October was sent to Mr Straw, Mr Brown and Sir Andrew Turnbull, and Mr Watkins' advice of 29 October was sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Brown and to Mr Bowen. The issues were discussed in two meetings chaired by Mr Blair, on 17 October and 31 October, at which Mr Straw was present as well as Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce.

991. In the context of questioning about the Government's decision-making machinery and whether Mr Blair was being given military advice which addressed the implications and challenges, Sir David Manning stated that he was sure that the MOD was "intent on giving him the best advice they possibly could about the military commitment".[391]

992. Mr Blair had expressed his concerns about cost and Treasury officials had raised the issues with Mr Brown, but Mr Brown was not at the meetings on 17 and 31 October.

993. As Section 7 sets out, decisions of this importance, which raise a number of challenging questions, are best addressed by a Cabinet Committee. Collective and regular consideration by a small group of senior Ministers, whether or not formally designated as a Cabinet Committee, would have been able to explore more thoroughly:

- what the UK was seeking to achieve;
- how its national interests might best be served;
- the options available and their advantages, disadvantages and risks; and
- whether offering Package 3 to the US at that time was the best option in the circumstances.

994. There would also have been advantages in ensuring the MOD analysis was examined by a small group of senior officials before advice for Ministers was finalised.

995. Mr Blair had told Cabinet on 24 October that "military options" would be discussed in due time. Cabinet did not discuss military action until 17 March 2003.

UK pursuit of the northern option

Discussions with the US about Turkey's position

996. Following the agreement to offer Package 3 to the US, the UK military preference for land operations remained in the North although, by early November, the US was suggesting that the UK should look at other options.

997. On 31 October, Mr Hoon telephoned Secretary Rumsfeld to inform him of the decision to offer Package 3 and that a UK contribution might comprise a divisional HQ, an armoured brigade, artillery and logistic support for an operation in the North.[392] That was, "of course, all subject to final political decisions here on recourse to military action". Mr Hoon asked to be alerted to any slippage in US military planning timetables.

---

998. Referring to the potential difficulties with Turkey, Secretary Rumsfeld asked if UK forces would be available for operations in the South. Mr Hoon replied that the UK was open to ideas but had so far focused on the North because the US would have plenty of their own forces in the South and space would be limited.

999. Sir David Manning flew to Washington on 31 October for talks with Dr Rice, Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, and Mr Armitage.

1000. Sir David advised Mr Blair that he had told Dr Rice that the UK "continued to plan for a possible UK military role in northern Iraq, if the shooting started".[393]

1001. Sir David wrote that they had discussed:

- Whether a UK military force would be permitted to transit through Turkey.
- The fact that "the UN inspection timetable was now out of sync with the timetable for possible military action beginning in early January". He had asked "whether we might now be looking at the second of the original 'windows' ie a campaign next winter rather than this". That had not been ruled out but the conversation had shifted to the prospects for internal regime change sparing the need for military action. The best chance of securing that was "a very tough UN resolution accompanied by threatening military preparations, in the hope that Saddam's system would implode under the strain".

1002. Other issues discussed, including Sir David's suggestion of "a new wariness at the heart of the [US] Administration", are addressed in Section 3.5.

1003. Mr Rycroft reported a "strong impression" that the US expected "Turkish objections to a UK military presence to be insistent and difficult to overcome". There had been a mixed response to the question of whether the US would be prepared to expend political capital helping the UK.[394] Mr Rycroft added:

- Mr Armitage had told Sir David that the US would do "whatever is necessary" to get the UK into Turkey.
- Secretary Powell had told Sir David Manning on 1 November that he was unsure about Turkey's real position and had "lots of military questions" about the northern route.

- "Less encouragingly", Dr Rice had implied that the US would not be prepared to expend much political capital in securing Turkey's agreement to a UK deployment through Turkey.

1004. The British Embassy in Washington reported on 1 November that it has been made abundantly clear to the US Administration that there were likely to be difficulties in mounting UK operations through Turkey, and the NSC and Secretary Rumsfeld had accepted this. Some senior voices in the US Administration were strongly advising the UK to consider other options.[395]

1005. In Washington on 5 November, Sir Kevin Tebbit pressed senior officials in the State Department, Pentagon and NSC to press the Turkish Government on UK military deployments in Turkey.[396]

1006. Sir Kevin argued that a UK contribution in the North "made the greatest political and military sense", and that Turkish misgivings about a Kurdish state and lack of support for Turkey's EU candidacy were "misplaced". He had explained that all the UK's planning had "thus far been predicated on the northern route" and the UK "had not considered alternatives". He believed other options "would present both political and military problems". The military package the UK was considering had been "tailored" to that role and "was not something that could be fitted in anywhere".

1007. Senior members of the US Administration offered differing views on the strength of Turkey's concern. Those in the Pentagon and NSC suggested that the UK should look at other options. One official in the NSC suggested that, if it was not feasible for the UK to operate from the South or West, it was "imperative" that the UK should tell the US "as clearly as possible".

1008. Sir David Manning and Mr Powell were concerned by the position Sir Kevin had taken.

1009. Mr Powell asked: "Why on earth has he gone down this track?"[397]

1010. Sir David replied: "I wish I knew. The MOD seem to have their own agenda. I can only assume they are mad keen still on their northern option (Package 3)."[398]

1011. Mr Powell wrote that he would talk to Mr Hoon.[399]

Military planning for the northern option

1012. When the Chiefs of Staff met on 6 November they noted that there were two options for the employment of a UK land force in the North: either integration in a division under US command or the formation of a separate division, for which the UK would provide the HQ and a square brigade, possibly sweeping up Coalition partners.[400]

1013. The meeting was also informed that:

- The total UK contribution "currently remained Medium Scale" and it did not follow that the UK contribution would increase in the event that Op FRESCO was no longer required.
- Ministers had "yet to be exposed" to work on a "Force-on-Mind and media strategy" to cover the period immediately after the UN resolution was adopted.
- Package 3 had been "well received by the US".
- Until further notice, discussions on UK deployment through Turkey would be "taken forward through the US".

1014. The Chiefs of Staff also considered a short paper produced by PJHQ on the practicalities of conducting military operations during an Iraqi summer.[401] The paper concluded that military operations would be possible but at reduced tempo and with increased risk.

1015. The Chiefs of Staff noted the advice and asked for a revised paper within a month.[402]

1016. Sir David Manning sent Mr Blair the MOD paper and Mr Bowen's minute summarising its contents.[403] Sir David also wrote that he had sought Secretary Powell's views when he had been in Washington the previous week.

SPG PAPER, 6 NOVEMBER 2002

1017. A fifth version of the SPG paper 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq' was produced on 6 November.[404] This set out three "broad Courses of Action (COA) to deliver the end state":

- Diplomatic & Coercion: a UN resolution and inspections. The UK Government's main effort ("ME") was creating and sustaining the resolution of the international community. Saddam Hussein would need to be convinced that the international community was "serious, but equally that compliance" would "reap its rewards" and he was "not in a zero sum game". The SPG judged that a coercive strategy "must offer carrots as well as sticks" to "achieve a change" in the behaviour of the Iraqi regime "without conflict". It also required a "continued credible threat of force".

- Diplomatic/Force: UN inspections failed "at some point" and the international community resorted to the use of force "with UN authorisation".
- Force: Early failure of the UN route and either no UN resolution or an inadequate one and a US-led Coalition resorting to the use of force without a UN mandate.

1018. The section on post-conflict issues had been substantially revised. It stated that the "lasting impression of Coalition legitimacy and success" would be "determined by the nature of the Iraqi nation" that emerged after the conflict. That had the potential to "prove the most protracted and costly" phase of the campaign.

1019. In its summary of the implications of the post-conflict phase for military planning, the paper stated:

- The impact of any enduring commitment on other operations would be significant. A recommendation on the size of force the UK is prepared to commit must be prepared, at least for the key six months following any operation …
- Planning for Resolution Phase operations must be complete before the start of offensive operations. Any UK land force HQ must have the capacity to conduct offensive and Resolution Phase operations concurrently.
- … clarity on post-Resolution Phase and likely UK contribution will be needed before operations commence."

1020. The post-conflict issues raised by the SPG are addressed in Section 6.4.

1021. A new section addressed the problems the Coalition would face if Saddam Hussein adopted a "Fortress Baghdad" strategy. The SPG stated that the Coalition could not "engage in drawn out urban conflict":

> "Loss of tempo, rising casualties and humanitarian efforts would undermine Coalition will to continue and rapidly alienate regional supporters."

1022. The SPG proposed:

- maintaining the moral and legal high ground by minimising civilian casualties, collateral damage and own casualties;
- trying to avoid fighting in built up areas and to "guard and bypass" towns and cities, including denying access to Baghdad, during offensive operations;
- attempting decapitation of the regime;
- isolation of security forces still loyal to the regime and subversion through "aggressive" information and psychological operations;
- dominating the rest of the country and implementing the "resolution phase";

- "when ready", conducting "operations to complete the defeat of the surviving loyal elements"; and
- ensuring that a "massive humanitarian aid effort" was available "to provide life support to non-combatants".

1023. Other new points identified in the paper included:

- Draft objectives for a northern option remained under consideration by the Pentagon.
- The UK was "seeking to place" force generation and preparation efforts "in an appropriate framework to determine their effect and timing" in the "Force on Mind campaign".
- The adoption of the UN track meant that the timing of a military operation might "shift to the point of failure of UN processes" and might be required in "hot months". The SPG's initial assessment was that the UK would "be able to continue operations" but it was "feasible that, at some point", the risk might "become unacceptable".
- Mitigation measures were being identified to address the risk of attacks using chemical and biological weapons and residual hazards after the military campaign.
- The CENTCOM plan included "sequential ground attack into Iraq from SE Turkey to coincide with the main effort attack of V Corps forces in the South … the northern option … built upon the 4th Infantry Division of the US Army". That might "include UK Package 3 forces pending political decision". Command and control procedures and the likelihood of delivering a Corps Headquarters for the force had "yet to be determined".

1024. The preference for the northern option was stressed by Major General Robin Brims, the General Officer Commanding (GOC) 1st (UK) Armoured Division, when he met Lieutenant General David McKiernan, Commander, Coalition Forces Land Component Command, on 10 November.[405] Although possible operations in the South were discussed, Maj Gen Brims reported that Lt Gen McKiernan and his superiors wanted UK forces to be used in the North.

1025. Brigadier Albert Whitley was deployed to Lt Gen McKiernan's HQ in Kuwait in early November as Senior British Land Advisor (SBLA).[406] He was "involved in planning for UK military action and participation" and asked by Lt Gen McKiernan, in the absence of a dedicated Corps headquarters, to lead a joint UK/US team to plan an attack from Turkey.

1026. On 11 November, Maj Gen Fry asked for more guidance on the likely Phase IV tasks for the UK; and whether he should assume that a general role in Phase III implied involvement in Phase IV.[407] If so, he asked where the UK would want to be. After highlighting some of the advantages and disadvantages of the North and South, he asked whether the UK would be prepared to be involved in operations against Baghdad.

1027. The MOD has been unable to locate any response to this request.[408]

Adoption of resolution 1441

Resolution 1441 was adopted on 8 November 2002.[409]

The content of the resolution and the Explanations of Vote provided by the members of the Security Council are addressed in Section 3.5.

US REQUEST FOR SUPPORT FROM ALLIES

1028. The US asked the UK and other allies for military support on 15 November.

1029. The US formally requested UK and other allies' support on 15 November on the grounds that "planning for potential military action is both necessary to increase the pressure on Iraq to comply with the will of the international community and prudent in the event it again refuses to do".[410]

1030. The US request, which was handed to Mr Hoon on 18 November, included:

- "full access, basing and overflight at bases in Britain, Diego Garcia and Cyprus";
- an armoured division (minus);
- special operations forces;
- "Royal Navy and Air Force units, including maritime patrols and aircraft";
- explosive ordnance disposal;
- "Financial/material resources for a military campaign and for post-conflict efforts";
- "constabulary forces and humanitarian assistance as part of post-conflict stability efforts"; and
- "nuclear/biological/chemical defense assets".

1031. Mr Hoon replied to the US request on 26 November.[411]

[411] Letter Hoon to Farish, 26 November 2002, [untitled] attaching Paper [undated], 'United Kingdom Response to United States Government Talking Points delivered on 18 November 2002'.

1032. The key points were that the UK:

- Assured the US "of its continued determination to see the disarmament of Iraq, by peaceful means if at all possible, but by force if necessary".
- Applauded "the leadership shown by the US Administration" and congratulated it on the "successful negotiation … of resolution 1441". The unanimity of the Security Council had sent "a powerful message from the international community to Iraq" which would be "strongly reinforced by the US Administration's initiative to build and sustain the widest possible support for any further action that may prove necessary".
- Confirmed that the "forces and facilities listed in the US request" were "available as a basis for planning" and were those that the UK "would expect to make available". Military staff and officials would "remain ready to … engage fully in further detailed planning and development of military options, including refinement of the potential UK contribution within the broad scale of effort … indicated".

1033. Mr Hoon commented that the issue of UK support to military action had "been the subject of bilateral work for some time" and he had, therefore, not repeated the detail. He was "very grateful for the excellent access" given to the UK and was "keen to maintain the close co-operation" that had "already been established".

PJHQ'S PROPOSAL TO EXPLORE OPTIONS IN THE SOUTH

1034. After the adoption of resolution 1441, significant questions about Turkey's position remained.

1035. Mr Westmacott reported that a Turkish statement on 8 November had welcomed the adoption of resolution 1441 and that it hoped Iraq would comply quickly; and that there was relief that the resolution made "war a little less likely".[412]

1036. PJHQ reported on 11 November that Maj Gen Fry was concerned that the difficulties with Turkey had not been fully acknowledged.[413] The paper being developed for the Chiefs of Staff should, therefore, examine both northern and southern options.

1037. No discussion of Iraq is recorded in the minutes of the Chiefs of Staff Committee on 13 November.[414]

[413] Email MA/DCJO to MA1/DCDS(C), 11 November 2002, 'Meeting with Lt Gen McKiernan'.
[414] Minutes, 13 November 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

1038. Mr Hoon was advised on 14 November that:

> "While it seemed likely that Turkey would accept US forces, negotiations would be protracted. The extent to which the US would press the Turks on our behalf was not clear."[415]

1039. The "public posture on specific military preparations" should remain "low key".

1040. Lt Gen Reith proposed that options in the South should also be explored.

1041. The paper considering options for a UK land contribution, submitted by Lt Gen Reith to the Chiefs of Staff on 18 November, advised that many of the assumptions behind the force levels in Package 3 offered to the Americans for planning purposes were no longer valid.[416] The US had "embraced the wider significance of the North" and allocated a US division to that axis, but it had withdrawn the offer of a US armoured brigade operating under UK command. The northern option would require a Corps level (three-star) HQ, which had "yet to be found"; and there was a US aspiration that the UK would contribute to and lead any "three-star" HQ in the North. The uncertainties about Turkish co-operation were also "a concern, preventing reconnaissance and creating logistic uncertainty".

1042. PJHQ had, therefore, "developed" four potential courses of action "in line with current US thinking: one in the North and three in the South, which were "feasible, although they [would] all require provision of an additional manoeuvre brigade".

1043. In the South, the UK would operate under US command. The paper expanded on the advantages and disadvantages of each course of action, including whether they offered a "high profile and worthwhile role" for the UK.

1044. Lt Gen Reith wrote:

> "Without Turkish co-operation, UK forces may be either excluded from participation or, if agreement is reached late, have their ability to participate in the early stages of the campaign in the North compromised. This would impact on the strategic simultaneity the plan is designed to achieve. To date, UK policy has been to allow the US to act as the principal interlocutors … The results … have left our position uncertain.
> "… If a decision is not made soon, the UK may need to engage directly with Tu[rkey] to achieve resolution."

1045. Lt Gen Reith recommended discounting options of integrating a UK brigade within a US division in the North and a UK division operating independently of the US. He suggested that it would be "feasible" for the UK and US to construct a Corps headquarters and that: "Command at 3-star level would restore the UK lead in the North, and also indicate tacit agreement for ownership of the northern Area of Operations (AO) in Phase IV."

1046. Lt Gen Reith advised that the northern option:

> "… could result in UK long-term leadership of the region during post-conflict operations: a position which the US would appear to favour. It would be a challenging area to control and develop, particularly in preserving regional stability between the Turks, Kurds and Sunnis. Whilst the UK has the necessary experience and capability, the challenges do need to be assessed in line with UK strategic guidance."

1047. In relation to operations in the South, the paper identified three options for a UK division:

- Operating as a "manoeuvre formation" within US V Corps.
- Operating as a "manoeuvre formation" within US I Marine Expeditionary Force (MEF).
- Operating as a "second echelon force" within US V US Corps.

1048. The paper considered that:

- Command and Control arrangements would be "less complex than in the North".
- The "shortened and simplified LOC [lines of communication] make all southern COA attractive … However, it should be recognised that US plans are well advanced in the South, there is very limited logistic space available … deployment would require considerable synchronisation with the US."
- "A post-conflict positioning of the UK division in the South could be attractive. The range of problems appears less-complex and diverse, the long-term force structure requirements could be reduced and local conditions are likely to be more conducive to development and influence. The northern … Gulf … is also a traditional area of UK influence."

1049. Lt Gen Reith concluded:

- Four options were "achievable" and offered "worthwhile tasks", but the UK needed to "reduce risk in its timetable for deployment and RSOI [Reception, Staging, Onward Movement and Integration]".
- All four feasible options would require "a UK division with integral capability for manoeuvre".
- The northern option offered "a high profile and worthwhile role for the UK".

- Without confirmation of Turkey's support, the UK would "need to continue planning for a southern option as well". The roles envisaged in the South were "worthwhile but less high profile" and there was an "implicit … risk of the UK engagement in operations in Baghdad" in two of the three options.

1050. The Chiefs of Staff were asked to indicate which course of action in the South they would prefer, and were reminded to consider "where we wish to be at the end of Phase III, as this could impact directly on any UK involvement in Phase IV".

1051. The Inquiry has not seen any detailed analysis underpinning Lt Gen Reith's conclusion that southern Iraq would be more manageable in the post-conflict period than the North.

MOD ADVICE FOR NO.10, 19 NOVEMBER 2002

1052. The MOD told No.10 on 19 November that the option of a military campaign launched on 6 January 2003 appeared to have lapsed, and the timelines were "uncertain".

1053. Mr Hoon recommended that the UK should press the US for clarity on the Turkish position.

1054. If the UK had to "fall back" on a role in the South, it would be looking for a role in the invasion rather than providing follow-on forces.

1055. MOD concerns about the importance of post-conflict operations and the need for work on the implications for the UK approach to the campaign are addressed in Section 6.4.

1056. Following the visits to the US by Sir Kevin Tebbit and Adm Boyce and in advance of the NATO Summit in Prague on 21 November and the planned debate on Iraq in the House of Commons on 25 November, Mr Watkins sent Sir David Manning an update on military discussions with the US.[417] He set out the themes which had emerged and registered a number of concerns, including the need to press the US to clarify Turkey's position.

1057. Mr Watkins wrote that there was a need to "continue military preparations to underpin the diplomacy/inspection track, without bringing forces to an unsustainable level of readiness". There was "a sense … that the realistic timetable for action was slipping" but there had been "no US political endorsement of any later date for planning purposes".

1058. Mr Watkins advised that the US continued to describe the northern front "as an essential part of the plan", but there was no clear agreement with Turkey "who had declined to be definitive pending the appointment of a new Government". The US might be “in for a long and expensive negotiation” and it was clear that the US priority would be “to secure basing” for its “own ground forces”.

---

1059. Mr Hoon believed that the UK should “up the ante” with the US, and: “Press for clarity on the Turkish position, one way or the other …”

1060. Mr Hoon wanted Sir David Manning to:

> “… reinforce with Condi Rice the need for the President to try to unblock this. If we do have to fall back on a southern role we should try to ensure that it is as part of the main effort rather than as follow-on forces.”

1061. Addressing UK military preparations, Mr Watkins wrote that the option of a military campaign launched on 6 January 2003 seemed to have “effectively lapsed” and the timelines were “uncertain”. The US military position was described as “get ready, but not too ready”, because they did “not want to bring too large a force to too high a pitch of readiness”.

1062. Mr Hoon recommended continuing with military preparations to keep options open, and suggested that the debate in the House of Commons on 25 November provided an opportunity to make some public reference to them.

1063. There was “a sense in the US” of “two broad timelines in play, implying two different plans”. The first was a “high-impact event to which the US might feel the need to respond quickly at short notice”. The second was a decision that a material breach had occurred which would be followed by a “more deliberative build-up to military action”.

1064. Each scenario was “problematic”:

- The first would effectively hand the initiative to Saddam Hussein; it might provoke a rapid response, but that could not be decisive because it could not involve sufficient land forces to take control of Iraq, “unless … it leads … to regime collapse, a scenario in which the US seem to invest quite a lot of hope”.
- The second would give Saddam Hussein time which he “might be able to exploit diplomatically and militarily”. A deliberate campaign “would require some 60-90 days’ build-up, and the time will soon come when the question has to be confronted of whether it is sensible to contemplate fighting in the summer”. A “common understanding” needed to be reached with the US and plans “shaped accordingly”.

1065. Addressing the issue of “Timetable and Triggers”, Mr Watkins wrote:

> “To some extent, triggers are now under Saddam’s control and so cannot be slotted into any firm timetable. Moreover, what constitutes a ‘violation’ and/or ‘material breach’ remains undefined: many in the US are reduced to saying ‘we’ll know when we see it’, which is not a suitable base for planning.”

1066. The MOD was also concerned that:

> "Lack of clarity in US thinking about possible triggers for military action needs to be resolved quickly, particularly in relation to the No-Fly Zones."

1067. If a Coalition aircraft was shot down, it would, "under long-standing plans, trigger a massive US response", which the US might use to trigger a wider campaign.

1068. Mr Hoon recommended working "quickly to reach an agreed US/UK view on triggers … well before we are confronted with it in practice", and explaining to the US that hostility in the No-Fly Zones should be met only by "self-defence responses".

1069. Mr Watkins also drew attention to the importance of planning for the "aftermath" of military action: "This needs to guide thinking on the conflict phase, for all sorts of reasons". Mr Hoon believed that the UK should: "Continue trying to influence US thinking on the aftermath, recognising that this is not something which can be neatly separated from any conflict phase".

1070. Copies of Mr Watkins' letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Brown, and to Mr Bowen.

1071. The discussion within the UK Government on the timetable and triggers for military action following the adoption of resolution 1441 is addressed in Sections 3.6 and 5.

UNCERTAINTIES ABOUT THE NORTHERN OPTION

1072. Adm Boyce decided on 20 November that it would be premature to discuss alternative options with the US while the UK was still trying to force a decision from Turkey. The northern option remained the firm preference of the Chiefs of Staff.

1073. The Chiefs of Staff also asked Lt Gen Reith to look at the option of providing two UK brigades.

1074. On 20 November, the Chiefs of Staff considered the options identified by Lt Gen Reith on 18 November.[418]

1075. The Chiefs of Staff were informed that the US had offered the UK a light brigade, but that was not suitable for the operation in the North. Lt Gen Reith would examine other options including the provision of two UK triangular brigades.

1076. Adm Boyce asked for:

- further advice on the northern force structure, including the employment of the ARRC; and
- "… further clarification on timelines before considering the Southern COAs."

---

[418] Minutes, 20 November 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

1077. Adm Boyce "was also clear that while the main effort was to force a decision from Tu[rkey] … the time was not right to open up alternative planning options with the US".

1078. The Chiefs of Staff also discussed:

- the debate on potential triggers for military action;
- the possibility of the rapid collapse of the Iraqi regime without military action; and
- the need to respond quickly to the formal US request for UK forces. That would be "unspecific" and would refer to further discussions in December.

1079. In CENTCOM, Maj Gen Wilson continued to tell his colleagues that the UK was "North, North and North", "but that it would be imprudent to dismiss other options if the Turkish door were to remain closed indefinitely".[419]

1080. On 21 November, Mr Blair confirmed that the UK would provide military support to the US if that was necessary.

1081. Mr Blair met Mr Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, Leader of the Adalet ve Kalkınma Partisi Justice and Development Party (AKP), in London on 20 November.[420] Mr Blair congratulated Mr Erdoğan on his election victory, and in the context of discussions on a range of issues, including UK support for EU membership for Turkey, the record of the meeting states they agreed the UK and Turkey "should keep in close contact over Iraq".

1082. In his bilateral discussion with President Bush at the NATO Summit in Prague on 21 November, Mr Blair confirmed that the UK would support the US militarily if necessary.[421]

1083. In response to a request for his views on military planning, Mr Blair said there was a need to be ready for military action early in the New Year and as soon as possible after it became clear that there was a material breach.

1084. In a meeting with Mr Hoon, Secretary Rumsfeld suggested that the UK should look at using its forces elsewhere than the North.[422]

1085. Mr Hoon replied that "deploying our forces to, say, Kuwait would affect our timelines".

1086. The meeting agreed Adm Boyce's suggestion that the UK "should keep planning with CENTCOM for a northern operation, while looking at possible fallbacks".

1087. Mr Hoon also sought clarification of the potential US response if Iraq shot down an aircraft, reminding Secretary Rumsfeld of the UK interpretation of the legal constraints on any response.

House of Commons debate, 25 November 2002

The House of Commons voted on 25 November to "support" resolution 1441 and agreed that, if the Government of Iraq failed "to comply fully" with its provisions, "the Security Council should meet in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance".[423]

Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons on 25 November and the subsequent debate on Iraq, which was opened by Mr Straw, are addressed in Section 3.6.

Before the debate, Mr Hoon agreed with Mr Blair and Mr Straw that, when he closed the debate, he should address the state of contingency planning, including the potential requirement for the call-up of military reserves. That would:

> "… be done in a low-key way, making clear that this was precautionary planning and that the context was our continued hope that Iraq would disarm peacefully in co-operation with the inspectors."[424]

In his speech closing the debate, Mr Hoon stated:

> "Neither Britain nor the United States is looking for a pretext for military action, which is always a grave step, and which will certainly be a last resort. No member of the Government will risk British lives unnecessarily."[425]

Mr Hoon stated that continuing with "the prudent preparations and planning necessary for military action" was the "only responsible course". But that did "not mean a commitment to take such action in any circumstances". It did mean that appropriate steps were being taken "to ensure that British forces" were "ready", and that they had "the training, equipment and support" that they would need "to undertake military action, should it prove necessary".[426]

Addressing the US request to "a number of countries" for "support in the event that military action proves necessary", Mr Hoon stated:

> "Although no decision has been made to commit UK forces to military action, discussions with the US will continue so that an appropriate British contribution can be identified should it prove necessary.
>
> "… There is no inevitability about military action. The US is clear about the fact that the issue is Iraqi disarmament …
> "Those who have accused the US of unilateralism should consider carefully. The US Government have followed an impeccably multilateral approach, first in building unanimous Security Council support for resolution 1441 and now in seeking to build broad-based support for military action should it be required … within the limits imposed by these uncertainties, we have been considering the contribution we might be able to make if military action ultimately becomes necessary.

"At this stage it would be inappropriate to go into details of the size and shape of forces that might be involved, for two specific reasons. First, as events unfold and time passes, plans will inevitably evolve. It would be misleading to describe specific force packages today as if they had some permanent and definitive status … Secondly, as I am sure the House appreciates, I have no intention of assisting Saddam Hussein's contingency planning."[427]

1088. By late November, there was growing recognition that the delay was likely to affect the UK's readiness to deploy ground forces in time to participate in the initial stage of the US plan; and that Turkey's agreement might not be forthcoming.

1089. Maj Gen Fry's advice, submitted to Adm Boyce on 22 November, suggested that it would take some four months from the order to deploy for the northern option (whether Package 2 or 3), and more than five months for the southern option.[428]

1090. Maj Gen Fry provided a discussion paper on the potential UK response to a Running Start to military operations on 25 November.[429] He asked the Chiefs of Staff to confirm if it wished the UK to be involved in early action against Iraq and the extent to which the UK should seek to match US timelines for the northern axis.

1091. The paper stated that the UK's ability to match US timelines for Package 3 and the Amphibious Ready Group was "in doubt", but the UK position was "recoverable" if a range of measures were "taken in the near future to reduce the overall risk and time". Early notification of the forces involved and availability of civilian shipping were identified as the most critical measures.

1092. Maj Gen Fry wrote that much of the information had been provided orally and the paper lacked some of the detail which would normally be required by the Chiefs of Staff.

1093. In a manuscript comment to Adm Boyce, one of his staff wrote that:

- The UK "could look v. silly if we could not take part in a running start".
- There was: "No argument for not starting" preparations for the call-out of Reserves.

- The deployment of the Amphibious Ready Group was “still to be decided”. Demand for logistics and support helicopters “concurrent with Package 3” would “detract from main effort for dubious military effect”.[430]

1094. In his manuscript comments Adm Boyce indicated his agreement with the first two comments above, and wrote “Yes” alongside the request for confirmation that the UK should be involved in early action.[431]

1095. The Chiefs of Staff meeting on 27 November was informed that:

> “If the UK wished to match US timelines and UK political expectations, Ministerial approval for a more forward leaning military posture was required.”[432]

1096. Maj Gen Fry stated that neither the ARG, which was “an integral part” of the US plan, nor Package 3 could meet US aspirations for a Running Start. PJHQ had identified a series of measures which would allow them to “close towards or match US timelines”.

1097. The Chiefs of Staff invited PJHQ to refine its advice with a view to seeking convergence with US timelines.

1098. A “Post Meeting Direction” instructed PJHQ to provide advice “on the advantages and disadvantages of deploying the ARG”, including deploying “manoeuvre elements” [Royal Marines] and the implications for chartered shipping.

1099. In Adm Boyce’s absence, the meeting was chaired by ACM Bagnall.

1100. The MOD informed No.10 on 29 November that the US political strategy remained unclear but CENTCOM was seeking to reduce the lead time between a political decision and military action.

1101. A gap was developing between the readiness of US and UK forces, which would need visible action to address.

1102. If Turkey did not agree to UK forces, more political guidance would be needed before the MOD could go far in developing other options.

1103. Sir David Manning wrote to Mr Watkins on 27 November, requesting a note for Mr Blair on the progress of US planning.[433] He asked: “Are our Chiefs of Staff content with the US plans and ready to support them?” He also asked how the UK would participate if the northern option was not available.

1104. Advice to Mr Hoon on a draft response noted that it:

> "… deliberately does not answer directly the question, (which looks like a hospital pass), whether the COS [Chiefs of Staff] are content with the US plans and ready to support them … CENTCOM … is keeping options open. It is probably misleading to think of the US as having firm plans … We also need to beware of allowing the tail to wag the dog. What we need to know first is whether the US government has a political plan and strategy with which HMG is content."[434]

1105. The MOD advised Sir David Manning on 29 November that it was "misleading to talk of firm 'plans'", not just because of unresolved practical issues such as Turkish co-operation, but also because the US political strategy remained "unclear".[435]

1106. There had been "a significant shift in US military planning" as CENTCOM sought to "reduce the lead times between a political decision and military action". Secretary Rumsfeld had signed a number of deployment orders to take effect in early January, and the US was "increasingly moving beyond pure planning into at least some actual forward deployments". That would have the advantages of improving the prospects of any "running start" operation, and provide better options for a rapid stabilisation mission in the event that the Iraqi regime suddenly collapsed, while keeping open the possibility of more deliberate build-up before the summer of 2003.

1107. A "gap" between the UK's readiness and that of the US was:

> "… now beginning to develop …
> "… the employment of the amphibious element (yet to be endorsed by the Chiefs of Staff) of Package 2 and the additional land contribution in Package 3 are falling increasingly behind their US counterparts in terms of readiness."

1108. As any steps to close that gap would require "further visible activity", Ministers would "need to consider how far they are prepared to go and how they would present such steps publicly, against a background of continuing uncertainty, including on Turkey".

1109. The MOD stated that US planning on the North remained "very much work in progress", but it was "clear that a UK-led division could play a significant role, both during and immediately after conflict": "But the foundation for this – Turkish acceptance of a UK force – is not in place."

1110. If Turkey was ruled out:

> "… we would need to discuss here and with the US what other role we could play; in particular, whether … they would be prepared to adjust their timings and sequencing in such a way as to allow a UK force to play a role in the main effort. But we are conscious that the current Package 3 was constructed and agreed on the premise of playing a role in the North, and more political guidance would be needed before we could go far in developing other options."

1111. On 3 December, Mr Straw was warned that Turkey might not be able to meet all requests for support.

1112. Mr Paul Wolfowitz, the US Deputy Secretary of Defense, met Mr Hoon on 2 December in London.[436]

1113. The record of the meeting noted that it would be difficult to secure the UK's passage through Turkey, although there were some indications that might be possible as long as UK forces did not linger long in northern Iraq. Mr Hoon was reported to have said that would suit the UK as they wished to get forces in and out quickly.

1114. At a separate meeting with Sir Kevin Tebbit and Adm Boyce the same day, Mr Wolfowitz asked if there would be a delay if UK forces were switched to the South.[437] Adm Boyce:

"… responded that there was no plan for the South, and that if [Gen] Franks wanted [the] UK in [the] South, he would have to articulate what the scope and task would be. All that could be said with any confidence was that a time premium would have to be paid."

1115. In a meeting in Ankara on 3 December, Mr Straw told Mr Abdullah Gül, the Turkish Prime Minister, that the UK would probably make similar requests to the US for Turkish support.[438] Mr Straw was warned that the Turkish Government would need the permission of Parliament to allow foreign troops on Turkish soil and that Turkey might not be able to meet all requests; if the UK were planning to send forces it must talk to Turkey.

1116. Mr Westmacott observed that there was "no doubt that Turkish co-operation would be hard to obtain in the absence of a new SCR [Security Council Resolution] specifically authorising military action".[439]

JIC Assessment, 6 December 2002: 'Iraq: Military Options'

1117. A JIC Assessment of Iraq's military options on 6 December confirmed that a massive coalition ground force would be required to be certain of toppling Saddam Hussein and highlighted the possibility of Iraqi attacks on Coalition Forces in the event of a phased start to a military campaign.

1118. At the request of the MOD, the JIC evaluated Iraq's military capabilities and "what military options Iraq has, and which it is likely to pursue a) during Coalition air strikes and b) during a Coalition ground attack".[440]

1119. In the JIC discussion on 4 December, the draft was described as "an important paper which highlighted the gaps in our knowledge". The judgements were based "largely on a mixture of observation and past experience", but the Assessment "did not quite do justice to the intelligence"; the judgements "could be made more confidently". The Assessment needed to bring out more clearly the risks of a phased attack and unpack the risks involved in possible scenarios, such as the possible use of CBW before Coalition Forces were properly assembled and urban fighting: "Nothing short of a massive deployment would guarantee overthrowing the regime."[441]

1120. In the Assessment issued on 6 December, the JIC's Key Judgements were:

- Saddam Hussein would "initially seek international pressure to halt Coalition [military] action". If that failed, he would "seek to inflict serious casualties on Iraq's neighbours and on coalition forces in order to undermine the Coalition's will to fight on".
- Saddam Hussein "would use chemical and biological weapons (CBW) if he faced defeat. He might also use them earlier in a conflict, including against coalition forces, neighbouring states and his own people. Israel could be his first target."
- Iraq had "contingency plans to weather coalition air strikes while maintaining government control over the country. Iraq's integrated air defence system would be overloaded by an all-out Coalition attack and would quickly become far less effective …"
- "A ground attack might fracture Saddam's regime, but only a massive Coalition force is guaranteed to topple him. The smaller the initial Coalition force, the more likely Iraqi forces are to resist. A phased Coalition attack could allow Iraq to claim military successes."
- "If the Special Republican Guard and Republican Guard [RG] remained loyal and effective they could inflict serious casualties on Coalition Forces in urban warfare."

---

[440] JIC Assessment, 6 December 2002, 'Iraq: Military Options'.
[441] Minutes, 4 December 2002, JIC meeting.

- "Other Iraqi responses might include seizing hostages as 'human shields'; using non-lethal BW in a deniable manner; suicide attacks; or a 'scorched earth' policy with the aim of creating a humanitarian or environmental catastrophe. At some point, motivated by revenge, Saddam would seek to inflict the maximum damage on his enemies, whether Iraqi or outsiders."[442]

1121. The JIC stated that the paper was "not intended to be a comprehensive review of all Iraq's options".

1122. The JIC assessed that Saddam Hussein knew that "an Iraqi military victory over a US-led Coalition was implausible". If attacked, he would "initially seek international pressure to halt Coalition action". If this failed, he would seek to "drag out the fighting" and "would be increasingly likely to use chemical or biological weapons … to undermine the Coalition's will".

1123. The assessment of Iraq's ballistic missiles and chemical and biological weapons is addressed in Section 4.3.

1124. The JIC assessed Iraq's options during Coalition air strikes and during a ground campaign.

1125. On the former, the Assessment stated that:

- Iraq had "contingency plans to weather Coalition air strikes while maintaining government control", but its air defence system would be overloaded by a Coalition attack.
- Iraqi airforce and naval capabilities were "very limited".
- Iraq might attack Kurdish areas before a ground attack started for a number of reasons, including to "divert Coalition air effort" and to "engage in ground fighting earlier than it had planned". Iraq's ground options "would be severely limited" once the Coalition had established control of the air.

1126. A ground attack might fracture Saddam Hussein's regime, but the JIC continued to judge that "only massive military force would be guaranteed to topple Saddam". If the Coalition pursued a phased campaign (the "rolling attack"), the JIC stated that Saddam Hussein would have a number of options. He would "probably seek an opportunity to inflict casualties" including on internal "enemies" and he would "take advantage of every opportunity to cause the Coalition political problems". The JIC judged that the smaller the initial Coalition force, the more likely Iraqi forces were to resist.

1127. The JIC anticipated that the Iraqi army could establish positions within urban areas, but "most R[egular] A[rmy] defences are likely to be constructed further forward, nearer Iraq's borders, or along key roads and at junctions". Physical barriers, "water barriers (created by flooding or by the destruction of bridges), minefields, or possibly even CBW-contaminated areas", could be created "to channel Coalition Forces into urban areas or 'kill zones where artillery, or CBW, would be used".

---

[442] JIC Assessment, 6 December 2002, 'Iraq: Military Options'.

1128. Iraq's "strategy would rely heavily on a static defence, largely because the Iraqi military's ability to conduct manoeuvre warfare is very limited, even in the R[epublican G[uard]". If Iraqi defensive positions were:

> "… left behind the front lines by a rapid coalition advance, many RA units would probably surrender rather than fight … [P]rovided that the security and military organisations central to the regime's survival … remained effective, Saddam would accept the sacrifice of virtually any forces or territory … Provincial cities would be defended, but ultimately … only Baghdad would be politically vital, as its capture would be a final symbol of defeat of the regime. Although Iraqi forces would look for the opportunity to counter-attack, only a few RA units and the RG would be capable of doing so … And we judge that Saddam would not be willing to risk the RG units held around Baghdad except in a final defence …"

1129. The JIC identified that other Iraqi responses might include:

- seizing foreign hostages as "human shields";
- CBW terrorism;
- using non-lethal BW agents in a deniable manner;
- suicide attacks; and
- a "scorched earth" policy with the aim of creating a humanitarian or environmental catastrophe.

1130. The JIC identified the policy implications as:

- "If an attack does not precipitate regime collapse and if Saddam's key forces remain loyal, they could inflict damage and casualties on coalition forces, the Iraqi people or Iraq's neighbours."
- "A slow-start Coalition would increase these risks."
- "Clear messages to the Iraqi military might reduce their willingness to obey orders to use CBW, but we cannot rely on this being the case."

1131. A handwritten note from Sir David Manning to Mr Blair drew the Prime Minister's attention to the risks of a phased attack – the "ugly start".[443]

[443] Note (handwritten) Manning to Prime Minister, 7 December 2002, 'Iraq: Military Options'.

Agreement to visible preparations for military action starting in January

1132. On 5 December, the MOD sought Mr Blair's agreement for further and visible preparations to preserve its ability to be ready for an air campaign and amphibious operations by early March.

1133. In response to the instructions issued during and after the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 27 November, Lt Gen Reith submitted a paper outlining steps for aligning the UK's Force Packages with US timelines, for consideration by the Chiefs of Staff on 4 December.[444] He warned that action was required or the UK might only be able to offer Package 2, without the Amphibious Task Group; and that Package 3 might have to be reconfigured. Other preparatory action would be needed "if we do not wish to miss the boat".

1134. The Chiefs of Staff noted on 4 December that decisions on visible preparations would be required by 7 December to meet a mid-February timetable for a political decision in the US.[445]

1135. A member of OD Sec reported to Sir David Manning that "it was clear from the discussion" that the US was planning for "a hybrid (or 'ugly') start to any military campaign".[446] Gen Franks was "moving as many assets into theatre as quickly as is logistically possible, with a view to being in a position to launch military action from the middle of February".

1136. Mr Watkins wrote again to Sir David Manning on 5 December, setting out what the UK would need to do to be able to react in the timescales implied by its assessment of the US plans.[447]

1137. Summarising the letter, Mr Watkins wrote:

> "… to keep options open for significant UK military participation … we need to press ahead with further preparations. None of these would constitute a final commitment to military action and the initial ones can be done without further parliamentary announcement. But many of them would be visible, and our presentational posture will need to become more forward leaning."

1138. The US had "no formal position on the date by which they must be ready to act". It had a wide range of options, but assuming that a political decision to take military action on 15 February (known as "P Day"), the MOD expected the air campaign and amphibious operations to start in early March. The main ground effort would commence about 60 days after the decision, ie mid-April. The US military intention was to minimise the lead times for operations to allow the maximum time for the "UN/diplomatic process to unfold". The MOD warned that US forces would reach a peak of readiness in February and that a "use it or lose it" argument might come into play in Washington.

1139. Turkey remained "a key uncertainty". The MOD understood that basing for US land forces had not yet been agreed, but "preparatory activity (reconnaissance visits, etc)", looked "like at least an amber light". The Pentagon had told the MOD that Turkey had given "neither a definite Yes nor a definite No" to UK forces. Mr Straw had received a "similar response … with some suggestion that their position might depend on the details of any UK request" (in his discussions on 3 December). Turkey and the UK "ought to" have bilateral discussions.

1140. The MOD was considering with the FCO the "best approach to securing Turkish agreement, taking into account our wider interests". The MOD judged that there was unlikely to be any progress until after the meeting of the European Council in Copenhagen (12 to 13 December). Action could include a visit by Mr Hoon accompanied by Adm Boyce, who had "developed a good rapport with his opposite number", and Sir Kevin Tebbit who would draw on "his extensive experience of Turkey".

1141. It was "increasingly difficult, for both US and UK staffs, to plan and prepare in the abstract without knowing where the UK land package will be based". While there were risks that Turkey could "interpret … UK preparations as taking their acquiescence for granted", the UK could not wait for an answer from Turkey if it wished "to remain aligned with US planning". Although those preparations were "not particularly tied" to a northern option, there were presentational risks such as the media concluding that the UK was "all dressed up with no place to go".

1142. The MOD stated that the steps required to bring the additional air and naval forces in Package 2 into line with US timescales were "relatively limited", but a "significant readiness gap" was developing between US and UK "amphibious and land forces".

1143. The actions proposed by the MOD included:

- Deploying additional naval forces for "maritime interdiction operations, force protection, defensive mine warfare and logistics support" around 22 January 2003.
- Nominating and informing units in the ATG and bringing their readiness to five days' Notice to Move from the beginning of January and chartering four ships to support the ATG by 19 December, with the intention that it would deploy around 16 January.
- Bringing the RAF elements of Package 2 to 10 days' Notice to Move or less on 27 December, and pre-positioning weapons and equipment in Turkey on 30 December.

- Commencing initial preparations, procurement and training for "earmarked elements" of the "land package" the following week and placing holding contracts on commercial shipping by 17 December.
- Planning for the mobilisation of Reserves "without actually proceeding to call-out".

1144. At that stage:

- CENTCOM's plans for the North required "the lead Division, currently 1 (UK) Armoured Division" to cross into Turkey in mid-April, "followed by the US 4th Infantry Division". The option needed more work, including the possibility of a US brigade being seconded to the UK, "so the precise composition of the UK land package will have to be kept under review". But as it had "the longest lead-time of all", action to improve its readiness could not be delayed if the UK was "to have any chance of being ready from mid-February onwards".
- The ATG comprised a Royal Marine Commando Group and HM Ships Ocean and Ark Royal, two destroyers or frigates, three Landing Ships Logistic (LSL) and support ships, which would operate (with the US) to conduct operations in the Northern Gulf and ashore from the beginning of the air campaign.

1145. The MOD warned that the steps would become visible and that the "current low-key" media handling which was "operating at the limits of credibility, would need to be replaced with a rather more pro-active approach". The preparations would also need to be "viewed in the wider political context … not least the progress of inspections and their reports to the UNSC, and the continuous assessment of Iraqi compliance".

1146. The letter concluded that, unless the UK was "prepared now to foreclose military options", Mr Hoon believed "that we need to proceed with the further preparatory steps" identified. That was "a question of cocking the pistol, not firing it" and the timelines would be adjusted if the US "were to shift its focus to later in 2003". But the UK could not "afford to lose any more time if we are to have a chance of re-aligning our readiness with that of US forces".

1147. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Brown, and to Mr Bowen.

1148. In relation to Turkey, Sir David Manning commented:

> "Recent indications on other channels are that Turks are very reluctant to budge on UK forces."[448]

1149. During Oral Questions in the House of Commons on 9 December, Mr Hoon confirmed that the UK had responded to the US approach seeking support; and that [448] Manuscript comment Manning on Letter Watkins to Manning, 5 December 2002, 'Iraq: Military Planning'.

preparations were continuing to enable UK forces "to participate in military action should that be required".[449]

1150. Mr Hoon also assured the House that:

> "… no military decisions whatsoever have been taken on military action against Iraq. That situation will be reported to the House should it change."

1151. Gen Reith told the Inquiry:

> "I … briefed Geoff Hoon … early in the week that we had until Friday to go to trade for ships; otherwise, we wouldn't meet the window that the Americans were potentially looking at before the real heat of the summer came in, in 2003. He said to me 'You have been telling me … week by week that we have to do this, and now you are telling me you are giving me another deadline.' I said, 'this is the deadline'. He said 'You know, we need to keep our options open' … I said 'Well, actually if we don't go to trade by the end of this week, then we don't have any options, we are not going'. He then went to the Prime Minister and we were then authorised to go to trade."[450]

1152. On 10 December, Mr Johnson advised Mr Hoon on the options in the event of an "ugly start" and land force options if Turkey did not agree to transit.[451]

1153. The land force options were:

- UK forces with the US main effort in the South;
- a follow-on force after the US main effort in the South;
- ground forces only for the aftermath; and
- not providing ground forces at all.

1154. Mr Johnson advised that only the first option would provide "the sort of high profile role in war-fighting on the ground which we have previously judged important".

1155. Mr Johnson also wrote that there were limits to what could be done to improve readiness before a clear political decision. Calling out Reservists and deploying some force elements and equipment as soon as they were available would start "to use up some of our one-shot capabilities". That:

> "… would cause us problems if it turned out that the campaign was not going to start until later in the year. Deploying early also runs the risk of finding later that we are in the wrong locations."

1156. Sir Kevin Tebbit commented that advice to Mr Hoon rather underplayed "the issues surrounding the Amphibious Force and the point that they will probably be there earlier for an 'ugly' [start] than ground forces".[452]

1157. Sir David Manning drew Mr Blair's attention to the uncertainties if operations started before mid-February or Turkey refused to agree to the transit of UK troops.

1158. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair that the "two key working assumptions" were that "US forces must be ready to move by 15 February", and that they would be "able to transit Turkey".[453] The February date was "a guess", but it fitted with what he had been told by Dr Rice "about putting pressure on Saddam and resolving the Iraqi issue sooner rather than later". Sir David's view was that Turkey would probably agree to the transit of US forces "in the end" but it was "not at all certain that agreement to US transit will extend to [the] UK".

1159. Sir David recommended that Mr Blair authorise the MOD to proceed, although he commented that the letter was "silent on two major uncertainties":

- what would happen if Saddam provoked a start earlier than 15 February; and
- whether there was a Plan B for UK forces in the event that Turkey refused transit.

1160. Sir David also raised concerns about the MOD's media handling strategy which he thought they should discuss with Mr Campbell.

1161. Sir David proposed that Mr Blair should discuss the issues with Mr Hoon and possibly Adm Boyce after his (Sir David's) return from Washington:

> "In particular, they [the MOD] need to explain how we handle 'ugly' start; and what we do if the Turks won't let us deploy for the northern option."

1162. Mr Blair authorised the preparatory steps requested, including those relating to land forces, but asked that there should be "no change in media handling until a media strategy has been drawn up and agreed with No.10".[454]

1163. Mr Blair also asked for a meeting with Mr Hoon explicitly to discuss how the UK "would handle a possible 'ugly start', and what our options would be for UK land forces if Turkey refused transit".

1164. Mr Campbell's advice on a media strategy is addressed in Section 3.6.

Iraqi declaration, 7 December 2002

In response to resolution 1441, Iraq submitted a declaration of its WMD and missile programmes on 7 December.

The evaluation of the declaration is addressed in Sections 3.6 and 4.3.

1165. Mr Blair was advised on 11 December that there was impatience in the US Administration and it "looked intent on military action in February/March".

1166. Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove had a joint meeting with Dr Rice and Mr George Tenet, the Director of Central Intelligence, in Washington on 9 December.[455]

1167. Sir David reported to Mr Blair that Dr Rice had "made no effort to hide the fact that the Administration would now be looking to build the case for early military action … probably mid/late February as we suspected". But she had "denied that military planning was dictating the timetable".

1168. Mr Blair agreed that visible preparations for military action could begin in January 2003.

1169. Mr Blair, Mr Hoon, Adm Boyce, Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove met on 11 December.[456]

1170. In relation to military planning and the issues raised in Mr Watkins' letter of 5 December, Mr Rycroft recorded that:

- Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce had "updated" Mr Blair "on US and UK military planning, including on the need to align the readiness of US and UK forces".
- Mr Blair "was content that military preparations from January would become increasingly visible. These should be presented as sensible contingency preparations against the possibility that Iraq would not comply with UNSCR 1441."

1171. The record of the meeting does not refer to any discussion of the options if Turkey refused transit for UK land forces.

1172. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "We went over the various military options. It would be possible to do something fairly quickly but TB didn't believe GWB wanted 'an ugly start' … Geoff was very > much on the Rumsfeld end of the market at the moment. CDS was a bit more engaged. David felt that the US were in a very different position."[457]

1173. Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Mr Rycroft on 12 December, recommending a more pro-active media strategy to explain the military preparations.[458] That included a proposal for a background briefing for defence correspondents and a briefing for "talking heads" on 17 December.

Agreement to a role for the Royal Marines in the initial stages of an invasion

1174. Notwithstanding continuing uncertainties over Turkey's position, PJHQ advised on 9 December that ground operations might begin sooner than had previously been anticipated and sought endorsement for a role for the Amphibious Task Group early in the campaign.

1175. The possibility of deploying a Royal Marine Commando Group was first identified by Maj Gen Fry on 30 August 2002 when he advised that "a timely effect in the South could probably only be achieved by the ARG in support of the US MEF [Marine Expeditionary Force]".[459]

1176. Advice submitted to the Chiefs of Staff on 19 September stated:

> "Within the maritime element of Package 2 the Amphibious Ready Group with an embarked Commando offers a high readiness, flexible small scale land contribution … [T]his force package can be sustained throughout, provided it is integrated with USMC [US Marine Corps] forces, and does not proceed beyond a point from which it can be sustained from … afloat resources. This clearly restricts its operational utility, but does present an opportunity for 'boots on the ground', if the UK decision is not to commit beyond Package 2."[460]

1177. Mr Watkins informed No.10 on 20 September that further work, on whether it would be possible to include a Commando Group in Package 2, was under way.[461]

1178. By the middle of October, the Commando Group had been incorporated into Package 2.[462]

1179. On 9 December, Lt Gen Reith put forward a proposal seeking COS "endorsement for" an early role for the Amphibious Task Group in operations against Iraq.[463]

1180. Lt Gen Reith stated that it "would bring considerable strategic exposure for the UK at the earliest stage of the campaign". It "was consistent with UK objectives" and provided "valuable strategic, operational and presentational effect".

1181. Lt Gen Reith advised that US ground operations against Iraq in the South were "now planned to commence simultaneously with the air campaign" and the US intention was to establish a second Sea Point of Disembarkation at Umm Qasr. This was "essential" to allow the rapid build-up of forces. The US plan entailed securing the "oil nodes", the capture of Umm Qasr and the al-Faw peninsula, and clearance of mines in the Khawr Abd Allah (KAA) waterway.

1182. The plan had been developed with UK input, was "well advanced", and was "heavily reliant" on the UK to achieve its aims. The ATG "would be based around" 40 Commando Group and the plan envisaged a two company helicopter-borne amphibious assault capability. The ATG's landing craft would "provide flexibility" a "simultaneous … surface assault", but it was "more likely to be used for logistic support".

1183. On 11 December, Maj Gen Fry advised the Chiefs of Staff that:

> "The operation had important economic and environmental strands as well as being militarily essential. UK participation would enable the operation to complete 10 days sooner than if the US went alone and would ensure UK participation in land operations at P+ a few days, well ahead of the Main Effort in the North at P+60 … For the operation to go forward, the areas of risk that needed to be managed were SH [support helicopters] and Medical … The SH risk was not to be underestimated, but should be managed by sequencing … Until the TU [Turkey] question was resolved, an operation in the North was a complete uncertainty and, by accepting risk on SH, the ATG task would ensure UK land participation."[464]

1184. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that committing the ATG would ensure the UK's participation in operations, although there would be risks if support helicopters were needed for operations in both the North and South.

1185. Adm Boyce directed that a submission to Mr Hoon should be prepared "summarising CJO's paper in accordance with his instructions".

1186. Mr Hoon's agreement to planning for a discrete British role in securing a bridgehead in the initial stages of a military campaign was sought on 11 December.

1187. Adm Boyce briefed Mr Hoon on the planning for deployment of the ATG and development of a discrete British role in seizing a bridgehead.[465]

[464] Minutes, 11 December 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.
[465] Minute Bowen to Manning, 11 December 2002, 'Iraq: CDS Briefing of Mr Hoon'.

1188. The details of the proposal were set out in a minute to Mr Hoon's Private Office on 11 December.[466]

1189. Mr Hoon was advised that the ATG would "make a significant difference to the viability of the US plan". US ground operations were "now planned" to begin simultaneously with the air campaign, and that a second point of disembarkation was required "to enhance logistic flow and to prevent Iraqi destruction of key oil production and distribution nodes". That required the capture of Umm Qasr and the al-Faw Peninsula and the clearance of mines from the Khawr Abd Allah waterway. US planning for the operation had "developed with UK input", and was "well advanced". Unless the role was undertaken by the ATG, the US would have to "divert other forces, at a cost of several days' delay and increased risk", including a "strategic delay" to US follow-on operations in Basra and crossing the Euphrates, and an increased risk of the destruction of oil supplies.

1190. Iraqi options for defending the peninsula and hampering Coalition maritime forces included land-based anti-ship missiles, some artillery and mortar capability. An Iraqi troop presence of some 2,000-3,000 could "in theory be reinforced by the Iraqi 51st Mechanised Division based at az-Zubayr and al-Basra" but the US plan was "designed to prevent such reinforcement being attempted". If it were attempted, "coalition forces should be able to defeat it with ease".

1191. Mr Hoon was advised that the ATG would be "based around 40 Commando Group embarked in HMS Ocean, supported by HMS Ark Royal" and other ships. The force would be commanded by a Royal Navy officer, "who would command both the amphibious and MCM elements of the ATG". It "was possible, subject to further work" that US forces "could be placed under UK command".

1192. Mr Hoon was also advised that:

- "Previous concerns that it might not be possible to support the ATG concurrently with other elements of the UK force packages … have been assuaged. Although supporting resources will be stretched, the stretch is judged to be manageable."
- Further work was "looking at the possibility of making a second RM Commando available for follow-on or aftermath operations".

1193. Mr Hoon was asked to:

- note that the Chiefs of Staff had endorsed securing the al-Faw Peninsula and mine clearance operations as "a role for the ATG, judging that it would be consistent with UK objectives and provide valuable strategic, operational and presentational effect"; and

---

[466] Minute Johnson to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 11 December 2002, 'Iraq Military Planning: Amphibious Task Group'.

- agree that "subject to the usual caveat that no political decision has been taken to commit UK forces, US/UK planning should proceed on the assumption that the ATG would undertake this role".

1194. Sir Kevin Tebbit pointed out the need to identify the operational risks.

1195. When he saw the advice, Sir Kevin Tebbit, who had not been present at the Chiefs of Staff discussion on 11 December, wrote:

> "What sort of risk assessment is being prepared? I assume the S of S [Mr Hoon] is aware that these would be lead elements in an operation where we are unlikely to have the benefit of surprise or of choice of territory (I assume the Iraqis will be aware that this is where we would have to go, more or less?) We need to make sure that the operational risks are stated in a clear and balanced way."[467]

1196. Details of the proposal were sent to Mr Blair on 12 December. The operational risks were not explicitly addressed.

1197. Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to No.10 on 12 December stating that the maritime contribution set out in Mr Hoon's letter of 15 October included an ATG; and that "as the US military plan has developed, it is clear that there is an important role for this Group".[468] Mr Hoon had "mentioned this" to Mr Blair on 11 December.

1198. The MOD stated that the ATG, and 40 Commando Group Royal Marines, would play a key role "on Day 1 of offensive operations", for operations:

> "… possibly of high intensity and could bring forward the decisive employment of armoured forces by up to 10 days. It also reduces the risk of destruction of oil infrastructure and the associated environmental damage. It has strategic and operational effect, and provides an opportunity for UK land involvement even if agreement cannot be obtained from Turkey for the northern option."

1199. Details of the proposal, set out in an Annex to the letter, largely reflected the MOD's advice to Mr Hoon, but it did not address the likely Iraqi defences.

1200. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Office of Mr Straw and to Mr Bowen in the Cabinet Office.

1201. After the Chiefs of Staff discussion on 18 December, Lt Gen Reith was directed to add HQ 3 Commando Brigade and a second Royal Marine Commando to the Amphibious Task Group.[469]

1202. Mr Hoon announced contingency preparations and the planned deployment of a naval task group on 18 December.[470]

1203. At Cabinet on 19 December, Mr Hoon informed his colleagues that it was "increasingly necessary to make visible preparations" and that "a naval task group led by HMS Ark Royal would depart for exercises". The US had not yet finalised its military planning but it was "already building up a formidable force and would be ready to use it".[471]

1204. The Cabinet Conclusions contain no reference to the deployment of the ATG, the deployment of a Royal Marine Commando Group, or the role they might play.

1205. Mr Blair said that "there would be an opportunity to discuss Iraq in the New Year".

1206. Mr Straw's report to Cabinet on 19 December, on Iraq's declaration in response to resolution 1441 and the next steps for the weapons inspectors, are addressed in Section 3.6.

1207. In a minute on 30 December, primarily dealing with land options, Mr Hoon was informed that: "Unless otherwise instructed, the Amphibious Task Group (ATG) will begin to deploy from 16 January …"[472]

1208. The deployment of the ATG was announced on 7 January 2003.[473]

1209. The deployment of 3 Commando Brigade was seen as a way for the UK to make a valuable contribution to the land campaign if transit through Turkey was refused.

1210. When 3 Commando Brigade deployed into action, however, the landings did not go entirely as planned. That is addressed in Section 8.

Mr Hoon's statement, 18 December 2002

1211. Mr Hoon made a further statement on contingency preparations for military operations against Iraq to Parliament on 18 December.[474]

1212. Mr Hoon reported that he had "authorised a range of steps to improve readiness". He also referred to the planned deployment of a naval task group in early 2003 to the Gulf and Asia-Pacific region for visits and exercises. That was "a routine deployment" that happened about every three years, but it remained "available for a range of potential operations if required". The task group would be led by HMS Ark Royal and a nuclear-powered submarine would be "assigned to the group for part of its deployment".

"In addition, a mine countermeasures group" would deploy ahead of the group "to undertake a series of exercises and port visits in the Gulf region".

1213. Mr Hoon added that the UK was also considering the deployment of "additional maritime forces early in the new year to ensure the readiness of a broad range of maritime capabilities, should they be required".

Continued pursuit of the northern option

1214. Mr Hoon was advised on 11 December not to push the issue with Turkey until early January, and that the UK was likely to face increasing US pressure to look at other options.

1215. Mr Bowen, who had attended the briefing for Mr Hoon on 11 December, reported to Sir David Manning that Adm Boyce had informed Mr Hoon that the absence of a northern front was not now regarded as a showstopper.[475] He added that "the one certainty appears to be that an extra 45 days must be allowed for deployment if planning were to switch from the North to the South".

1216. Further advice on Turkey, including options for high level UK visits and actions after the Copenhagen Summit was provided for Mr Hoon on 11 December.[476]

1217. Mr Johnson wrote that: "We need clarity as soon as possible" because if the response was positive it would take some time to "thrash out all the practical details" and, if the response was negative, alternatives needed to be considered.

1218. Mr Johnson advised that: "We should not push the issue hard until the Turks have said Yes to the US request". Mr Hoon's visit scheduled for 6 to 8 January looked like the right opportunity. If Mr Hoon did decide to "push the issue hard" then "experience (eg over ISAF) suggests that only high-level engagement is likely to make a difference".

1219. On "handling" Turkey, Mr Johnson stated that the northern option "came from our strategic analysis in the first place" and that deployment timelines were: "45 days' [sic] shorter than to the South (though we could in theory solve this problem by buying up more sealift)". Assuming a political decision was made on 15 February, "air elements" would be in action from early March and the main ground effort from mid-April. Although the UK would want to pre-position air weapons at the end of the year, it "would not need to deploy additional air and ground forces until 15 February". Turkey was less likely to help the UK than the US.

[476] Minute Johnson to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 11 December 2002, 'Iraq: Military Planning – Turkey Handling'.

1220. Addressing the option of dropping the northern option and telling the US that the UK wanted to switch to the South, Mr Johnson's minute stated:

- Advantages: Reduces risk of wasting our time and getting bogged down in negotiation. Improves chances of getting into the South in time for February/March.
- Disadvantages: Although General Franks has said that he will fit us into the South if required, we have no US political guarantee that they will fix it, or that they will give us a role in the main effort. And it would perhaps be odd to rule Turkey out when we have not asked them the question ourselves."

1221. The minute advised that the US priority would be getting its own forces into Turkey. The UK was "likely to come under increasing US pressure to look at going elsewhere". As time passed, the US might "feel less bound to try and meet our preferences for a substantial role in the South".

1222. Sir Kevin Tebbit commented on a draft of the note that "depending on how Copenhagen goes, plus CDS soundings of [General Hilmi] Özkök [Chief of the General Staff of the Turkish Armed Forces]", Mr Hoon would need to visit and that he would probably accompany him.[477]

1223. Sir Kevin wrote that European forces on Turkish soil would be "harder" for them than US forces, although Turkey was "better disposed" towards the UK. Other issues included the impact on Turkey's relations with the Kurds and the UK's attitude to the Kurds in 1920-32.

SPG PAPER, 13 DECEMBER 2002

1224. The SPG paper of 13 December concluded that a medium scale land contribution would be the maximum the UK could provide concurrently with Op FRESCO and provided a new analysis on urban operations.

1225. On 13 December, the SPG produced a sixth version of the 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq' paper.[478]

1226. The paper stated that a contribution at medium scale "in each environment (Package 3)" would be "the maximum achievable concurrently with Op FRESCO". It would take 129 days for deployment to Turkey to be completed. The UK was "likely to be two months late for 1st echelon operations unless resources [were] committed now".

1227. The need for a "coercive" information operations campaign to "help create the conditions for Iraqi regime collapse" had been added to the list of UK Military Strategic Objectives, underpinned by a section identifying the objectives and themes of such a campaign.

1228. The paper included a new analysis on urban operations in Iraq, which were described as "the 'vital ground' of any campaign against Iraq". In contrast with the analysis in the previous version of the paper, the SPG stated that it would "not be possible, or desirable" for land operations "to avoid towns and cities", where: "Any factional conflict following regime collapse or during the aftermath" was likely to take place. Baghdad would be "a special case".

1229. Addressing the Coalition response, the paper stated that it could not:

> "… engage in drawn out urban conflict since it lacks the experience training and specialist equipment to do so without heavy casualties. Such casualties, combined with loss of tempo and humanitarian effects may undermine coalition will to continue by alienating home, international and regional supporters."

1230. The paper identified the need to understand the "infrastructure, culture, population, terrain, threats" in cities and commented that the US had invested thousands of man hours in analysing Baghdad, "but that relatively little work has been done on Tikrit, a city more likely to be the responsibility of those on the northern axis".

1231. The SPG identified information operations and physical separation and the control of movement into and out of cities as "key conditions" for engagement.

1232. The paper also added an objective to develop a "broad military alliance against Iraq".

1233. The SPG identified the post-conflict phase as "strategically decisive" and called for it to be "adequately addressed" in any winning concept. That is addressed in Section 6.4.

Proposals to increase ground combat forces and options for the South

1234. Adm Boyce decided on 18 December that the option of a division with two brigades should be developed for deployment in the North.

1235. Options for enhancing the Amphibious Task Group and deploying a second light brigade and follow-on forces should also be developed for the South.

1236. Submitting a paper on "Land Options" on 16 December, Lt Gen Reith stated: "The UK must now confirm its land contribution in order that final and detailed planning can take place."[479]

---

[479] Minute Reith to COSSEC, 16 December 2002, 'Land Options for the UK' attaching Paper CJO, 'Land Options for the UK'.

1237. The Chiefs of Staff were invited to agree that participation in the land campaign was "consistent with UK objectives" and to endorse the "approach to the delivery of a heavy or light land package".

1238. Lt Gen Reith advised that a UK contribution from the North remained the preferred course of action; but the "constraints of Op FRESCO dictate that the best force package available is based on a divisional headquarters and a single high readiness UK brigade", with a second brigade provided by the US. The disadvantage would be that it would lack manoeuvre capability.

1239. The UK could not deploy a heavy force to the South quickly enough to meet the expected US timeline for the start of offensive operations, and "a UK contribution for Phase 3 combat operations could only be achieved by light forces".

1240. Lt Gen Reith added:

> "The UK could mount two light brigades, potentially commanded at divisional level, although the US would prefer to deploy them separately under US control."

1241. Lt Gen Reith advised the Chiefs of Staff that the heavy and light force options were "mutually exclusive"; and that a decision on which to deploy was "wholly dependent on confirmation of the Turkish position and must be made no later than 15 Jan[uary] … to allow the light force to be generated in time".

1242. In the detailed paper, Lt Gen Reith stated that the US plan for the northern axis had "enhanced the role of the UK division" and the UK's tactical analysis confirmed that a minimum of two brigades would be required for the northern option.

1243. The constraints of Op FRESCO and the likely US timetable meant that the best option the UK could provide comprised a divisional headquarters, an armoured brigade of four battlegroups, a manoeuvre support task force (MSTF) built around a second brigade headquarters with combat support elements, and the 2nd Light Cavalry Regiment offered by the US. That would require the deployment of "circa 30,000" UK personnel.

1244. If Turkey did not co-operate and the UK still wished "to make a significant and early contribution to operations against Iraq", the UK could deploy two light brigades and possibly a divisional headquarters for the southern axis.

1245. One light brigade would be based on an expanded ATG, comprising the Headquarters of 3 Commando Brigade and "up to three battalions". The headquarters and one commando group (based on 40 Commando Group) could be in place by the end of February. The remaining units would be deployed by air.

1246. A second brigade would be based on 16 Air Assault Brigade, with up to three battalions.

1247. There was also a possibility of deploying additional high readiness forces and the US had asked for additional logistics support.

1248. If a decision was taken by 15 January, UK combat forces could be in the theatre by late March.

1249. The disadvantages of that option would be that the UK would "potentially, not hold its own area of responsibility or operate at the divisional level of command", and 16 Air Assault Brigade would need to be extracted from Op FRESCO duties.

1250. On 18 December, Lt Gen Reith informed the Chiefs of Staff that:

- The US had identified 15 February as the optimum date for combat operations and was seeking to bring together the start of the air and ground campaigns.
- The US campaign plan had: "changed to an information operation supported by manoeuvre rather than vice versa. The centre of gravity was now the oilfields rather than Baghdad. Securing the oilfields would provide a means of funding Phase IV operations and the rebuilding of the infrastructure. It would also help avert an environmental disaster …"[480]

1251. In discussion of the "Land Options" paper, Gen Walker took the view that a UK division operating alone in the North "represented the most sensible military solution, but accepted that Op FRESCO commitments precluded it from being taken in its present form"; it was likely to be available only for Phase IV operations.

1252. The Chiefs of Staff endorsed Lt Gen Reith's request to take forward exploratory work on options for the South.

1253. The Chiefs of Staff also discussed a paper by Maj Gen Fry on the provision of a UK stabilisation force in the event of early military or regime collapse leading to a "loss of control".[481]

1254. Maj Gen Fry defined "early collapse" as the collapse of the Iraqi regime less than 60 days after the political decision to take military action ("P Day"), and "loss of control" as "the period between the collapse of the Iraqi regime and the establishment of an effective alternative providing law and order and security".

1255. The paper stated:

> "Rapid intervention by the Coalition may be required to stabilise the situation, including support to an interim government. Current Package 3 deployment timelines would limit the arrival of sufficient and appropriate UK military capability in time. Consequently there is a need to develop a contingency plan that would enable the UK to gain an early footprint on the ground, providing influence in theatre and achieving strategic impact."

If the collapse happened after more than 60 days, the UK land component would have reached full operating capability and would deal with the situation.

1256. Maj Gen Fry advised that, in order to provide a quick response, the stabilisation force was "likely to be light" and its role limited to "wider peacekeeping and 'stabilisation' tasks". Those included controlling and denying access to WMD, security at key locations, disarmament and demobilisation. The paper set out a number of options for different scenarios.

1257. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting, Lt Gen Reith commented that any stabilisation force would depend on timing and availability of resources, and that there was a synergy between the southern option and a stabilisation force.

1258. The minutes of the Chiefs of Staff meeting included a "Post Meeting Note" stating that the commitment to Operation FRESCO might be reduced by "some 2,000 personnel", and:

- The option recommended by Lt Gen Reith was not the preferred northern option, and a force package based on two UK high readiness brigades, each with three battlegroups, should be developed further, with the aim of providing a second manoeuvre "element", within a manpower ceiling of about 33,000.
- Options for enhancing the Amphibious Task Group, and additional options for the South which would consider the utility of a second light brigade and the deployment of follow-on forces, should also be developed.[482]

MOD ADVICE TO NO.10, 19 AND 20 DECEMBER 2002

1259. The MOD provided an update on the military thinking for No.10 on 19 December and further background material the following day.

1260. No.10 was informed that:

- Control of Iraq's oilfields rather than control of Baghdad was seen as the strategic key to the control of Iraq.
- Keeping options open was likely to require visible steps early in the New Year, including call-out of Reserves and high profile maritime deployments.
- An early conclusion on whether the UK could deploy through Turkey was needed to define the land option.

1261. In response to a request for an update on US military thinking, Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Sir David Manning on 19 December to inform him that the beginning of [482] Minutes, 18 December 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

US ground operations would be synchronised as closely as possible with the beginning of air operations, which it was judged would lead to the rapid collapse of much potential opposition.[483]

1262. In addition, the US was now thinking of "an information operation supported by manoeuvre, rather than a manoeuvre operation supported by information operation". Control of Iraq's oilfields (North and South), rather than control of Baghdad, was seen as the strategic key to control of Iraq. It would prevent the Iraqi regime from using oil as a weapon to cause a humanitarian and environmental catastrophe.

1263. It would also be essential to fund reconstruction. The US now recognised that stabilisation and reconstruction of up to two thirds of Iraq would need to begin before the military campaign had concluded. This was "bringing home to the US military the need for more planning effort to be devoted to 'aftermath' issues now".

1264. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Brown, and to Mr Bowen.

1265. The US plan for a military campaign, including that the Coalition would not fight for Baghdad in the initial phase of combat operations, is addressed in Section 8.

1266. The MOD had not yet reached a conclusion on the alternative options if Turkey refused transit.

1267. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that, in the light of reports about the latest US military planning, the UK was "anxious about whether this was the right approach".[484]

1268. In response to a request for background material on US and UK military thinking and preparations, Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 20 December.[485]

1269. Mr Watkins highlighted "the continuing emphasis in US military planning on squeezing every possible day out of their timelines, both in preparation for and in the prosecution of any campaign". As a result, the UK assumptions about detailed timings were "potentially subject to acceleration at short notice". Keeping options open was:

> "… likely to require visible steps early in the New Year … including a first call-out of reserves in the first half of January and high profile maritime deployments around the middle of the month."

1270. An early conclusion on whether the UK could deploy through Turkey "and thus on the shape of the UK land contribution" was also needed.

1271. Mr Watkins concluded that there would be "an increasingly pressing need to satisfy ourselves that the US has an overarching political strategy with which the Government is content". If that envisaged military action in the timescales to which US military planners were working, there would be a need to address campaign objectives. That would be "necessary to fill the current gap between" the UK's "existing policy objectives and the likely nature of any US-led military operations, the scale and intensity of which should not be underestimated".

1272. The MOD provided seven annexes with more detailed information.

1273. Annex A addressed "Evolving US military thinking".

1274. Annex B, addressing UK military preparations, stated that there was a need to identify and address shortfalls in manpower and equipment in units nominated for operations, and that they would require significant training.

1275. In addition, the MOD:

- had approached the market to charter shipping; and
- was making preparations for call-out of Reserves.

1276. Annex C provided a snapshot of current UK and US force levels in the region and a projection of the probable build-up of forces based on Package 3 as currently endorsed and the ATG with 3 Commando Brigade. The ATG was now planned to be in theatre by mid-February and would transit the Suez canal 15 days earlier than previously planned; 7 Armoured Brigade could be in theatre by mid-March, but deployment of the full Package 3 would take a further 30 days.

1277. Annexes D and E, setting out the UK force packages originally approved by Ministers and an update on the ATG, stated that the MOD had strengthened the amphibious element of the force to include the Headquarters of 3 Commando Brigade, which would command both UK and US forces, and earmarked 42 Commando Group, to deploy by air after the ATG if required. The ATG was due to depart from the UK from 16 January. HMS Ark Royal would deploy as a second helicopter landing platform without its fast jets.

1278. Sir David was told the options for the land contribution were "under review"; and that: "There are some large and difficult issues here."

1279. Annex F was a "short note" on the options. It described Package 3, "previously endorsed by Ministers for planning purposes" as "a divisional HQ commanding a single square armoured brigade with appropriate divisional and logistic support", and that the MOD had assumed "for some time" the US would provide a similar brigade. The US had "now decided" to offer a lighter regiment, but that would mean the UK-led division would be "unbalanced, and its mission … more risky".

1280. The MOD was "therefore" looking at alternatives, which would take account of:

- The scope for releasing sufficient units from Op FRESCO to allow "Package 3 to be reconfigured for operations in the North as a division of two brigades".
- "Options for embedding a single … brigade in a US division (North or South)".
- Options for the South where further work was needed to assess whether an armoured formation could be delivered "within US timelines, and to consider alternatives involving lighter forces".

1281. The MOD could not be "fully confident" that it had "a conclusion on these choices".

1282. Annex G was a copy of the 13 December SPG paper, 'UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq', which identified the post-conflict phase as strategically decisive.

1283. Sir David commented to Mr Blair that not all of the information in Mr Watkins' letter of 20 December had "yet appeared in the Sunday Telegraph", which carried a story on 22 December that the Royal Marines would lead a sea-borne invasion of southern Iraq.[486]

1284. Mr Hoon had raised concerns about the leak with Sir Kevin Tebbit; and Mr Watkins had asked the MOD to review – and prune back – its distribution lists.[487]

MOD ADVICE TO MR HOON, 20 DECEMBER 2002

1285. Mr Hoon was informed on 20 December that UK plans were being reviewed in the light of changes in US plans and there might be a need for early decisions.

1286. The military's preferred option would be to deploy two UK brigades for the northern option although that would require 4,000-5,000 more personnel and changes to Op FRESCO.

1287. A "heavy" brigade would not be able to arrive in the South until mid-April, but would have "particular utility for post-conflict operations".

1288. Mr Hoon was reported to be reluctant to take any risks with Op FRESCO.

1289. Adm Boyce discussed Iraq with General Joseph W Ralston, Commander EUCOM, on 19 December.[488]

1290. Gen Ralston indicated that planning activity in Turkey was being delayed pending receipt of political clearance to proceed by the Turkish military. Gen Ralston expected that it would be more difficult to get clearance for a UK deployment through Turkey than for a US one.

1291. In response to a question from Gen Ralston about whether the UK would contribute forces for deployment through Turkey, Adm Boyce said that "the critical path was for the US to negotiate access with Turkey first".

1292. On 19 December, Lt Gen Reith submitted a revised paper on the land options, to the Chiefs of Staff for discussion in a meeting chaired by Adm Boyce the following afternoon.[489]

1293. Lt Gen Reith reported increased US optimism that the Iraqi regime would collapse "early" and a desire to achieve the "closest possible coincidence" between the start of the air and ground campaigns. That would require earlier readiness for ground forces. There was some scepticism about the practicality of achieving a target date of mid-February in the North, but an attack in the North might begin "much earlier than has previously been expected", which Lt Gen Reith recommended the UK should aim to meet.

1294. The North remained the favoured option for UK land operations. Package 3 had been expanded to comprise a divisional HQ, two brigades, each with three battlegroups, and a total force level of 32,000. That would mean penalties for Op FRESCO.

1295. The paper also identified an option of contributing a single brigade, of four battlegroups, to a US formation before deployment of the full division. That would need about 25,000 personnel.

1296. In the South, 16 Air Assault Brigade and 3 Commando Brigade could initially operate under the command of a US division. For the former, units would need to be withdrawn from Op FRESCO. Both brigades were seen as having options for war-fighting and stabilisation roles. Preparations for the deployment of 16 Air Assault Brigade would depend on a decision not to deploy a division in the North no later than 15 January, "the last safe moment for a decision to switch the main effort from a northern axis".

1297. Lt Gen Reith advised that a "heavy" brigade could not arrive in the South before the middle of April and further time would be needed for readiness and integration. It would have "particular utility for post-conflict operations".

1298. If a UK division was deployed to the North, 1 (UK) Div HQ would take command; for other options, 3rd (UK) Mechanised Division would take the lead.

1299. Lt Gen Reith also recorded that he had been directed to add 42 Commando and HQ 3 Commando Brigade to the Amphibious Task Group.

1300. Mr Johnson alerted Mr Hoon to the potential need for early decisions on 20 December.[490]

1301. Mr Johnson wrote that Package 3 was being reviewed in the light of changes in US force plans. Adm Boyce, Gen Walker and Lt Gen Reith recommended that an option with two UK brigades each with three battlegroups should be the preferred option; although it would require 4,000-5,000 more personnel than the "currently endorsed package of 28,000", and a change to Op FRESCO plans.

1302. Mr Hoon was advised "we should have reached a conclusion on Turkey by the middle of January". An alternative option of deploying one brigade of four battlegroups to be integrated within the US 4th Infantry Division had also been identified. Planning could be calibrated to allow a switch to that option if the deployment of a division was ruled out.

1303. The work on possible options in the South was not addressed in the minute.

1304. In preparation for a telephone conversation with Adm Boyce on 22 December, Mr Watkins sent Mr Hoon a handwritten minute setting out the background to Mr Johnson's minute, which had been received late on 20 December following a meeting between Adm Boyce and Lt Gen Reith.[491]

1305. Mr Watkins advised that:

- Mr Johnson's minute did not seek any decisions, but Adm Boyce was "looking for a steer" on whether to call in staff over Christmas to prepare for deployments in the first few days of January, "rather than mid-January as currently assumed".
- There was "some suspicion about the provenance of the information about US intentions", which had come from CENTCOM. Mr Watkins' own contacts with Secretary Rumsfeld's office suggested that political decisions about visible US actions had not yet been taken. There was a risk, not for the first time, of the UK getting ahead of the US Government's position.
- Deploying equipment before the planned visit to Ankara risked "a diplomatic own goal".
- The UK Government's communications plan assumed a start date of 7 January.
- Mr Blair would be on holiday abroad until 5 January.

1306. In a separate minute produced by one of his Private Secretaries the previous evening, Mr Hoon was advised that military "plans seem to be changing very rapidly and incoherently without any real reference to the UN or political timetable".[492] Mr Hoon might ask Adm Boyce a number of questions, including:

- When a decision on Turkey was needed?
- Whether it was "still worth pursuing Turkey given the difficulty the US" was having?
- Whether there was "a worthwhile role for any heavy forces" if Turkey was not available.
- "When do we bite the bullet and rule out the heavy land option? Or are we content to march them up to the top of the hill just for force on mind? How would we cope with the morale implications?"

1307. Mr Hoon would "need to see properly considered and realistically argued submissions" if early decisions were needed.

1308. The record of the conversation with Adm Boyce stated that, in relation to the work on land options, Mr Hoon was reluctant to take any risks with Op FRESCO's capability.[493]

1309. Mr Hoon was content, for planning purposes, with the assumption that an initial tranche of Reservists would be called out on or about 9 January. That would "be subject to clearance from No.10 in due course". He also wanted to avoid any clearly visible increase in activity "over and above what he [had] foreshadowed in his Statement in the House [of Commons] on 18 December before 6 January", because of the "need to balance the diplomatic and military tracks".

1310. Mr Hoon noted that further advice on preparations would be provided and that it would be helpful to have a clearer sense of the US planning timetable.

Planning Directive for Lt Gen Reith, 30 December 2002

Adm Boyce issued a Planning and Preparation Directive on 30 December.[494] That gave Lt Gen Reith: "authority to undertake the necessary preparations, including reductions in Notice to Move and overt training, in order that UK forces identified for potential operations in Iraq are in all aspects ready for Coalition military operations", including ensuring 16 Air Assault Brigade was ready for operations.

The Directive stated: "The codeword for the preparatory phase of this operation, and if UK forces are subsequently required to commit to action in the execution phase, is TELIC."

On Phase IV, it stated:

> "Delivering HMG's [Her Majesty's Government's] declared end state is likely to require UK engagement in follow-on operations but the possible scale and duration of 'aftermath operations' are uncertain and are in urgent need of clarification from US planners at all levels."

Formal planning for the southern option began on 3 January when Maj Gen Brims, was briefed on the concept by PJHQ.[495] Major General Wall, Chief of Staff to the UK National Contingent Commander and, subsequently, GOC 1 (UK) Div, wrote that initial planning with the US 1st Marine Expeditionary Force (1 MEF) was conducted in Atlanta in early January, which enabled Maj Gen Brims to start to shape the order of battle and build the division as a formation.

The Planning and Preparation Directive was superseded by a first version of the Execute Directive on 4 March 2003.

Mr Hoon's statement, 7 January 2003

1311. On 7 January, Mr Hoon announced the decision to deploy additional maritime forces, including an amphibious capability and an order to enable the call-out of Reservists.

1312. That was presented as a necessary part of a policy of maintaining the pressure on Saddam Hussein to persuade him to disarm. Mr Hoon stated that no decision had been taken to commit UK forces to military action.

1313. The Government's policy objectives for Iraq were also published on 7 January.

1314. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 3 January alerting him and other colleagues to the need to take and make public decisions on the call-out of Reservists.[496] He planned an announcement to the House of Commons on 7 January as part of a broader statement on Iraq strategy.

1315. Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning later that day to inform him that Mr Hoon would also want to announce the need for significant force movements, including the deployment of the Amphibious Task Group.[497] Mr Watkins recorded that the MOD had "confirmed to the US that the Group now includes HQ 3 Commando Brigade and 42 Commando, together with 40 Commando as originally planned".

1316. Mr Straw made a Written Ministerial Statement on the Government's policy objectives for Iraq to the House of Commons on 7 January 2003. In his later oral statement, Mr Hoon commended the objectives to the House of Commons.[498]

1317. Mr Hoon also announced arrangements for the first call-out of Reservists in support of possible operations against Iraq and the deployment of "a number of additional vessels and units later this month, which will represent a significant amphibious capability", including the headquarters 3 Commando Brigade, and 40 and 42 Commandos "with all supporting elements".

1318. Mr Hoon concluded:

> "None of that means that the use of force is inevitable … no decision has been taken to commit those forces to action … But … as long as Saddam's compliance with … resolution 1441 is in doubt … the threat of force must remain and it must be a real one."

1319. Mr Straw's and Mr Hoon's statements are addressed in more detail in Section 3.6.

The end of the northern option

1320. By the beginning of January 2003, uncertainty about Turkey's agreement to the deployment of ground forces had reached a critical point.

1321. Mr Hoon and Mr Blair were advised that there were considerable uncertainties about the UK role in US plans if Turkey refused transit for ground forces.

1322. Mr Westmacott reported on 23 December 2002 that the Turkish media was reporting US requests for a full Turkish commitment to preparations for military action; and that no decisions appeared to have been taken. There was little public support in Turkey for a war with Iraq.[499]

1323. On 24 December, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the fact that 80 percent of the Turkish public were against any co-operation with the US/UK on ground troops.[500]

1324. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell spoke twice on 30 December.

1325. In their first conversation, Secretary Powell asked where a Turkish refusal to the deployment of UK forces would leave the UK.[501] Mr Straw replied: "in some difficulty" but he knew there were contingency plans. He would "get back" to Secretary Powell.

1326. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell also discussed the possibility that the military would be ready to take action but there would be no casus belli.

1327. In their second conversation Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that:

> "Following the latest news from Turkey, we could provide an amphibious task force in the South. We might also put in an armoured brigade in the South."[502]

1328. Mr Straw also cautioned that the armoured brigade would take an extra 45 days to arrive.

1329. Mr Hoon was advised on 30 December that it seemed increasingly unlikely ground forces would be allowed to operate from Turkey and that the ground forces options were under review.[503]

1330. The US was reviewing the military plan "and considering what role a UK ground force could play in the South". Mr Johnson stated:

> "We had of course offered the existing land package on the assumption that it would operate in the North. Ministers have not endorsed any assumptions about a possible role in the South, which is more likely to be for follow-on, or aftermath, tasks."

1331. Mr Hoon was advised that, at present, there was "no clear role for any [of the options being examined] in the South"; the UK needed "first to hear from the US … what possible roles they may now envisage for UK land forces.

1332. Mr Westmacott advised on 31 December that despite a series of meetings in Christmas week, there were still no decisions although the Turkish Parliament had approved the renewal of the authority for US and UK aircraft to continue to operate from Incirlik over the northern No-Fly Zone.[504] In his view it was unlikely that Turkey would be forthcoming on Iraq during Mr Hoon's planned meeting the following week. Turkey was likely to wait until after Dr Blix's report to the UN Security Council on 27 January before consulting Parliament.

1333. On 2 January 2003, Mr Westmacott advised that he had not detected any particular hostility to a UK military presence: "The key point was that Turkey would rather not have any of us." Mr Hoon's visit should help to clarify the picture.[505]

1334. In his letter of 3 January about the announcement of the ATG deployment on 7 January, Mr Watkins alerted Sir David Manning to the need to reconsider options for the UK's ground contribution because of doubts about transit through Turkey.[506] He advised:

> "It may … be necessary to take decisions next week to give us time to train additional units for Operation FRESCO … freeing up units that, under new plans, might deploy to the South.
> "In the meantime, we are continuing with preparations to enable a ground force contribution of at least an armoured brigade (and its Divisional HQ) to deploy as soon as possible."

1335. In his minute of 3 January on the way ahead on Iraq over the next few weeks, which is addressed in Section 3.6, Mr Straw informed Mr Blair that Turkey would not allow US or UK troops through on the ground and that was "leading CENTCOM to re-think"; and that "must have an impact on the robustness of the overall plan, and the timelines".[507]

1336. Mr Straw's minute was not sent to Mr Hoon.

1337. On 3 January, Sir David Manning and Dr Rice discussed the possibility of a military attack without the northern option.[508] In the light of the previous advice about its importance, Sir David said that he was "uneasy".

1338. In an update on Iraq for Mr Blair on 3 January, which is also addressed in Section 3.6, Sir David Manning wrote that he was worried that US strategy was in danger of being driven by the tempo of military planning which assumed decisions in mid-February.[509] A "long hard look at the current state of the military planning" was needed: "Too much looks like hurried improvisation, half thought out strategy", which assumed that Saddam Hussein would collapse "in short order".

Mr Hoon's visit to Turkey, January 2003

1339. After Mr Hoon's visit to Ankara on 7 and 8 January 2003, the UK formally ruled out the northern option.

1340. Mr Hoon, Sir Kevin Tebbit, Lt Gen Pigott and Mr Lee visited Turkey on 7 to 8 January to "discuss a range of topics, including Iraq".[510]

1341. Mr Hoon told Secretary Rumsfeld on 7 January that he would emphasise the importance of the northern approach for a successful military campaign during his visit to Ankara.[511] The US and UK were discussing possible roles for UK forces in the South. The UK was "ready to play a significant role there, provided it made sense in terms of the overall plan".

1342. Mr Westmacott's overview of the visit reported that although Turkish interlocutors had spelled out their concerns, they had given "tentative agreement to the start of military planning talks".[512]

1343. The British Embassy Ankara reported that Mr Hoon had told all his interlocutors that "the UK, like Turkey, wanted a peaceful outcome to the crisis if possible; but our best chance of achieving it lay in making a credible show of coalition readiness to use force if necessary".

1344. The UK "understood" Turkish concerns:

> "… about legitimacy (which we shared), domestic and regional politics. But we needed to start high level military planning talks now if Saddam Hussein was to get the message. We and the United States were also convinced that, if military action proved necessary, it would be quicker, cleaner, and more effective if it was done with the support and facilitation of Turkey. A northern route land forces option … with a thrust from the South, made the most sense … UK military involvement was under consideration."

1345. Mr Hoon was advised to lodge a formal request.

1346. Records of the meetings in Ankara on 8 January circulated by Mr Watkins demonstrated that Mr Hoon had argued that the UK objectives published on 7 January were similar to Turkey's objectives:

> "… we too wished to avoid war. But we had to demonstrate the seriousness of our intent … Visible military preparations might make war less likely."[513]

1347. The UK was in close touch with CENTCOM on a possible land package and Adm Boyce was "ready to come out to discuss the details".

1348. The Turkish response was guarded. It had a number of concerns about the political, economic and humanitarian consequences of military action. All chances for a peaceful resolution had to be exhausted. There was no public support for a war and, therefore, no guarantee of Parliamentary support.

1349. Mr Hoon wrote to the Turkish Defence Minister on 9 January seeking confirmation of approval for early military planning talks.[514]

1350. When Adm Boyce visited Turkey in late January, Mr Westmacott reported that there were no instructions to reply to Mr Hoon's letter.[515]

1351. At Cabinet on 9 January Mr Hoon reported his visit to Turkey and the sensitivities about actions involving Iraq.[516]

1352. Other issues discussed are addressed in Section 3.6.

1353. Mr Blair told Cabinet that there would be an "in-depth" discussion on Iraq the following week.

1354. Adm Boyce updated Gen Myers on the outcome of the visit on 9 January and outlined the UK's "commitment to operations in southern Iraq."[517]

1355. The report of the discussion also stated that the US could stay poised for military operations for 3-4 months.

1356. On 11 January, Mr Straw discussed the Turkish position with Secretary Powell, including the need to avoid Turkey being drawn into any conflict in Iraq and the practicalities of the northern option.[518]

1357. Reporting from the British Embassy Washington showed that similar concerns about permission had been discussed during Mr Ricketts' visit.[519]

1358. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that it was not until early January that the northern option was "absolutely blocked off" after he and Mr Hoon went to Ankara "to make one final effort to clarify what was going on", including to secure "overflight rights for aircraft and supplies".[520] But it had become "increasingly difficult to rely on the northern option" from late November into December.

1359. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that his awareness of the difficulties with Turkey grew "towards the end" of 2002.[521] The UK had been alerted to the likely attitude of Turkey by Secretary Powell. When Mr Hoon had visited in early January 2003 he had had "a very rapid history lesson"; "all they were talking about was what had happened in the 1920s and Britain could not entirely be trusted".

1360. Mr Hoon stated that he did not think the decision to abandon the northern option was taken until after his visit to Ankara, when he formed the view that "we would never get an agreement from Turkey. That was the point at which we took the decision … the actual decision didn't come until I came back from Turkey."[522]

1361. Mr Hoon added that the US did not abandon hope of securing Turkey's agreement to the deployment of 4th Infantry Division until much later, and that it had stayed in the eastern Mediterranean until after the start of the invasion.[523]

1362. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry: "I went with Geoff Hoon to Ankara … to … finally see whether we could achieve agreement with the Turks."[524]

1363. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

> "I felt slightly embarrassed, to be absolutely honest, because having been head of chancery in the Embassy in Ankara for three and a half years, I thought I knew my Turks. I thought they were going to be supportive, and I of all people should have realised that the idea of the Brits going into Kurdistan … re-awoke some very sensitive Turkish nationalist memories of how we behaved in the 1920s when they felt we were flirting with the idea of a Kurdistan as part of a way of dismantling the Ottoman empire."
>
> "So we miscalculated there, and I have to say, I should have known better myself."[525]

1364. Sir Kevin added:

> "I think we thought we could provide reassurances that would overcome the Turkish objections, and unfortunately the Turks were reasonably polite and accommodating to let us feel that might actually be the case."[526]

1365. Sir Kevin confirmed that he was referring to both military and civilian views:

> "The problem was also they had an election, and there was a certain amount of chaos in Turkey about the stability of their arrangements, and I – we were encouraged to think that even at the last moment there might be a vote which would enable us to go there."

1366. In response to a question about whether he recalled that the views of the FCO and the Embassy in Ankara were not dissimilar from his own, Sir Kevin told the Inquiry that he did not:

> "… recall being out on a personal limb … [M]y sense was that we were getting mixed messages, and that we need to clarify the situation, not that we were being told by everyone that it was not on. Had that been the case, we would have stopped much earlier."[527]

1367. At the time he gave evidence, Sir Kevin had not had the telegrams from Ankara drawn to his attention.[528]

1368. Sir Kevin confirmed that there had been a majority vote in the Turkish Parliament but that it was not sufficiently large to approve the deployment.[529]

1369. In relation to Mr Hoon's visit in January 2003, Mr Lee told the Inquiry:

"As I recall … that was a sort of last throw of the dice really, that everyone else had tried, hadn't had an outright 'no', but hadn't had any sort of encouragement either. So we should try this. He [Hoon] should go, speak to his opposite numbers, as many people as possible in the Turkish hierarchy, and see what the result would be. The outcome of that visit was, I think, the realisation dawned that Turkey was not going to agree. So things moved on, away from the northern option."[530]

Should the UK have addressed an alternative to the northern option earlier and more seriously?

1370. The need for a northern axis for any invasion of Iraq was suggested to the US by the UK military in July 2002.

1371. The MOD's preference for a discrete role in northern Iraq was identified in July 2002 and it remained the preferred option until the end of the year.

1372. The evidence set out in this Section catalogues the advice, offered by PJHQ to the MOD and the MOD advice to Mr Hoon and Mr Blair between July and December 2002, on the strategic rationale for both northern and southern axes of attack in an invasion of Iraq, and the advantages of the northern option from the UK's perspective.

1373. The proposal reflected long-held and legitimate judgements about the difficulties which could arise during operations if ground forces at a brigade level or below were embedded within US structures.

1374. A briefing note for Mr Hoon on 11 December 2002 explicitly confirmed that the northern option "came from our strategic analysis in the first place".[531]

[531] Minute Johnson to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 11 December 2002, 'Iraq: Military Planning – Turkey Handling'.

1375. Asked when during the summer of 2002 the idea that the UK would lead on the northern option had arisen, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that it:

> "… was a fairly early part of the planning process, that we'd come from Turkey. We weren't going to lead it … we'd have been part of the American force …"[532]

1376. Asked where the idea had originated, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that it was "to a certain extent American-driven" but there was a dormant "NATO plan to go through Turkey" that could have been "dusted off and re-shaped to deal with this particular operation".[533]

1377. Lt Gen Fry told the Inquiry that he had "previous [experience] … in … Kurdistan" where he had been deployed in 1991.[534] He had taken the view, at the time "and … still", that the northern option offered "demonstrable military advantage". That included less significant geographical challenges and more freedom of manoeuvre.

1378. Gen Reith recalled that the UK had suggested a second axis from the north to fix the six to eight Iraqi divisions lined up along the edge of the Kurdish zone and prevent them moving south, although he could not recall the exact timing.[535]

1379. Gen Reith told the Inquiry:

> "What happened with the northern option was that, when we had suggested it to them [the US], they then came back and said to us, 'Well, perhaps the UK could do the northern option as a discrete entity.'"[536]

1380. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that his recollection was that the possibility of an attack on two axes to divide the Republican Guard had been identified and discussed before Lt Gen Pigott's visit to CENTCOM at the end of June; and that Lt Gen Pigott had persuaded the US military to consider a northern option.[537]

1381. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that he was "pretty confident" that the UK had "persuaded" the US "about the northern option".[538]

1382. By late October 2002, the US had adopted a northern axis as an essential element of its campaign plan and decided to allocate its 4th Infantry Division to that task.

1383. The MOD's initial aspiration was to lead the operation from the North. But, by late October 2002, the US had adopted a northern axis as an essential element of the campaign plan and decided to allocate its 4th Infantry Division to that task. That precluded a UK lead.

1384. Asked if the UK never talked about leading it, Lord Boyce replied: "No, and it would remain on the table right until January 2003."[539]

1385. Asked whether the northern option was the UK's preference or something the US "very much wanted" the UK to do, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that it was "probably a bit of both". If Turkey had agreed, it would have been a "sensible way" of deploying a UK division alongside the US 4th Division.[540]

1386. Asked whether given the southern No-Fly Zone had been more difficult than the northern one, the UK had been more comfortable operating in the North, Lord Boyce replied that was:

> "… correct and it's also true that we felt we would be more compatible with the [US] 4th Infantry Division than with other American divisions …"[541]

1387. Lord Boyce added that they were also concerned about the relatively small area of Kuwait for the entry of forces, and that it depended "hugely on the host nation support", although he acknowledged that the latter was also true for Turkey.[542]

1388. Lord Boyce subsequently told the Inquiry:

> "… we thought that the North made sense to fix the Iraqi forces in that part of the country, to do what we could to secure the oilfields before they got trashed by Saddam Hussein and also to do what we could to preserve the Kurdish state up there and make sure there was not an assault on the Kurds from either the Turks or the Iraqis.
> "So it appeared to be a neat option …"[543]

1389. Asked for the reasons why the military advice appeared to stress the North rather than the South, Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that he did not think there had been a "particular UK dimension":

- The UK had "particular concerns" about the consequences if Saddam Hussein moved his troops into the Kurdish area. He did not recall that directly influencing military planning, but it was "recognised very actively" at the political level.
- The UK had a military interest in the operation of the northern No-Fly Zone.

[542] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, page 54.
[543] Public hearing, 27 January 2011, page 13.

- It was "clear in [the] planning" that it was very important to secure the northern oilfields to prevent Saddam causing a humanitarian and environmental disaster and to preserve the resources for rebuilding Iraq.[544]

1390. Sir Kevin added:

> "So there were very strong reasons for a force to … fix the North, and strong reasons therefore, for the UK to regard that as an appropriate role for us to help with."

1391. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that part of the practical problem was that the Kuwaiti border with Iraq was "relatively short" and, unlike the conflict in 1991, Coalition Forces could not cross the Saudi border. That meant "a lot of soldiers were being funnelled through a relatively narrow area". He had been concerned that those forces would be "highly vulnerable" to chemical and biological weapons.[545]

1392. The judgement that southern Iraq was the most likely area for the first use of chemical or biological weapons against Coalition Force, and against the local population, was contained in the JIC Assessment of 19 February 2003, 'Southern Iraq: 'What's In Store?'.[546]

1393. Asked by the Inquiry in May 2010 about the benefits of the northern option as he had understood them, Sir Kevin replied they were:

- the need to "shut the door" to prevent Saddam Hussein retreating north;
- to "avoid what would otherwise be a very politically difficult situation with the Kurds and the Turks";
- squeezing from both directions provided "a much better way of outmanoeuvring your opponent";
- concerns about "a real bottleneck through Kuwait"; and
- the Kurdish Autonomous Zone was a "fairly stable area", which "looked rather easier than fighting one's way or helping to fight one's way up Iraq".[547]

1394. Sir Kevin recognised that the mountainous terrain in south-eastern Turkey and the length of the logistics supply lines would have posed challenges, but he thought Adm Boyce and "a lot of military men would have liked" to have had the northern option.[548]

1395. Lt Gen Reith expressed reservations about the relative advantages and disadvantages of the northern option in November.

1396. Gen Reith told the Inquiry that the North was "quite a difficult area" and "over time, and particularly with the Turkish elections, and … my sense of a lack of enthusiasm by the Turks … for me, as the planner, it became less and less attractive as an option".[549]

1397. Gen Reith added:

> "… I was unhappy with the logistic support required and the tenuous lines of communication to actually get our logistic support to our forces.
> "It was very, very tight … it was very mountainous … we were going to have to use the river Tigris as our protection on our left flank … it wasn't an attractive military option for what would have been, at best, a division plus."[550]

1398. Gen Reith told the Inquiry that discussions started with the US about where in the South a land package might best be employed after his paper of 18 November. He added that the Americans moved from thinking that the UK would definitely be going to the North to "maybe we [the UK] should be doing the South".[551]

1399. Other evidence given to the Inquiry suggested that the relative advantages and disadvantages of the northern and southern options might have been more balanced than some of the briefing offered to Mr Hoon and Mr Blair suggested.

1400. Gen Jackson told the Inquiry that the "relative logistic challenge" of the southern option was "probably logistically simpler" than the northern option.[552]

1401. Asked about his assessment of the risks and liabilities for the UK when he saw that the position was shifting from the North to the South, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "Timing would have been one … our transit … was going to take slightly longer. There was … a risk of the actual logistic effort but that was mitigated by the fact the Americans were going to help us … desertification of some of the kit … required some effort … But the Americans … were particularly helpful in making room for us in Kuwait …"[553]

1402. Lord Boyce added that "substantial effort" had already been made on the southern option and that working alongside the Amphibious Task Group helped the logistics support, and:

> "… whatever risks there were in switching to the South, in many senses were outweighed by some of the benefits …"[554]

1403. Asked about the assessment of the Iraqi opposition, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that he had not thought that Iraq's fighting capability was going to be "any more challenging than … in the North".[555]

1404. Lord Boyce added that "one of the advantages" of the South which emerged "as the battle plans started to develop" was that "we were to be given an area of operations … which would … make it a cleaner operation" for the UK than working alongside the US 4th Infantry Division:

> "Our job … as we saw it, was going to be to fix the Iraqi or defeat the Iraqi divisions in the South to make sure the Americans had untrammelled progress towards the North without having to worry about their rear or their flank … That gave us a very clear mission …"

1405. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "Our feeling was that actually it [the South] might be … an easier place to deal with than the North, or further north I mean, because … the vast majority of the people in the South were Shia as opposed to the more heavy or original mix of Sunnis further north where we thought there would be problems between the Sunnis and Shia once the country – once we got past war end. Therefore, we were dealing with one sector which hopefully would be working together … and would be cooperative … as we tried to … regenerate the country after the fighting was over."[556]

1406. In oral evidence, witnesses offered different views about their perception of Turkey's position in late 2002 and early January 2003.

1407. Maj Gen Wilson had reported on 17 July 2002 that US planners had been asked to look at plans for a scenario without Turkey.

1408. DSF 1 told the Inquiry that he had informed Lt Gen Pigott "in about November" that UK ground forces were "not going through Turkey".[557]

1409. The Inquiry asked Sir Richard Dearlove at what stage he judged that the Turkish route would not be possible.[558] He told the Inquiry that "in the summer some time" it was "clear that the Turkish General Staff … were not going to agree to a British military deployment through Turkey".

1410. Sir Richard added:

> "… in the autumn, it became clear that there was going to be no British military deployment through Turkey. The Turkish generals … were not going to change their minds."

1411. Asked if he had offered any advice to the military, Sir Richard replied:

> "… I would have reported that instantly … I was in touch frequently. Mike Boyce and I were regularly talking to each other. But … it was evident. It would have been evident on the attaché military channels at about the same time."

1412. Asked why, when he had taken the view in October 2002 that Turkey was not likely to agree to the deployment of UK forces, the MOD had persisted, Sir David Manning replied:

> "Yes, but … I was wrong about a lot of military things. So there's no reason why I should have been right about this one. I think probably … because the Americans were telling our military, don't worry, we will fix it, and … certainly the Americans themselves were surprised at how difficult the Turks proved to be …"[559]

1413. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that the decision on 8 January 2003, to switch to the South:

> "…wasn't a sort of cold shock for everybody … The Prime Minister, the Cabinet and clearly the Secretary of State for Defence had … been exposed to the … contingency planning we were doing, should we have to go South."[560]

1414. Subsequently Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "We imagined in the very early stages that because there was a NATO plan giving access to come through Turkey to go towards Iraq, but that was something which should not present a great difficulty. Certainly when I spoke to the Chief of the Turkish General Staff, General Özkök, in the very early days, September/October or so, there didn't appear – well, he didn't seem to think it would be a particular problem."[561]

1415. Lord Boyce added that "we rather thought" Gen Özkök "had more power than he probably did", or was prepared to exercise after the Turkish election of a new Government. The MOD "persevered for probably longer than we should have done in trying to get a route through Turkey".[562]

1416. Asked whether there had been cautionary advice from the FCO about Turkey's position, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "I can't recall at any time being told to back off. As you said, we pressed on and we pressed on until the bitter end when we had to make a final decision."[563]

[562] Public hearing, 27 January 2011, pages 14-15.
[563] Public hearing, 27 January 2011, page 15.

1417. Lord Boyce stated that the US:

> "… started giving us warnings … around late October/November … that we were probably pushing against a closed door, but we still even then carried on believing we might do it, because … that particular option seemed to be the more sensible one … if we were going to commit a large-sized landforce, because … Kuwait is a small country."[564]

1418. Asked about Sir Richard Dearlove's evidence, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that he could not recall talking to him about the issue but Gen Özkök was "certainly not saying 'Don't bother to darken my door again'".[565]

1419. The northern option remained the primary focus for UK planning until early January.

1420. The Inquiry accepts the strategic rationale for a northern axis, including the aspiration to provide a framework which would allow other nations to make a military contribution.

1421. There are questions, however, about whether the UK should have given serious consideration to the alternatives for the UK, and discussed them with the US, at an earlier stage.

1422. The UK recognised, from July 2002 onwards, that the proposed northern option for UK land forces depended on Turkey's agreement to the transit of foreign forces; and that might be difficult to obtain. There were serious doubts about whether the Turkish Government would permit the transit of UK (or US) troops.

1423. Before the election of a new Government in Turkey, the JIC assessed on 30 October 2002 that Turkey's opposition could be overcome with US pressure.

1424. The UK received mixed messages from Washington and Ankara during the autumn of 2002.

1425. The warning signs that Turkey might well refuse to permit the deployment of UK forces led both Lt Gen Reith and the US Administration to suggest that the UK should develop alternatives to the northern option.

1426. The UK decided US assistance would be essential for securing Turkey's agreement and that the US should take the lead in talks with the Turkish Government elected in November 2002.

1427. The position taken by Mr Hoon, Sir Kevin Tebbit and Adm Boyce in discussions with the US Administration about the UK commitment to the northern option may in part have been driven by tactical considerations, and the need to maintain the maximum pressure on the US to pursue agreement for the deployment of UK ground forces with Turkey.

1428. Mr Blair had asked on 6 December 2002 for advice on the options for UK land forces if Turkey refused transit.

1429. Adm Boyce did not instruct Lt Gen Reith to develop options for the South until 18 December 2002.

1430. Mr Hoon was advised that the decision on a switch to the South could be taken after his visit to Ankara in January 2003.

1431. From late July until late December 2002, Adm Boyce advised Ministers that the UK was not in a position to generate the forces necessary to conduct combat operations at divisional level without US support.

1432. Until the middle of December 2002, Ministerial decisions and military planning and preparations were based on advice that the deployment of a single combat brigade, with four battalions, in a northern option and the possible deployment of a Royal Marine Commando Group to southern Iraq, were the maximum which could be deployed given the requirements of Op FRESCO and the timescale for military operations envisaged by the US.

1433. When the US asked the UK to deploy to the South, there was little time to:

- prepare and consider a detailed analysis of the options before decisions were taken; and
- plan for and implement the deployment for operations which at that stage it was anticipated might start by early March.

1434. The implications of the switch to the South in mid-January and the increase of the combat force to three brigades for equipping the forces deployed are addressed in Sections 6.2 and 6.3.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses:

- the decision in mid-January 2003 to deploy a divisional headquarters and three combat brigades for potential operations in southern Iraq;
- the commitment of those forces to a combat role in the initial stages of the invasion of Iraq; and
- the principles of international humanitarian law (IHL) governing the conduct of military operations, including discussions on delegation of authority for targeting decisions during the air campaign.

2. This Section does not address:

- the campaign plan for the invasion, which is addressed in Section 8;
- the roles and responsibilities of the Secretary of State for Defence, the Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), the Permanent Under Secretary (PUS) in the Ministry of Defence (MOD), and other key military officers and civilians, and the way in which advice was prepared for Ministers and decisions taken in the MOD in 2002 and 2003, which are set out in Section 2;
- the decisions on the wider UK strategy towards Iraq which are necessary to understand the wider context surrounding military deployments. Those are addressed in Section 3;
- the UK's assessment of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) in late 2002 and early 2003, which is addressed in Section 4.3;
- the consideration of the legal basis for military action, which is set out in Section 5;
- the preparations to equip the force for operations in Iraq, and the implications of the decisions between mid-December 2002 and mid-January 2003 to increase the size of UK combat forces and be ready to take an earlier role in the invasion in support of US forces, which are addressed in Section 6.3;
- the funding for the operation, which is addressed in Section 13; and
- the planning and preparations for the UK military contribution post-conflict, including decisions on the UK's Area of Responsibility (AOR) for UK military forces, which are addressed in Sections 6.4 and 6.5.

Key findings

- The size and composition of a UK military contribution to the US-led invasion of Iraq was largely discretionary. The US wanted some UK capabilities (including Special Forces), to use UK bases, and the involvement of the UK military to avoid the perception of unilateral US military action. The primary impetus to maximise the size of the UK contribution and the recommendations on its composition came from the Armed Forces, with the agreement of Mr Hoon.
- The decisions taken between mid-December 2002 and mid-January 2003 to increase the combat force deployed to three brigades and bring forward the date on which UK forces might participate in combat operations compressed the timescales available for preparation.
- The decision to deploy a large scale force for potential combat operations was taken without collective Ministerial consideration of the decision and its implications.
- The large scale force deployed was a one-shot capability. It would have been difficult to sustain the force if combat operations had been delayed until autumn 2003 or longer, and it constrained the capabilities which were available for a UK military contribution to post-conflict operations.

The switch to the South

3. The initial planning for a military invasion of Iraq and the decision on 31 October 2002 to offer ground forces to the US for planning purposes are addressed in Section 6.1.

4. The main planning assumption throughout 2002 was that the UK would provide air and maritime forces in support of US operations in southern Iraq, but that UK ground forces would be deployed through Turkey for operations in northern Iraq.

5. As Section 6.1 sets out, there was no certainty that Turkey would agree to the UK deployment.

6. Mr Blair had also been considering a number of issues over the Christmas holiday in 2002. On 4 January 2003 he produced a long note to officials in No.10 on a range of issues.[1]

7. On military preparations, Mr Blair wrote that there was a need to make sure that the military plan was “viable”; and that he needed a meeting and the “military’s assurance that the plan can work. This is no small undertaking.”

8. Other points in the note are addressed in Section 3.6.

CENTCOM's proposal for a UK Division in the South

9. At the beginning of 2003, the US asked the UK to provide ground forces in the South.

10. Major General Albert Whitley, Senior British Land Adviser and Deputy Commanding General (Post Hostilities), told the Inquiry that, after General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief US Central Command (CENTCOM), had decided not to move the US 4th Infantry Division south, he had discussed with Lieutenant General David McKiernan, Commander, Coalition Forces Land Component Command (CFLCC), on 28 December 2002 whether it would be possible to use UK forces in the South to augment US forces.[2]

11. On 5 January, Brigadier Whitley prepared a paper for the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) on "the imperatives for timely decision making for the commitment of UK Land Forces" to the US Operational Plan.[3]

12. Brigadier Whitley explained that uncertainties about whether Turkey would allow transit of ground forces had led US and UK planners, on 28 December, urgently to concentrate on developing robust operations from the south. He recorded that "even if the UK were … granted transit through Turkey … the complexity and scope of the problem … from a purely operational view point, would not be welcomed".

13. Instead, Lt Gen McKiernan "would welcome the commitment of a UK division in the South from the start of the operation". That would allow him to merge Phases II and III of the campaign and both of the major subordinate US commands, V Corps and 1 Marine Expeditionary Force (1 MEF), to strike north fast. The UK mission would be to "seize, secure and control" the rear area and right flank of the operation and provide a coherent transition to Phase IV (post-conflict) operations in captured territory without loss of US combat forces. That would include securing infrastructure such as Umm Qasr and the Rumaylah oilfields, and fixing Iraqi forces in the Basra area. The UK Area of Operations (AO)[4] was likely to be bounded by the Iraq/Kuwait border, the US V Corps/1 MEF boundary, Jalibah air field and the Euphrates, an area about the same size as Kuwait (approximately 17,800 sq km).

14. Brigadier Whitley reported that the US saw the involvement of a UK division in this role as "so important … they will do anything to assist within their power providing there is time to do so". In his view, that would allow the UK force to be "less balanced in its capability than our doctrine and philosophy demand because the US will provide key support particularly in fires and air defence".

[3] Paper Comd SBLA, 5 January 2003, 'Decision Imperatives'.
[4] Definitions and usage of the terms Area of Operations (AO) and Area of Responsibility (AOR) are given in Section 6.4.

15. The plan would require the UK to:

> "… weave together three disparate levels of formation (1 MEF, 1(UK) Armd Div [1st (UK) Armoured Division], a Cdo Bde [Commando Brigade], an AA [Air Assault] Bde and an armd bde [armoured brigade]) neither of which … have trained nor operated together in recent history. Their mission rehearsal starts 8 Feb[ruary] 03 … under the full gaze of the rest of the Coalition, and they had better be ready for it."

16. Brigadier Whitley observed that time was "running out". The US was "desperate to see a UK inflow and logistics plan" and there was:

> "… no time left to probe UK/US capabilities in the formal and, perhaps methodical manner that has been done to date. Now is the time for ruthless, hard-hitting planning … The UK is an issue they [the US] are eager to address – as each day passes now this issue is snowballing and soon (probably by 12 Jan 03) it will be difficult to control inside the planning timelines."

17. Brigadier Whitley recommended "most strongly":

- "that any opportunity for worthwhile UK involvement of land forces in the North has come and gone";
- that "UK tailored forces of a divisional headquarters, 3 Cdo Bde RM [3 Commando Brigade Royal Marines], 16 AA Bde [16 Air Assault Brigade] and the necessary logistic C2 [Command and Control] and CSS [Combat Service Support] is committed to the South"; and
- "Acceptance, in principle, of a UK Area of Operations and mission in an area of southern Iraq bounded in the north by the Euphrates."

18. Brigadier Whitley concluded:

> "The effect of timely decisions on the above on our own ability to successfully conduct operations and on our US allies cannot be underestimated."

19. The MOD has been unable to locate any later version of Brigadier Whitley's advice.[5]

20. The US request was based on a number of key assumptions, including that the UK wanted a significant role in combat operations and that it wanted to operate at divisional level with a divisional Area of Responsibility (AOR).

21. The military response was immediate and positive and led to a recommendation to deploy large scale ground forces to the South.

22. Deploying UK ground forces to southern Iraq constituted a step change for the UK, providing it with a far more prominent role in the operational plan.

---

[5] Letter MOD to Iraq Inquiry, 1 November 2012, [untitled].

23. By the time decisions on the UK role were taken in March 2003, the UK contribution had become central to the military campaign.

24. The Chiefs of Staff had an initial discussion of the proposal that the UK should provide a division for military operations in southern Iraq on 6 January 2003.[6]

25. Lieutenant General John Reith, Chief of Joint Operations (CJO), reported a US view that there was a "90 percent probability of no access" for UK ground forces through Turkey. The delay had led Lt Gen McKiernan to conclude that he could place only one division through a northern route into Iraq, and his preference was for that to be the US 4th Infantry Division. Gen Franks had directed Lt Gen McKiernan to plan on UK ground forces being integrated in the South.

26. Lieutenant General Sir Anthony Pigott, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments), reported that he had been given a different steer by the Pentagon as recently as one hour before the meeting. Lieutenant General George Casey, Director of the Joint Staff, had "indicated that the UK's military position had not at all been a hindrance and had revealed that the northern axis remained of fundamental strategic significance to the Campaign. It was possible that although the US military might have been content to disengage the UK from the North, the political machine might not be so inclined."

27. Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), directed that the ambiguity should be resolved but it was "essential" to maintain "constructive ambiguity" in Iraq over the potential for a northern threat".

28. It was also "agreed that the time was now right" for a direct approach to Turkey at the political level; and that it would be important to make separate requests for the forces in Packages 2 and 3.

29. Lt Gen Reith described his latest paper on the land options, which was "based on a US offer for the UK to operate at division strength (HQ 1(UK) Armd Div; ATG [Amphibious Task Group]; 7 Bde [7 Armoured Brigade]; and 16 Air Asslt Bde) in a discrete AOR in the South". That plan "appeared to offer strategic influence to the UK, especially in the move to Phase IV …"

30. The US offer of significant logistic support would "allow the UK to commit fewer personnel but with an increased combat capability necessary because of the nature of the task".

31. Lt Gen Reith requested decisions by 8 January, including approval to cease planning for the northern option and to reallocate Operation FRESCO[7] training.

[6] Minutes, 6 January 2003, Chiefs of Staff meeting.
[7] The use of military forces to provide cover in the event of a strike by the Fire Brigades' Union.

32. General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the General Staff, noted that the new plan still had to constitute "a winning concept".

33. Mr Paul Johnston, Head of FCO Security Policy Department, reported the developments to the Private Office of Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary.[8]

34. Mr Johnston recorded that there was still some possibility that Turkey might say yes to land forces at the "last moment". In response to concern from Gen Walker that, if Saddam Hussein thought there would be no attack from the North he might move his more effective troops to the South, Mr Johnston had suggested it would be helpful for Turkey to retain "constructive ambiguity" to keep the pressure on Saddam Hussein "and thus make a military option in practice less likely". Adm Boyce had "strongly agreed" and stated that the point should be included in the briefing for Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary.

35. Mr Johnston wrote that the three brigades "would be ready for action by 10 March". That reflected US planning assumptions of an "air campaign beginning on 3 March and the land campaign on 19 March". The MOD's initial assessment was that the southern option offered "significant strategic exposure with minimum military risk. The Iraqi forces likely to be confronted were 'incapable of manoeuvre' and morale was assessed to be low."

36. Mr Johnston commented that Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), and Gen Walker:

> "… both noted that the southern option for the UK was part of an overall concept significantly different to that on which Ministers had so far been consulted."

37. Mr Johnston added that the MOD would "make a strategic assessment of the pros and cons before the next Chiefs' meeting, to inform the consequent advice to Ministers".

38. Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head (Foreign Affairs) of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), reported to Sir David Manning, Head of OD Sec and Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser:

> "All of this was new to the Chiefs but greeted with some enthusiasm. They saw advantages in a relatively discrete UK operation with fewer risks than the northern route. The UK would be well placed for the transition to Phase IV (peacekeeping) and in control of Iraq's access to the sea and 75 percent of its oil. The disadvantages were also that the UK could be left in an area with lots of media attention and sitting on the oil fields so vulnerable to the charge that we were only in it for the oil."[9]

39. A paper from Lt Gen Reith submitted after the discussion reported that Lt Gen McKiernan lacked combat power in the South during the early stages of the campaign and the US had "stated a requirement for a divisional HQ, two light brigades, and a single armoured brigade".[10]

40. Lt Gen Reith advised that the risks to a UK division were "minimal" and that the "geographical area proposed would allow the UK to set the standard in the aftermath". It would be "strategically placed to exert maximum influence during Phase IV".

41. Lt Gen Reith described the US plan as based on four assumptions:

- "The UK desires a significant role in land combat operations, now in the South as the only viable alternative to the North."
- "The UK wishes to operate at divisional level, with a divisional area of responsibility (AO)."
- "Recognition that the UK logistic liability should be minimised."
- "The UK experience in wider peacekeeping, and subsequent ability to conduct early Phase IV – post conflict – operations."

42. Lt Gen Reith advised that the UK had yet to "conduct a formal tactical estimate on the proposed mission"; but a "formation capable of armoured manoeuvre" was required potentially to protect the right flank of 1 MEF during its advance north and to secure Basra International Airport and fix Iraqi forces in Basra City.

43. Lt Gen Reith added that the UK "may be asked to take control of key points in the City during Phase IV, having isolated it during Phase III. Should troops to task not allow this operation to take place, CFLCC [Coalition Forces Land Component Commander, Lt Gen McKiernan] accepts that the final securing of Basra would be a corps task."

44. Lt Gen Reith recommended the deployment of a divisional headquarters and three brigades to the South; and that the armoured brigade should comprise four battlegroups.

45. PJHQ also identified the need to begin thinking about the practical consequences of the proposal for the UK's post-conflict role, including the need for more support from other government departments.

46. On 7 January, Mr Paul Flaherty, MOD Civil Secretary in PJHQ, set out PJHQ's thoughts on preparations for Phase IV in a minute to Mr Ian Lee, MOD Director General Operational Policy.[11] In the absence of an agreed US inter-agency position on Phase IV planning, the CENTCOM commanders' conference in Tampa, Florida on 15 and 16 January was likely to have a significant impact on US policy-making.

[11] Minute Flaherty to DG Op Pol, 7 January 2003, 'Op TELIC: Preparing for Phase IV'.

47. Phase IV planning was likely to be particularly important:

> "… if, as now appears likely, the UK were to take on the first Phase IV AOR in southern Iraq. We would, in effect be setting the standard for the rest of Phase IV work. (And, of course, CJO [Lt Gen Reith] is, in any case charged in CDS' Directive[12] with planning humanitarian assistance in theatre should it become necessary.)
> "From our point of view … we have to begin thinking very soon about the practical consequences on the ground of taking on the AOR. These include issues such as: food, water, displaced persons, oil (including accounting for its use), potential Iranian incursions, pollution as well as, in the slightly longer term, security sector reform and reconstruction. Some, if not all of this will of course either determine, or more properly ought to be determined by, strategic considerations of post-conflict Iraqi structures."

48. Mr Flaherty explained that PJHQ intended to establish a team charged with "developing planning for Phase IV implementation" as soon as possible, which would aim to take into account the lessons of the Balkans and Afghanistan. PJHQ was "in a reasonably good position to link up with US military thinking", but would need more support from other government departments to help produce "a fully joined up approach".

49. The MOD Strategic Planning Group (SPG) advised that forces committed to a southern option in addition to the Amphibious Group would demonstrate a UK commitment to all phases of an operation and, crucially, the aftermath, and provide additional leverage in the planning phases.

50. The UK would gain a potential veto, but exercising it would strain UK/US relations.

51. The role envisaged, of stabilising the South as US forces moved north, had the advantage of a reduction in the probable need for high intensity war-fighting.

52. The analysis underpinning the SPG's conclusions did not appear to include any assessment of the conditions likely to be encountered or the tasks to be performed in either northern or southern Iraq during Phase IV.

53. On 7 January, the SPG produced a paper analysing the advantages and disadvantages of changing to a southern option and the risks of a campaign without a northern axis.[13]

---

[12] An explanation of the Chief of Defence Staff's Directive is provided in Section 8.
[13] Paper [SPG], 7 January 2003, 'Operation TELIC – Military Strategic Analysis of Pros/Cons of Adopting a Southern Land Force Option'.

54. The SPG stated that the UK was "highly unlikely to be able to deploy a conventional land force through Turkey". If the UK wanted to contribute land forces which would meet the US planning timetable, a reassessment of the force packages was necessary.

55. The paper recorded that early work on a "Winning Concept" had "illustrated" that a military campaign to achieve the UK's strategic goals would need to be "quick and successful". The uncertainty over Turkey raised questions about whether the military plan would be able to achieve the effects in the North which the SPG considered remained central to delivering a winning concept. If they were not achieved, forces operating in the South were "likely to be at greater risk" of:

- chemical warfare (CW)/biological warfare (BW) attack;
- stiffer conventional resistance; and
- potential unconventional operations/civilian resistance.

56. The preferred role for the UK in the South would be to provide a "relief in place for US forces in the early phases of a campaign" to release US combat forces to fulfil other tasks.

57. In the time available, the UK could generate four possible force packages:

- the Amphibious Task Group (ATG);
- the ATG and an armoured brigade;
- the ATG and a light brigade; and
- the ATG and both an armoured and a light brigade.

58. The SPG advised that, if the UK committed to a southern option over and above the ATG, it would "demonstrate UK commitment to all phases" of an operation and "crucially in the aftermath". That would provide Ministers with "additional leverage" in the planning phases. Further commitment to US planning and operational effort would make UK forces "integral to success in current US concept". The UK would, therefore, "gain a potential veto, but exercising it would strain UK/US relations for some time to come".

59. The SPG also stated that US combat power would deliver military success, but strategic victory would be "successful delivery of aftermath and limiting unintended consequences".

60. Adopting a southern option had the potential to:

> "Provide UK with leading role in key areas of Iraq (free of Kurdish political risks) in aftermath, and thus provide leverage in aftermath planning efforts, especially related to:
>
> – Humanitarian effort
> – Reconstruction of key infrastructure
> – Future control and distribution of Iraqi oil."

61. The advantages of three brigades operating in the South included:

- A "more balanced and robust formation, able to respond independently to changes in the tactical situation".
- "Increased military influence".
- "Reduction in probable need for high intensity warfighting".
- Shorter and less complex lines of communication (LoC) than concurrent UK operations in the North and South.
- A reduced requirement for Combat Support (CS)/Combat Service Support (CSS).
- Early establishment of a discrete AOR and less demanding command and control.
- The "opportunity to exercise command" in a discrete southern AOR.
- UK forces would no longer be "required to manoeuvre alongside digitised US formations".
- It would allow a "balanced transition to Phase IV".
- Less demanding command and control and the UK would be unlikely to need to call on UK resources from the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps (ARRC) Headquarters.

62. The disadvantages identified included:

- There was no detailed UK operational planning and more information was required on threat and scale of tasks "eg Basra".
- The timeline would be "very demanding" with "no margin for error".
- 16 Air Assault Brigade was not yet included in the UOR requests.
- There would be no time for many elements of the land force to complete in-theatre training or integration prior to commitment to action. That was described as challenging and carrying considerable risk, but it was deemed to be "acceptable".

63. Adoption of the southern option would mean:

> "UK will have made an early commitment to aftermath that will probably demand a commitment for a number of years. This would be hard to avoid in any event, and engagement in South offers significant advantages over possibly being fixed in North with Kurds."

64. The paper did not explicitly identify the risk of Shia unrest or Iran's attitude to Coalition Forces in southern Iraq.

65. The SPG concluded:

> "UK is at a strategic decision point … given the convergence of US military preparation and timelines, continued Turkish prevarication, and the need to maintain pressure on the Iraqi regime to deliver …
>
> "From a review of all the factors the downside military risk of UK disengaging from the Northern Land Option is outweighed by the upside benefits of the proposed engagement in the South."

66. The SPG recommended that the Chiefs of Staff should agree Lt Gen Reith's recommendation for a force package to be deployed to the South.

67. Adm Boyce directed that Ministerial approval should be sought for Lt Gen Reith's recommended option while noting that a formal request from the US would be needed.

68. At their meeting on 8 January, the Chiefs of Staff noted that there was still a need for the US formally to request that any UK ground forces be switched to the South.[14]

69. Adm Boyce also observed that it was "inconceivable that the UK would not play a part in Phase IV operations, which could be enduring". He added:

> "There remained a need to test the plan as a winning concept, but against that caveat … the plan recommended in the paper represented a sensible military option with a valuable task, and that the option should be taken forward."

70. Other points made in the discussion included:

- "The shift in focus from North to South argued for the provision of a comprehensive force package able to react to a wide range of tasks …"
- "The plan was operationally sound but there were strategic implications that would have to be considered. It was possible that UK forces would become a lynchpin for the US campaign. This could place the UK in a difficult position … conversely, the strategic influence it would offer the UK would be significant."

71. The Chiefs of Staff agreed Lt Gen Reith's recommendations and selected the option of deploying the Divisional HQ and three brigades. Ministerial approval would be sought in two stages:

- a submission seeking approval to make the necessary forces available and to deploy certain enabling elements; and
- a further approval to deploy the main force and to release 16 Air Assault Brigade from Op FRESCO.

---

[14] Minutes, 8 January 2003, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

72. Lt Gen Reith advised:

> "Phase IV would need to begin at the same time as any offensive operations. There was a need for PJHQ to take ownership of Phase IV planning, which should include OGD [other government department] input. The US were standing up JTF-4 [Joint Task Force 4, the post-conflict planning unit in CENTCOM], which would be responsible for US Phase IV planning; UK staff were to be embedded."

73. Co-ordination of Phase IV planning from mid-January is addressed in Section 6.5.

74. Reporting on the meeting to Mr Straw's Private Office, Mr William Ehrman, FCO Director General Defence and Intelligence,[15] recorded that he had stressed:

> "… there should be no assumption of a political decision to authorise force in the near future … If Ministers agreed the deployment proposed, it needed to be clear that it was part of force on mind, and it should not set sail with a use it or lose it presumption. Sustainability needed to be in any plan … Chiefs accepted these points."[16]

75. Mr Desmond Bowen, Deputy Head of OD Sec, reported the discussion to Sir David Manning.[17]

76. The military planning assumed a "decision date of 15 February and the start of hostilities in very early March". The UK was being offered an amphibious role at the start of hostilities. Thereafter, US forces would move north while the UK "took on stabilisation of a southern sector which would eventually include Basra".

77. Mr Bowen concluded:

> "While we are now getting more clarity about the shape of US military intentions in an attack on Iraq, and the potential UK role, precious little thought has gone into aftermath planning … if the UK is to take on an area of responsibility for stabilisation operations, a lot of preparatory work is needed urgently. MOD have in mind to engage … FCO, DFID & DTI [Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Department for International Development and the Department for Trade and Industry] on this."

78. Sir David Manning sent Mr Bowen's report to Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff. Sir David wrote that he had asked Adm Boyce to cover the issues when he briefed Mr Blair – with the Chiefs of Staff – the following week. Mr John Scarlett, the Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), should also be asked to attend.[18]

MOD advice to No.10 on deployment to the South

80. The MOD alerted No.10 on 8 January to the proposed deployments to the South, which would be crucial to the US plan.

81. Addressing the perceived advantages and disadvantages, the MOD stated that the South offered a high profile role which was achievable within US timelines and offered the UK a significant voice in US decisions.

82. The disadvantages included the impact on the US if the UK subsequently decided not to participate in military operations.

83. A letter from Mr Hoon's Private Office to Sir David Manning on 8 January reported the US proposal and the potential roles in the South for UK forces.[20]

84. The MOD advised that the US judged time was too short to deploy both a US and UK division through Turkey and that: "Inevitably the US priority" was to "keep alive the possibility of deploying their own division … to maintain the strategic benefit of a northern axis".

85. After describing the proposed roles for three brigades, the MOD stated:

> "On a first reading, there are a number of attractions. This would be a high-profile role for UK ground forces at the beginning of any campaign, in an area in which the threat (barring WMD use) is likely to be limited. When combined with the offer of US logistic support … this has the potential to allow a significant reduction in the overall number of Reservists we might require. Our initial assessment suggests that we could achieve deployment within current US timelines, and sustain such a force in theatre potentially for some time, allowing political flexibility over timing. The proposed UK role in the South should enable US forces to reach further, faster, whilst providing a coherent transition to aftermath operations – an area of acknowledged UK expertise – in territory captured early in the campaign. It would demonstrate at the very beginning of ground operations that this is a Coalition, rather than a US-only, campaign …
> "On the other hand, there may be some disadvantages. The proposed UK role would be crucial to the US plan in the South. Whilst this would give us a significant voice in decision-making, it would also increase the military impact on the US on any eventual UK decision not to participate in an operation: clearly, this would place us in a very awkward position if the US seemed likely to want to proceed in > circumstances with which we were not content … Wider questions about the overall US plan still need to be answered, particularly as long as their ability to achieve the necessary strategic effect in the North remains uncertain. And we need to look further at the detail of what is proposed, before reaching a firm view on its military and political merits."

86. The plan assumed a "final UK Divisional Area of Responsibility, including for aftermath operations would be an area bounded by the Iraq/Kuwait border in the south, Jalibah airfield in the west, the Euphrates in the north, and the Shatt al-Arab waterway in the east – a largely Shia area of some 1,600 sq km."[21]

87. The MOD said further advice would follow "next week". In the meantime, Mr Hoon had authorised the release from Op FRESCO of some units from 16 Air Assault Brigade, and other measures, "to keep military options open".

88. At Cabinet on 9 January, Mr Hoon told his colleagues that no decisions had been taken to launch military action.[22] Nor had the US finalised its military planning. Some changes to forces assigned to Op FRESCO, to provide an emergency fire-fighting capability during the firefighters' strike, would be necessary to keep options open.

89. Mr Blair concluded that the future behaviour of Saddam Hussein in responding to UN pressure was "unpredictable". The UK was "right to continue with its military preparations". It should also maintain the focus on the fight with international terrorism and preventive measures at home. Media reports of a rift within the Cabinet were "nonsense". Cabinet the following week would "provide the opportunity for an in-depth discussion of Iraq".

90. Lord Turnbull, Cabinet Secretary from 2002 to 2005, told the Inquiry that "the presentation to … Cabinet was still – nothing was inevitable. We are pressing the UN option. No decisions on military action, whereas you can see that, at another level, the decisions on military action were hardening up quite considerably."[23]

91. Sir Kevin Tebbit advised Mr Hoon on 14 January about the potential damage to key aspects of the wider US/UK relationship in the foreign and security field if the UK failed to participate in a US-led military operation.

92. Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Mr Hoon on 14 January drawing out how the US "would react if HMG failed to go along with the United States in the event that they decided to use military force against Iraq without a further enabling UNSCR [United Nations Security Council resolution]".[24] While it was "unwise to attempt to calibrate precisely" it was "reasonable to expect that there would be significant damage". This would be greater than if the UK had behaved like some other countries.

93. Sir Kevin feared:

> "… that having valued profoundly the way we have stood shoulder-to-shoulder with them so far, the US will feel betrayed by their partner of choice …
> "… the damage to our interests and influence would be felt most immediately and strongly in the foreign policy and security field, although other areas of the relationship could not be immune."

94. The minute set out the risks to the UK's interests and influence, which have not been declassified.

95. Sir Kevin concluded that:

- military intervention could have a "benign outcome";
- there would be advantages from "being there at the outset"; and
- being a "key part" of the US-led Coalition would "enable us [the UK] to continue to act as a force for good …"

96. The minute was sent only to Mr Hoon.

97. Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, suggested to Mr Hoon that the minute provided thoughts "if required" for Cabinet on 16 January. He believed that the key point was that a UK "betrayal" could result in "damage to our interests globally".[25]

98. The evidence given to the Inquiry about the context for that minute, and the question of whether an earlier document from Sir Kevin Tebbit – identifying concerns about both a number of aspects of the policy on Iraq and the implications of the proposed change to the UK's military contribution, and suggesting the need for discussion in Cabinet – was given to Mr Hoon is addressed later in this Section.

99. By mid-January, the military plan had still not been finalised.

100. Adm Boyce warned of the potential dangers associated with "catastrophic success" and the need to plan for Phase IV.

101. The Chiefs of Staff were informed that the UK might be asked to take on additional tasks if they had the capacity to accept them.

102. At the meeting of the Chiefs of Staff on 15 January, Adm Boyce:

> "… underscored the potential dangers associated with 'catastrophic success' and the implicit need to develop thinking for aftermath management. In planning for [25] Manuscript comment Watkins on Minute Tebbit to Secretary of State [MOD], 14 January 2003, 'Iraq: What If?'.

> Phase IV, the UK was adopting a twin track approach: the FCO and Cabinet Office were leading the top-down strand, and PJHQ was leading the bottom up effort. The challenge which lay ahead was matching the two pieces of work … The UK concept at the strategic level was to develop a model that could be offered to the US. It was assessed that the US was still working to an unrealistic assumption that their forces would be 'welcomed with open arms' by the Iraqi people during Phase IV operations, and there was an opportunity for the UK to lead the aftermath debate."

103. Major General Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations (Operations) (DCJO(O)), gave the Chiefs of Staff an oral update on the land package and plan, air basing options and targeting issues.[26]

104. The Chiefs of Staff were told that the plan would not be finalised until after Major General Robin Brims, General Officer Commanding (GOC) 1 (UK) Div, had met US commanders, which was likely to be at the end of January. They agreed that the "specified" tasks would be "uncontentious and achievable".

105. The Chiefs of Staff also noted that the UK AO "was a disproportionately important piece of real estate".

106. In his report to Sir David Manning, Mr Bowen stated that the meeting had discussed the current state of planning "at length".[27] He wrote that the tasks for the UK forces were:

- The initial "clearance" of the al-Faw Peninsula and the "opening" of Umm Qasr port.
- 16 Air Assault Brigade and 7 Armoured Brigade would then secure the allocated area of responsibility.
- The "capture" of Basra "was not part of the Division's task".
- The "weight of the initial air attack would be designed to shock the Iraqi leadership and military into submission" and the campaign was "meant to achieve quick results".
- The UK was expected to be responsible for its area within five days from the start of ground operations.

107. Mr Johnston reported to Mr Straw that the MOD would seek approval from Ministers and Mr Blair later that week.[28] He wrote:

> "… there would be heavy impact bombing from day one … regime targets … would, feature early in the campaign. This was designed to achieve regime collapse as quickly and painlessly as possible … the Chiefs recognised that there would be presentational and legal issues. Further work is being urgently done on this …"

108. Mr Johnston also reported that PJHQ had:

> "… noted that US planning, which continued to develop, implied that there might be additional tasks for the UK … This might involve the UK being invited … to do early seizure operations. The UK force package would not be configured to conduct such tasks. Chiefs accepted this, but noted that, politically, it would not be easy to refuse the US when the time came if UK forces had broadly the right capacity."

109. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon, No.10 officials and Mr Scarlett were briefed on the proposals to deploy a UK division to the South on 15 January.

110. Mr Blair was informed that the MOD would be seeking an urgent decision on the way ahead by the end of that week.

111. Most of the questions identified by No.10 for discussion, particularly those on post-conflict issues and costs, required cross-departmental advice and collective consideration.

112. There is no indication that other departments were consulted formally by the Chiefs of Staff, the MOD or No.10 before the meeting on 15 January.

113. Nor were they consulted before Mr Blair's decision on 17 March to deploy troops.

114. Advice and a draft letter to No.10 were forwarded to Mr Hoon's Private Office on 15 January informing him that the Chiefs of Staff endorsed the proposed role in southern Iraq and the deployment of HQ 1 (UK) Div, 7 Armoured Brigade and 16 Air Assault Brigade in addition to the Amphibious Task Group (ATG).[29]

115. Mr Hoon was advised that a number of wider issues remained to be resolved before it could be concluded that the US plan represented a winning concept. Those included:

- the legal basis for operations against Iraq;
- the "ability of the US to develop an overall winning concept which delivers the strategic effects required in the North"; and
- "a credible plan for the aftermath".

116. Mr Blair met Mr Hoon, the Chiefs of Staff and others[30] to discuss planning for Iraq on the evening of 15 January.[31]

[31] Minute MA/DCJO(Ops) to MA/CJO, 'Briefing to Prime Minister' attaching Briefing [unattributed and undated], 'Brief to PM – 1715 Wed 15 Jan' and slide presentation.

117. No other Cabinet Ministers were present, and the FCO was not represented.

118. The meeting was scheduled to last for one hour: a 15 minute presentation from Adm Boyce setting out the state of contingent military planning, the proposed UK contribution and the timescales for decision, in the context of current armed forces activity and deployment in the UK and elsewhere in the world, followed by a 45 minute discussion.

119. The presentation to Mr Blair included a briefing on the operational plan from Maj Gen Fry.

120. The briefing for Mr Blair from Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, informed him that the Chiefs of Staff were likely to say that they were "giving up" on getting Turkey's approval for a northern option.[32] The MOD wanted a decision by the weekend as preparations would become visible by the following Tuesday.

121. As suggested by Mr Powell, Mr Rycroft provided a list of "some difficult questions" for Mr Blair to put to the Chiefs, including:

- "Do the US have a winning military concept?"
- "Are we confident we can do our part?"
- "Are we sure we have properly thought through the changes forced on us by Turkey's no?"
- "Will he [Saddam Hussein] use WMD?"
- "What military involvement do you foresee in the aftermath?"
- "Will we be running Basra?"
- "Will the targeting in the campaign take account of the need to run (parts of) Iraq …?"
- "Is it fully costed?"
- "Where will the money come from?"

122. As well as the No.10 record of the discussion, several accounts of the meeting were produced by MOD participants.

123. Mr Rycroft produced a minute noting that Mr Blair would receive formal advice on the land package the following day, and stating that Mr Blair wanted further advice on a number of issues.[33]

[32] Minute Rycroft to Prime Minister, 14 January 2003, 'Iraq: Military Planning: Meeting with Chiefs of Staff'.
[33] Letter Rycroft to Watkins, 15 January 2003, 'Iraq: Military Planning'.

124. Mr Watkins summarised the content of Mr Rycroft's letter and Mr Hoon's views in a minute to Mr Lee commissioning further work on the issues so that the MOD would be able to respond to No.10 "by the end of the month".[34]

125. The Secretary to the Chiefs of Staff Committee (SECCOS) produced a record of the discussion, circulated within the MOD on 22 January, which was described as complementing the record of the discussion produced by No.10.[35]

126. An "unofficial" PJHQ account, with the scripts and presentation slides used, was prepared and sent to Lt Gen Reith, who was in the Middle East at a CENTCOM Commanders' Conference.[36]

127. Adm Boyce advised Mr Blair that the military plan would work.

128. There was no recorded discussion of either the risks of the amphibious operation in the initial phase of an attack or the readiness of UK forces.

129. Adm Boyce's briefing notes identified that the US had seen "UK participation as essential from the outset".[37] The US had "accommodated our constraints at every turn to ensure we are part of their coalition and to guarantee a serious military task for our forces. In fact, the current plan … makes them a lynchpin crucial to success of the overall plan." The UK would, however, rely heavily on US enabling assets.

130. A "convincing, coherent military build-up" leaving Saddam Hussein in no doubt about the consequences of non-compliance with UNSCR 1441 ("force on mind") was the best way of applying pressure.

131. Gen Franks was working to produce a "loaded and cocked" winning capability from 15 February with the US able to commence an air campaign and some ground offensive operations (possibly including the UK) from 3 March and the main effort starting within two weeks on 19 March, although the US was looking to bring that forward.

132. The UK's interest was to be "ready to engage from the outset", and the briefing stated that US "timelines" had driven the UK's. If the UK was to match the US timetable, the MOD would need permission by 17 January to be ready to start deploying land force equipment from 24 January. The deployment to the Gulf would add 3,000 miles to their journey and port access in Kuwait would be limited.

133. Mr Blair was advised that the UK could maintain its ability to use the forces deployed for six months, but if they were not used it could then take up to a year before they would be in a position to take action.

[37] Minute MA/DCJO(Ops) to MA/CJO, 15 January 2003, 'Briefing to the Prime Minister' attaching Briefing [unattributed and undated], 'Brief to PM – 1715 Wed 15 Jan 03'.

134. Mr Blair was reported to have said that he hoped that it "won't come to this" and that this "will happen mid-February to early March". Mr Blair's final comment was that this was the "best chance we have got"; it was his "strong view that we wouldn't be looking much past the end of February before seeing this take place".

135. Adm Boyce's briefing notes identified "two essential points" in relation to whether or not the US had a winning concept:

- The need for Saddam Hussein to believe that force would be overwhelming and that he could not survive in power, while, in parallel, giving genuine hope to Iraqis who opposed his regime that an end was possible.
- Coalition military action would need to be "swift" to avoid a "drawn out campaign … becoming a battle of attrition conducted against backdrop of dwindling public support"; to prevent Saddam using "spoiling tactics such as use of WMD, or causing an ecological disaster by torching the oil fields"; and "to minimise the risk of unintended consequences".

136. Adm Boyce's briefing notes offered no indication of the MOD's view on whether the objectives could be met.

137. The PJHQ record of the meeting reported that Mr Blair had asked "will it [the military plan] work?"[38]

138. Adm Boyce "stated that it would"; he had increasing confidence in the plan "since TU [Turkey] had become more engaged in discussions" about allowing US forces to attack from the north.

139. Asked whether success would be the collapse of the Iraqi regime or the fall of Baghdad:

- Adm Boyce was reported to have explained to Mr Blair "the problem of 'catastrophic success' whereby the regime collapsed at the very outset" before the Coalition was ready.
- Mr Hoon's view was reported to have been that the media would view the fall of Baghdad as the culmination of military operations.

140. PJHQ also reported that Mr Blair had:

- focused on the importance of a simultaneous air and ground campaign; and
- asked about the cohesion of the regime and its chances of maintaining control.

141. Mr Blair was concerned about the implications if Saddam Hussein sought to put in place a "Fortress Baghdad" strategy and possible pre-emptive use of WMD.

---

[38] Minute MA/DCJO(Ops) to MA/CJO, 15 Jan 2003, 'Briefing to the Prime Minister'.

142. Mr Blair was concerned about the plans in place if Saddam Hussein retreated to Baghdad.[39]

143. Mr Blair asked for further advice on:

- which Coalition Forces were expected to reach Baghdad, and how quickly;
- a full analysis of the risk that Saddam Hussein would concentrate on "Fortress Baghdad";
- an account of how the US planned to deal with that if it arose; and
- what they would do if there was inter-communal fighting in the city.[40]

144. In addition to the defence of Baghdad, Iraqi use of WMD and burning the oilfields were discussed as some of the worst outcomes of military action, and that "planning was well advanced to counter" both those contingencies.[41]

145. In response to his question about the chances of Saddam Hussein using WMD, Mr Blair was told that "intelligence left no ambiguity over Saddam's willingness to use WMD if he judged the time was right, but that as his WMD were currently concealed from the UNMOVIC [United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission] it would take some time for it to be constituted ready for action."

146. Air Marshal Sir Joe French, Chief of Defence Intelligence (CDI), stated that the Coalition's ability to detect Iraqi preparations in relation to theatre ballistic missiles was "good, and such detections would likely trigger operations".

147. Mr Blair asked:

> "… military planners to test further their predictions of Saddam's likely responses to attack, and how we would counter them. In particular, this should cover Saddam's possible pre-emptive use of WMD …"

148. Mr Blair was reported to have asked for: "Contingency plans to be developed to counter potential 'unexpected consequences'."

149. Mr Hoon subsequently asked that the work on predicting Saddam Hussein's possible responses to military action should be taken forward in the context of a comprehensive "red teaming" of the military plan to identify all conceivable risks to its success.[42]

150. The first report of the "Red Team" set up by the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) was not produced until mid-February. That is addressed later in this Section.

[42] Minute Watkins to DG Op Pol, 16 January 2003, 'Iraq: Military Planning'.

151. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon were concerned about the impact of the air campaign and the need to minimise casualties.

152. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon were told that the campaign would depend on "immediate effect" rather than "weight of effort".[43]

153. Mr Blair was concerned about the scale of the bombing campaign on Baghdad and the risk of collateral damage and civilian casualties.[44] The briefing acknowledged that the intensity of the campaign "raised difficult issues over political control of the targeting process".

154. The PJHQ record noted that, "interestingly", it was Mr Hoon who had urged Mr Blair "to exercise a degree of restraint" on President Bush, whom Mr Hoon had "described as 'going for it'".[45] Mr Hoon was concerned to ensure that there was no "irreversible damage" to Iraq.

155. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon were also concerned that "destruction of Iraq's communications infrastructure could reduce the speed at which the population assimilated the hopelessness of resistance, and that hard-core elements could fight on autonomously".[46] The Coalition would "need to consider how news of the regime's collapse would flow quickly through the country".

156. Mr Blair was concerned to ensure that bombing targets were proportionate and chosen to minimise civilian casualties, and asked to see a list of targets which UK air forces might be asked to attack, with a commentary on their military importance and risk of casualties.[47]

157. Forwarding that request to Mr Lee, Mr Watkins added a requirement to provide a list of targets "which would be attacked by [US] aircraft operating from Diego Garcia (or other UK airfields) or with other UK support".[48]

158. The guidance on targeting subsequently agreed by the Government after discussions with Lord Goldsmith is addressed later in this Section.

159. Mr Blair asked for further work on post-conflict issues.

[47] Letter Rycroft to Watkins, 15 January 2003, 'Iraq: Military Planning'.
[48] Minute Watkins to DG Op Pol, 16 January 2003, 'Iraq: Military Planning'.

160. The PJHQ record provided the fullest account of the discussion of post-conflict issues. Issues raised by Mr Blair included:

> "Worst Case. The PM wanted to know what CDS thought was the worst case scenario. After much discussion about destroying the oil infrastructure, use of WMD and hunkering down in Baghdad and fighting it out, it was felt that the worst case was internecine fighting between Sunni and Shia, as well as the Kurds/Turks/Iraqis.
>
> "Aftermath. This led on to a general discussion on aftermath, with the PM asking what the Iraqi view on it was. CDS stated that the thinking on this issue was 'woolly' at this stage, with work only just beginning. The PM stated that the 'Issue' was aftermath – the Coalition must prevent anarchy and internecine fighting breaking out."[49]

161. Mr Blair asked the MOD to look at three things:

> - We need to be clear on what we are offering the Iraqi people and senior members of the regime (those below the top 100 on the list[50]) – removal of the senior hierarchy or minimising resistance or what?
> - Aftermath. We have to develop a feasible plan.
> - Look at the unexpected – think through the big 'what ifs'; oil, WMD, internecine fighting – and develop a strategy."

162. The author of the PJHQ record added some "personal observations", including:

> "The PM came across as someone with strong convictions that this should, and will, go ahead. He accepted the military advice being given to him, although he still sought reassurance that all aspects had been looked into and that plans are drawn up to deal with the unexpected or perceived worse cases. It is clear from the three areas that he asked further work to be done on that the Phase IV part of the plan is critical."

163. Mr Blair also asked for further advice on the outcome of the post-conflict talks scheduled for Washington the following week, given the need for "much greater clarity about US intentions" for the aftermath of a military operation.[51]

164. Mr Watkins told Mr Lee:

> "… we will clearly need to use all our regular contacts with the US, in both CENTCOM and the Pentagon. If appropriate, this is an issue that Mr Hoon could [50] The Inquiry has not seen any indication of what was meant by "the top 100 on the list". It is likely that it was a precursor to the list of 55 Iraqis featured on the "deck of cards" issued by the US military in April 2003.

himself raise with Rumsfeld [Mr Donald Rumsfeld, US Secretary of Defense] in their next regular phone call next week."[52]

165. The subsequent advice and discussions on post-conflict issues are addressed in Section 6.5.

166. Asked whether Ministers were given a paper or briefing on the operational risks and what might go wrong, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

"Certainly as far as the defence Ministers were concerned, they were aware of what our plans were and what the pluses and where might be the pinch points on any plan and what we were doing to ensure those were mitigated as far as possible."[53]

167. Asked how the risks had been described to Ministers, Lord Boyce replied:

"… it would have been done in the normal sort of way. You would have done threat assessments, worked out what the potential opposition forces might be, their dispositions, what our capability was matched against that. Some of the risk … was mitigated by the fact that we were going to be operating in our own area … while the American forces drove for Baghdad …

"There were additional problems … for example, the importance of making a very fast entry to secure the oilfields … which were different than we had in the North."[54]

168. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that a "full briefing" had been provided to Ministers "as to whether there was indeed a winning concept now"; subject to the resolution of questions on the legal base and post-conflict issues.[55]

169. Sir Kevin added that issues such as managing targeting to minimise the risks to civilians and intensive fighting within Baghdad, "were considered very carefully".[56]

170. Asked how the various risks had been highlighted to Ministers, Gen Reith told the Inquiry that PJHQ had "produced various papers, looking at each aspect in terms of risk", including casualty predictions.[57]

171. Lt Gen Fry told the Inquiry that there had been "a growing and … demonstrable requirement for something that could act as a flank guard to American … manoeuvre", and the "lack of … combat power" resulting from the decision to hold the US 4th Infantry Division in the Mediterranean had "created an opportunity into which British forces subsequently fitted".[58]

172. Asked to explain why the force levels had grown and were larger than had been deployed in 1991, Lord Boyce replied that he could not answer that question: "The package was being shaped to deal with the task that we thought we might encounter."[59]

173. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that he had expressed concern to Mr Blair at the briefing on 15 January, which "was more about the immediate aftermath, immediately after the fighting phase, what would we need to do to provide security in the first instance, but also to provide what we saw as being the most immediate problem would be a humanitarian problem".[60]

174. Sir Kevin thought that "the large-scale option was a natural consequence of what we could do or what we would plan to do". There was "also a military view about the sense of critical mass under national command that works well, which would have been a feature of the Chiefs' of Staff considerations". He did "not at all" sense "the military machine was forcing the political hand".[61]

175. In his subsequent hearing, Sir Kevin Tebbit agreed that, when the decision was taken, Ministers did not have "a full appreciation of the implications, politically, militarily and security-wise".[62]

176. Mr Scarlett subsequently reported additional aspects of PJHQ's thinking to Sir David Manning.

177. Mr Scarlett followed up some of the points raised at Mr Blair's briefing from the MOD in a separate briefing from Maj Gen Fry and reported his discussions to No.10.[63]

178. The points Mr Scarlett recorded included:

- The fact that "it will not be possible to disaggregate UK targeting from overall US effort" was made "forcefully" to him.
- The "difficulty for Saddam of matching up his CB [chemical biological] warheads to missiles after previous efforts to conceal them" was "stressed".
- It was "certainly not clear … how Baghdad will be brought under control and Saddam finished off".
- Maj Gen Fry "thought it very possible" that the US would "eventually" ask the UK "to lead the assault to capture the bridgehead before moving aside to let the Americans through for a clean start".

Cabinet, 16 January 2003

179. As promised by Mr Blair on 19 December 2002 and 9 January 2003, Cabinet discussed Iraq on 16 January 2003.

180. Despite Mr Blair's promise that military options would be discussed and the imminence of the formal decision to offer a significant land contribution, Cabinet was not briefed on the substance of the military options or the circumstances in which force would be used.

181. Cabinet did not discuss the strategic implications of making a military contribution.

182. Mr Blair said that:

> "… he wanted to make the United Nations route work. The inspectors … needed time to achieve results … If Iraq was not complying with the demands of the United Nations, he believed the … Security Council would pass a second resolution."[64]

183. Mr Blair subsequently stated:

> "Meanwhile, British and American forces were being built up in the Gulf. If it came to conflict, it would be important for success to be achieved quickly. The build up was having an effect on the Iraqi regime, with internal support dwindling for President Saddam Hussein … The strategy remained to pursue the United Nations course."

184. Mr Blair concluded by telling Cabinet that he would be meeting President Bush to discuss Iraq at the end of the month, after Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 27 January.

185. The discussion in Cabinet on 16 January of the wider policy is addressed in Section 3.6.

186. Lord Turnbull told the Inquiry that he:

> "… wouldn't have expected Cabinet to get into the business of land forces through the north or the south … I think they would probably have recognised that that was quintessentially the business of a smaller group. So none of them suggested a serious change of direction."[65]

187. In a statement for the Inquiry, Mr Hoon wrote that, to the best of his recollection, Cabinet on 16 January:

> "… was devoted entirely to the efforts to secure a second resolution, and was the subject of an unusually wide-ranging discussion."[66]

[64] Cabinet Conclusions, 16 January 2003.
[65] Public hearing, 13 January 2010, page 60.
[66] Statement, 2 April 2015, page 5.

188. Mr Blair had:

> "… made it very clear that he wanted to focus all of his Government's efforts on securing that second resolution."

189. Mr Hoon was:

> "… quite confident at that stage that he [Mr Blair] would not have welcomed any efforts to discuss the military options in relation to Iraq. In the absence of Prime Ministerial agreement to such a discussion, it would not have taken place."

190. Mr Hoon wrote:

> "Nevertheless because I thought colleagues should be aware at this juncture about the military preparations under way, and because this had not been discussed at the Cabinet meeting on 16 January on the second resolution, I arranged for a paper on this subject to be circulated."

191. The absence of any collective discussion of the military options, despite Mr Blair's promises, is addressed later in this Section.

192. Mr Blair's decision not to reveal that he had been advised that a further determination by the Security Council that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations would be required to authorise the revival of the authority to take military action, or to invite Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, to speak at Cabinet on 16 March, is addressed in Section 5.

The decision to deploy ground forces, 17 January 2003

193. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 16 January seeking agreement to the "key role in southern Iraq" proposed by the US for the UK:

> "Important questions remain to be resolved … But the role proposed for the UK is a sensible and significant one, and I recommend that with certain qualifications, we accept it. We need to decide quickly."[67]

194. Mr Hoon added that equipment and personnel would need to be moved early the following week and that, if Mr Blair agreed, he proposed:

> "… to announce the composition and deployment of the force in an oral statement on Monday 20 January."

195. Mr Hoon set out the proposed UK contribution as discussed in the briefing the previous day, including that the provision of US logistic support would enable the UK to "make compensating reductions in our force, which would number around 26,000 rather than the 28,000 originally envisaged" for the deployment of a single armoured brigade through Turkey. He estimated that the requirement for Reservists was "unlikely to be much above 3,000, compared to the 7-8,000 we originally expected".

196. Mr Hoon wrote that the proposed role for the UK was "essentially as described in my Office's letter of 8 January":

- "During initial US ground operations the ATG … would "conduct the Umm Qasr/ al-Faw operation as already planned."
- "Approximately ten days later HQ 1 [(UK)] Armoured Division with 16 Air Assault Brigade would relieve US forces in an area south of Basra and the Euphrates, including the Rumaylah oilfields, enabling the US to press on further north."
- "Whilst US forces conduct decisive ground operations to isolate Baghdad, HQ 1 [(UK)] Armoured Division with 7 Armoured Brigade could protect the right flank of the US 1st Marine Expeditionary Force as it advances north. This would include securing Basra International Airport and isolating (but not entering) Basra itself."

197. Mr Hoon added that the US was looking at possible additional tasks, but the UK would take a cautious approach: "We do not intend that our force should bite off more than it can chew, given its reliance on US logistic support."

198. Mr Hoon stated that, as he and Mr Blair had discussed, a number of issues still needed "finally to be resolved" before the UK could "conclude that the overall US plan represent[ed] a winning concept". Those included the "legal basis for any operation" and the "credibility of plans for the aftermath". The US was addressing the "strategic importance of fixing Iraqi forces" in the North.

199. The concept for the campaign was "radically different from that employed in the 1990-1991 Gulf Conflict". It depended on "the achievement of overwhelming effect" to attack the cohesion of the Iraqi regime and deterring opposition rather than the "application of overwhelming force". Much depended on achieving "shock and awe" at the outset through the "application of largely US air power to targets throughout Iraq".

200. Mr Hoon stated that the plan would need further development to address a number of "specific challenges (oilfields, displaced persons, handling Iran etc.), but no insurmountable problems have been identified". The threat from conventional Iraqi forces was assessed as "limited, in part because of the expected effects of US air power".

201. The timescales for possible action would mean that some risk would have to be taken on the fitting of Urgent Operational Requirements (UOR) equipment, but that risk was "considered acceptable".

202. Mr Hoon wrote that:

> "The proposed final [UK] Area of Responsibility is a coherent one with largely natural geographical boundaries … and includes economic infrastructure critical to Iraq's future, including much of its oil reserves, critical communications nodes, a city (Basra) of 1.3 million people and a port (Umm Qasr) the size of Southampton. Although the establishment of UK control over this area will require careful presentation to rebut any allegations of selfish motives, we will be playing a vital role in shaping a better future for Iraq and its people."

203. Map 3 in Annex 4 of the Report shows the proposed AOR and the effect of subsequent decisions to expand.

204. Commenting on the point, originally made in the letter from his Private Office to Sir David Manning on 8 January, that the UK's proposed role would "make us even more important to the US plan than we were before", Mr Hoon wrote that was:

> "… to some extent a double-edged sword. By making us more integral to the US plan, it would add to the difficulties if US and UK intentions should diverge. But this is a sharpening of an existing risk – bearing in mind US reliance on Diego Garcia, for instance – rather than the creation of a new one."

205. Mr Hoon wrote that Mr Blair had identified three big issues in the discussion the previous day:

- the "nature of the proposition" that was being put "to the Iraqi people including those in the governing apparatus who are not considered beyond the pale, and the way in which that would be conveyed to them without damaging operational security and losing the element of surprise";
- the need "now that we have a proposed Area of Responsibility" to work on that "with greater clarity". The forthcoming visit of a Whitehall team to Washington (see Section 6.5) was identified as "an opportunity to mould US thinking"; and
- making sure the UK had the "best possible contingency plans for worst-case scenarios".

206. Mr Hoon said he had put work in hand to address those issues.

207. Mr Hoon set out the latest estimates for the costs of military operations and the actions and timetable for implementation:

> "CENTCOM assume that, unless Saddam changes his behaviour, a political decision to take military action may be made in mid-February. Air and ground operations could begin in early March, with the main effort by ground forces beginning in mid-March (although they still aspire to bring the main effort forward)."

208. The UK headquarters would need to be "deployed and readied in Kuwait … by the end of January, 16 Air Assault Brigade by the beginning of March, and 7 Armoured Brigade by mid-March". That would be followed by a period of Force Integration Training – preparation and rehearsal alongside US forces – before they would be properly prepared to conduct operations.

209. Mr Hoon stated that the force package was "broadly what the media already expect", but the "high visibility of the measures involved" would "require a reasonably candid explanation". He set out the advantages of the "earliest possible announcement".

210. Mr Hoon recommended that the UK should "inform the US that we agree that planning should assume the contribution of the proposed UK land force package to carry out the role the US has requested, subject to:

(i) the overall caveat that a further political decision would be required to commit UK forces to any specific operation

(ii) US assistance in facilitating the bed-down of UK forces, and provision of logistic support

(iii) further work to develop a satisfactory plan for the aftermath."

211. Copies of the letter were sent to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Sir Andrew Turnbull.

212. The UK's assessment of Iraq's conventional military capability and decisions on targeting are addressed later in this Section.

213. The risks taken on procurement of equipment and its deployment to the front line are addressed in Section 6.3.

214. The absence of advice on what might constitute a satisfactory plan for the aftermath or on the risks associated with deploying UK forces before decisions had been made on the scope or duration of their post-conflict role is addressed in Section 6.5.

215. On 17 January, Mr Blair agreed the deployment of large scale UK ground forces, comprising the HQ 1 (UK) Div and three combat brigades.

216. Commenting on Mr Hoon's letter to Mr Blair, Sir David Manning wrote:

"As briefed to you yesterday …

"Are you content with the recommendations …?

"These seem right, subject to your views on an announcement on Monday 20 January. This is bound to have significant impact. In any event, I assume you will want to see a draft."[68]

217. On 16 January, Mr Straw raised his concerns that the momentum in Washington was to do something soon after the report from Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of

UNMOVIC, to the UN on 27 January, and it was being assumed that Mr Blair would be with President Bush.[69]

218. Mr Straw recommended that Mr Blair should speak to President Bush.

219. Mr Straw's advice and the subsequent discussions with the US are addressed in Section 3.6.

220. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 17 January, flagging up three major issues: targeting; the response to any Iraqi use of WMD; and the need for greater clarity on thinking and plans for the aftermath.[70]

221. Mr Straw advised that:

> "… much greater clarity is required about US thinking and plans for the aftermath. How long would UK forces be expected to stay in the area of responsibility proposed for them? What would be their role in what form of administration, not least in Basra …? We need in particular far greater clarity on US thinking on management of the oilfields. As you know, we have sizeable differences of view from many in the US Administration who envisage Iraq being a US military governorate for an extended period of time. A UK team will be discussing this issue with the US next week. It will be putting hard questions, and highlighting our own view that there needs to be a move to UN administration, with Coalition Forces remaining responsible for security, as soon as possible."

222. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair:

> "Good questions. But I don't think they affect your decision in principle."[71]

223. Mr Blair replied, "agreed".[72]

224. Following a telephone conversation, Sir David replied to Mr Watkins late on 17 January that Mr Blair was "content to proceed on the basis of the Defence Secretary's recommendations", and that he would be grateful "if you and the FCO would now take things forward as proposed".[73]

225. Mr Hoon's Private Office informed key officials of Mr Blair's decision, and that Mr Hoon had approved:

- That the US be informed that its planning should assume the contribution of the proposed UK land force package to carry out the role requested, subject to:

- the overall caveat that a further political decision would be required to commit UK forces to any specific operation;
- US assistance would be provided in certain specified areas; and
- further work was needed on the plan for the aftermath.

- Approaches should be made to appropriate countries for basing and assistance.
- The deployment of the land package could begin from early the following week.
- Further advice should be provided before the end of January on additional Reservists required.[74]

226. On 17 January, when Adm Boyce met General Richard Myers, Chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff, he reported the position on UK planning, including that, with Op FRESCO, more than 50 percent of the UK Armed Forces were committed to operations and "the issue of UK conventional ground forces via Turkey was 'parked' for now".[75]

227. Mr Blair had focused on four issues:

- targeting legality and proportionality;
- "what-ifs" against Saddam Hussein's reactions;
- dealing with Baghdad; and
- "above all, aftermath – especially in the context of catastrophic success".

228. Adm Boyce was told that a task force for the aftermath, with a one-star commander, was being trained by Joint Forces Command (JFCOM) but that should change to a three-star multi-national command.

229. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Jonathan Powell:

> "Whatever political pressure for early action, US military clearly can wait a few more weeks. I think they should. We need more time to try to get the hard evidence."[76]

230. The decision to deploy ground forces was announced on 20 January.

231. Mr Hoon announced the deployment of UK ground forces, which would "include the headquarters of 1 (UK) Armoured Division with support from 7 Armoured Brigade, 16 Air Assault Brigade and 102 Logistics Brigade", in an oral statement in Parliament on 20 January.[77] The package comprised "approximately 26,000 personnel", in addition to 3 Commando Brigade "with around 4,000" personnel including its support elements which he had announced on 7 January.

232. Mr Hoon stated that it was "a high readiness, balanced and flexible force package, bringing together a wide range of capabilities"; and that he and the Chiefs of Staff were "confident" that it was "the right group of forces for the tasks that may be necessary".

233. Mr Hoon concluded that none of the steps being taken represented "a commitment of British forces to specific military action", and that:

> "A decision to employ force has not been taken, nor is such a decision imminent or inevitable. I must also emphasise … that the deployment of forces on this scale is no ordinary measure.
>
> "While we want Saddam Hussein to disarm voluntarily, it is evident that we will not achieve that unless we continue to present him with a clear and credible threat of force. That is why I have announced these deployments, in support of the diplomatic process to which we remain fully committed. It is not too late for Saddam Hussein to recognise the will of the international community and respect United Nations resolutions. Let us hope that he does so."

234. Mr Hoon declined to provide any further details of the planning for military action.

235. In response to a question about post-conflict planning, Mr Hoon stated: "Certainly consideration is being given to aftermath issues and the question of humanitarian relief. Obviously, we will design force packages to ensure that we have soldiers in place who can deal with those issues as and when they arise."[78]

The absence of collective Ministerial consideration of the decision to deploy UK forces

236. The proposal to deploy UK ground forces to southern Iraq constituted a step change in the UK contribution to the US plan and made it critical to the success of the military campaign.

237. Mr Hoon's letter of 16 January seeking agreement to the deployment was sent to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Sir Andrew Turnbull.

238. It did not, however, address the wider implications of the decision for Cabinet colleagues.

239. It was clear, from the discussions on 15 January and Mr Hoon's advice to Mr Blair of 16 January, that committing UK forces was likely to mean that the UK would become responsible, as the Occupying Power in the immediate aftermath of military operations, for a significant area of southern Iraq.

240. That would have implications for the responsibilities of the FCO and DFID.

241. It also had major financial implications.

---

[78] House of Commons, Official Report, 20 January 2003, column 37.

242. Ministers did not seek, and were not given, considered inter-departmental advice on the implications of the decision.

243. Nor, despite it being a decision which was likely to have major implications for the UK lasting many years, was there a collective Ministerial discussion before the decision was taken.

244. Nor was Cabinet informed of the proposals and given an opportunity to discuss them before the decision was announced.

245. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that he had advised Mr Hoon, in either late December 2002 or early January 2003, that it would be timely to take stock of UK policy in the light of concerns, including:

- uncertainties about whether it would be possible to agree a second resolution;
- the need to push the UK conditions;
- the impact on the US/UK strategic relationship if the UK did not act with the US;
- the implications of a bigger military role in the South; and
- planning for post-conflict Iraq was not robust.

246. Sir Kevin also stated that he had advised Mr Hoon that he should seek a full Ministerial discussion of the issues.

247. Sir Kevin Tebbit's private minute to Mr Hoon on 14 January, drawing out how the US "would react if HMG failed to go along with the United States in the event that they decided to use military force against Iraq without a further enabling UNSCR", is addressed earlier in this Section.[79]

248. Sir Kevin told the Inquiry in December 2009 that:

> "… by … the end of 2002 – when it is becoming clear that the northern option wasn't going to work and we might take a bigger role in the South, and, therefore, the stakes for the UK would be greater, at that stage it wasn't entirely clear whether we were going to achieve all of our conditions …
> "I certainly discussed these issues very fully with … [Mr Hoon] as to whether this was indeed the right point to take broader stock of where we were going and make absolutely certain that the Government was satisfied with the course. Not to say that I wasn't, it is just [to say] that I felt it was quite important for Ministers to be absolutely clear … what the prospects might be."[80]

[79] Minute Tebbit to Secretary of State [MOD], 14 January 2003, 'Iraq: What If?'.
[80] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, pages 80-81.

249. In subsequent evidence to the Inquiry in February 2010, Sir Kevin added that the shift to the South, which "took place progressively" from mid-December to mid-January 2003, "was a very significant shift" and he had "felt that it was important to reappraise, to pause, to take stock as to what was going on".[81]

250. Sir Kevin told the Inquiry that he had "certainly" written to Mr Hoon; and that he thought he had written "a personal note" which he had been unable to find before the hearing. That had expressed his:

> "… concerns that we were … being led into a possible military action, where we might not actually have secured our objectives; in other words, we wouldn't have disarmed Saddam by the diplomatic route. We might not get a second resolution. We hadn't got post-conflict planning as well pinned down with the United States as any of us wanted at that stage."[82]

251. Asked if he had had a response, Sir Kevin stated that he had "discussed this" with Mr Hoon and he thought they "were very much of one mind that this did need to be thought through very carefully".[83]

252. Sir Kevin told the Inquiry that Mr Hoon had asked him to produce a "note on the transatlantic relationship":

> "One of the issues at that stage was that we had gone so far, by the end of December, with the United States in planning – not just because we wanted to be with the United States, but because I knew the Government believed in what it was doing – that to have gone back at that point and decided not to proceed in circumstances where we hadn't disarmed Saddam … would have been particularly difficult for our relationship with the United States."[84]

253. Asked whether at that stage there was no going back and no room for reassessment, Sir Kevin replied:

> "There was never an unconditional commitment at all. I think that when one begins to engage in military planning, one takes a risk that, if one doesn't see it through in a way that was designed to achieve the effect of disarming Saddam Hussein diplomatically, or the use of force …"[85]

254. Sir Kevin added that, if the UK had backed down "without any of those conditions being met", that would have carried "its own damage".

255. In the context of securing the UK's strategic objectives, Sir Kevin told the Inquiry that his concern in his advice to Mr Hoon in December:

> "… was the risk, as one feels in one's dark moments, that maybe we are not going to get any of these criteria achieved. It wasn't looking as if Saddam was going to back down and really comply. It wasn't looking as if the Americans were not going to pursue the military course if compliance failed. There was a clear sense of impatience, I think in Washington.
> "The planning for post-conflict didn't seem to me to be very robust …
> "So those concerns were ones which led me to say to … [Mr Hoon] at the point when we were also not going to get our northern option and were moving to a southern one, which seemed to me to be very significant, that this is the time to reappraise and to think hard before going forward. It wasn't that I was against going forward."[86]

256. Asked whether, by January 2003, it was too late to reappraise the position because the UK was committed politically to the US and military preparations were going into high gear, Sir Kevin replied that he did not "think it was too late".[87]

257. Sir Kevin added:

> "… by the end of 2002, not to have proceeded … without … very strong reasons, such as Saddam … actually meeting the conditions, would have given us a real problem …
>
> "… [H]aving indicated an intention, with conditions, to work with the United States on the military track, to have gone back on that point would have carried risks and doubts."

258. In May 2010, Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

> "… by Christmas 2002/3, I was very concerned that the penalties of breaking with the Americans, even if our conditions were not fully met, were going to be very severe."[88]

259. Asked about the penalties, Sir Kevin replied:

> "I think the penalties of having gone so far by that stage on a joint venture … were very awkward … I felt it would be helpful for Ministers to pause around January in 2002/3, when we were being presented with a completely different plan, and when it wasn't clear necessarily that our conditions were going to be met, that there was a risk that the Americans might proceed without a second resolution, which we regarded as absolutely essential. There was a risk that Saddam wasn't going to disarm. There was a risk that we were not going to get the broad Coalition that we wanted, and I … felt at that stage it was quite important to consider all the issues, including the cost of not proceeding with the Americans."[89]

260. Sir Kevin stated that he was "reconstructing events on the basis of personal recollection".[90] He had:

"… recorded my concerns and the message was very clear: we need to work harder at making sure our conditions are fully understood and taken up by the US Administration."

261. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry in February 2010 that he thought Ministers had had a discussion about the issues, but he was "not sure about the detail".[91]

262. Asked whether he had seen a point at which the Government at the most senior decision-making levels had fully reviewed and thrashed out the whole range of its options, Sir Kevin Tebbit replied that he "never saw that process taking place" and that he was not "party to those discussions in No.10".[92]

263. Sir Kevin added that, in the second half of January, he had sensed "that was the point when Ministers were coming to major decision point", and "it was also the point where Hoon was recommending the southern option to Government". His "understanding was that there was a pretty full discussion".[93]

264. In May 2010, Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

"Over Christmas I recall being concerned that … suddenly we were looking at a different option, the South, which we hadn't been planning for.

"… I was very concerned before things went further it would be very good for Ministers to sit down and really discuss this fully … I wrote my concerns to Geoff Hoon in a private note, manuscript … advising him that I really thought he ought to talk to his colleagues … and look at it in the round again and pause. I was very concerned that the machine seemed to be moving, and I don't just mean the military machine. I just mean the process seemed to be going on without a full Ministerial discussion.

"Geoff Hoon said to me … I understand, I think that's very important. He said, I just want a note from you on one aspect, and that is the US/UK relationship and the implications of not proceeding, how important is this to us in bilateral terms. So I wrote him a note purely on that issue, as a sort of aide memoire, for one part of the discussion he was going to have with his colleagues. Looking at the record, it looks as if that's the only thing I was bothered about, and that gives a slightly misleading impression.

"I think he did have those discussions with colleagues. The record is not entirely clear, but Ministers clearly had a very serious discussion in the period 16-18 January, but it doesn't seem to have been a formal meeting."[94]

265. Sir Kevin added:

"In my own calculations, I didn't feel particularly comfortable about it. I mean, we are talking about this purely from the point of view of how important we were to the Americans.

"… [M]y own evidence may seem certainly slanted because of the way in which the documents were around and have fallen, and I can't find the note that I wrote to Geoff Hoon over Christmas.

"I think we need to remember … The main purpose of our military build-up was to help convince them [Saddam Hussein and the Iraqis] that we were in deadly earnest … and that they would do much better to pursue the UN route and disarm and allow the inspectors back, and then none of this military action would be necessary.

"So the most important objective … was … to have a real impact on Iraqi perceptions … It was not the most important thing to actually have impact on American perceptions. That was obviously a vital thing, but … a secondary issue. It wasn't the first thing I thought about.

"… [I]n that sense it didn't make much difference whether we were going to the North or the South, but frankly I thought the North would have more effect on Iraqi perceptions if we could have achieved it …"[95]

266. Asked whether there was any high level discussion across Whitehall of the issues he had raised in his minute of 14 January, Sir Kevin replied:

"No, I don't think so … the context is important here. My discussion with Geoff Hoon before that was much wider, and it covered the whole range of issues in terms of what were our basic interests and what were we trying to achieve, and the risks of carrying on without a full Ministerial discussion.

"He [Mr Hoon] simply asked me personally to give him my fullest view about the nature of the US/UK relationship in all its aspects, not to consult anyone, entirely privately, because he wanted to have all the information that might be necessary at his fingertips, should he get into the type of discussion with his colleagues.

I provided him with that. Frankly I was quite embarrassed to see the thing on file because it was intended purely as an aide memoire for him personally."[96]

267. Asked if he could provide a short note of his recollection of the contents of his manuscript note, Sir Kevin told the Inquiry:

"… I think it is very difficult, because I couldn't do it honestly, I don't think."

"… I did worry we were walking into something without thinking carefully about it …

"… [M]y advice was saying … in the circumstances, we have got to a stage where it is better all round for us to continue, but continue to push hard for our conditions, rather than to pull out, because I couldn't think of a good reason for pulling out in the circumstances we were in, because we hadn't exhausted the track, we hadn't … given up trying to bring allies with us, trying to build coalitions, trying to achieve success through the diplomatic route, and therefore there was no grounds, in my view, for pulling out. Were we to think of doing so, there could be lots of damage … to our bilateral relationship with the Americans.

"That doesn't mean to say that if we decided in March 2002 we weren't going to have anything to do with this at all, there would be damage to our relationship. It would have been much smaller, I think, at that stage. It was being at the point that we were by late December, we would have needed very good reasons for not continuing, and it didn't seem to me at that stage that those reasons existed.

"Nevertheless, my main concern at that point was to provoke the Ministers to have a full discussion, rather than simply to say the American relationship is so important, you should just carry on regardless."[97]

268. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that he did not receive advice from Sir Kevin Tebbit about the need for a Cabinet discussion.

269. In a statement for the Inquiry, Mr Hoon wrote that he:

"… was never advised either formally or informally by … Sir Kevin Tebbit, to the effect that there should be a discussion among Cabinet colleagues about the proposed UK deployment to the South of Iraq."[98]

270. Referring to Sir Kevin's oral evidence in February and May 2010 about a private handwritten note suggesting a Cabinet discussion, Mr Hoon stated:

"If he did send such a note, I did not receive it. There is no record of it anywhere. Had I received such a note … I would have marked it to say that it had been read, together with any further comment or question I might have had … [I]t would have been recorded and filed by my Private Office. That is precisely what happened in respect of a private note I did ask Sir Kevin for in respect of the risks to our wider relationship with the US of not being involved on the ground in Iraq [Sir Kevin's minute of 14 January 2003] … If it was important to have such a discussion amongst Cabinet colleagues, I would have expected to receive formal advice to that effect."

271. There is no dispute about the fact that Mr Hoon and Sir Kevin Tebbit discussed the potential impact on US/UK relations if the UK were to be unable to act alongside the US if military action was taken; and that Sir Kevin was asked to produce private advice for Mr Hoon.

272. Sir Kevin Tebbit's advice of 14 January covered only potential damage to the US/UK strategic relationship because that was what Mr Hoon had asked him to do.

273. The evidence from Mr Hoon and Sir Kevin is clear on that point.

274. The Inquiry cannot, however, resolve the differing accounts provided by Sir Kevin Tebbit and Mr Hoon about the circumstances of that request; and whether Sir Kevin had advised Mr Hoon that Ministers should pause and take the opportunity for a full discussion of the UK's options.

275. The Inquiry accepts the evidence that Sir Kevin prepared a note over Christmas 2002 as he told the Inquiry; and that Mr Hoon did not receive it.

276. Given the nature of the advice, and the importance of the issues it addressed, the Inquiry would have expected a document of the nature described by Sir Kevin Tebbit to have been preserved in both his Private Office and Mr Hoon's, notwithstanding the fact that it was handwritten.

277. No handwritten note from Sir Kevin Tebbit to Mr Hoon was included amongst the papers first disclosed to the Inquiry by the MOD.

278. Although the Inquiry specifically asked the MOD to search for such a document, including contacting Mr Hoon's and Sir Kevin's Private Secretaries at the time, it has not been found.

279. Sir Kevin Tebbit clearly had concerns in early 2003 about the implications of a switch in the UK military focus from the North to the South of Iraq.

280. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 6 January 2003 he had noted that the option being discussed was significantly different from that on which Ministers had been consulted.[99]

281. Sir Kevin's recollection of the document he had written is detailed. The Inquiry has no reason to question his evidence.

---

[99] Minute Johnston to Private Secretary [FCO], 6 January 2003, 'Iraq: Chiefs of Staff Meeting, 6 January'.

282. Similarly, if Mr Hoon had received a handwritten document of the nature described by Sir Kevin, the Inquiry considers it is more likely than not that he would have remembered it, even after a number of years. The Inquiry therefore accepts that Mr Hoon did not receive it.

283. There is no evidence that Sir Kevin spoke about the need for a collective discussion with Sir Andrew Turnbull or with other Permanent Secretary colleagues.

284. Regardless of whether or not Mr Hoon was provided with specific advice about the need for a collective discussion, it should have been clear to him from the advice he did receive, which is set out in this Section and Section 6.1, that a significant change of direction was proposed and that there were major issues to be addressed.

285. Sir Kevin Tebbit would have been right to advise in January that Ministers should have paused for a full discussion of the policy on Iraq, the risks of success and failure, the advantages and disadvantages of different options, and the implications of the decisions taken.

286. As Section 7 sets out, decisions of this importance, which raise a number of challenging questions, are best addressed by a Cabinet Committee on the basis of considered inter-departmental advice.

287. Such a collective discussion should then have been reported to Cabinet before the deployment was announced.

288. As Section 9.4 shows, Cabinet did discuss the decision to deploy to Helmand in May 2006, in January of that year.

289. The absence of planning and preparations for the UK role after the conflict is addressed in Section 6.5.

Planning military operations

Military discussions with the US

290. In mid-January, Lt Gen Reith and Gen Franks discussed the role UK forces might play in combat operations.

291. Gen Franks wrote in his memoir that in January, only a small group of senior CENTCOM officers knew "significant aspects of the evolving concept" and only four people had the "full picture".[100]

292. On 17 January, Major General David Wilson, Senior British Military Adviser at CENTCOM, reported to Lt Gen Reith on a conference chaired by Gen Franks for [100] Franks T. & McConnell M. American Soldier. HarperCollins, 2004.

CENTCOM commanders, key staff and Coalition partners from 15 to 16 January in Tampa, Florida.[101] Gen Franks had described the event as "likely to be the last chance for such a gathering to take place. It therefore had to be conclusive".

293. Lt Gen Reith told the Inquiry that he had had a conversation with Gen Franks on 16 January:

> "… I told him that we still obviously weren't committed necessarily to execution, but that the Prime Minister had approved a composite, one-division package. So that was the mix, that we eventually ended up with."[102]

294. At that meeting, Lt Gen Reith and Gen Franks had discussed Phases II and III and Gen Franks had "agreed that 3 Commando Brigade would be the best capability to attack into the al-Faw Peninsula".

295. Lt Gen Reith told the Inquiry that Gen Franks' feeling was that 7 Armoured Brigade 16 Air Assault Brigade could "probably secure the oilfields", releasing the US 3rd Infantry Division and I Marines Division for "the main effort. So we would then have a discrete box in southern Iraq".

296. Asked whether the UK was still suggesting that the US should have two sets of plans in case the UK could not contribute, Lt Gen Reith told the Inquiry:

> "I told him that the Prime Minister had agreed to the package, and so therefore … I'm making an assumption that he now expected us to participate."[103]

297. Maj Gen Wilson reported that "Phase IV responsibilities became a little clearer" at the Commanders' Conference. Gen Franks had demanded that JTF-4 deploy as soon as possible to Kuwait and had welcomed Lt Gen Reith's offer to embed four UK personnel in it. Gen Franks had also directed that "key Phase IV players should visit the Pentagon to ensure that planning was joined up".[104]

298. In his record of the meeting with Gen Franks, Lt Gen Reith explained that UK staff embedded in JTF-4 would have "reach-back" to the Phase IV planning team in PJHQ, giving the UK "considerable influence over US planning".[105] He reported that Gen Franks had "agreed that we could plan on [the] UK having responsibility for the Basra region in Phase IV and would welcome our setting the standard for other nations. Clearly this will need Ministerial approval in due course."

299. Gen Reith told the Inquiry he had also told Gen Franks that he was "unhappy with the way the planning was going" because the US was "going into shock and awe" and the UK "had been very much the custodians of 'Let's worry about Phase IV'".[106]

300. Gen Reith said he had made that point to Gen Franks because the US were going to have a fairly extended air campaign followed by land entry as they had done in the 1991 Gulf Conflict. Gen Reith told the Inquiry he had said that "the oilfields were absolutely essential" for Phase IV:

> "… to provide revenue for Iraq for its reconstruction, and therefore, we needed to secure the oilfields rather than have them destroyed. I also made the point to him that the more china that we broke, the more we would have to replace afterwards. So I left him with those thoughts, and … between that meeting and obviously when we went in, they changed the phasing of the plan so that there was an early land entry."

301. Major General Peter Wall, Chief of Staff to Air Marshal Brian Burridge and later GOC 1 (UK) Div from May 2003 to January 2005, wrote in his post-operation report that the HQ 1 (UK) Div plans team deployed to Kuwait on 19 January and "became embedded" in the 1 MEF Operational Planning Team.[107] The remainder of the Command Group, including Maj Gen Brims, arrived a week later to review 1 MEF options and start developing the Divisional plan.

302. Maj Gen Brims issued an initial Operational Order on 31 January, which described the Division's mission as "to defeat enemy forces, secure key oil infrastructure and seize Umm Qasr port to prevent or mitigate environmental disaster and enable humanitarian operations. Subsequently the Div is to relieve 1st [US] MarDiv … to support its rapid movement N[orth]".[108]

303. The UK and Australia participated in talks on post-conflict issues in Washington on 22 January. The briefing prepared for Mr Lee, the senior MOD member of the UK delegation, included outline assumptions for UK force contributions under four post-conflict phases. It cautioned that, in the absence of a US decision on timelines, these were only illustrative.[109] The suggested UK land force contribution under each phase was:

- US military administration (0-6 months): war-fighting forces (large scale);
- Coalition administration (6-12 months): large scale reducing to medium;
- civil administration (12-24 months): medium scale reducing to small; and
- full Iraqi governance (24 months plus): small scale reducing to advisory teams.

[109] Minute Sec(O)4 to DG Op Pol, 21 January 2003, 'Visit to Washington – Iraq Aftermath'.

304. The briefing included questions to which "we must first have answers" if the UK was to contribute along those lines, including whether the US envisaged "sectorisation" as in Bosnia or "central locations and force projection" as in Afghanistan as the model for Phase IV Coalition force structure. If sectorisation, would the US provide additional forces in the UK sector to perform humanitarian tasks for which UK capacity was limited?

305. After the talks, Mr Lee reported to Mr Hoon that, on the plus side, the US was beginning to take the post-conflict planning seriously and was willing to work with the UK and Australia in the various working groups, but there was little time left.[110]

306. Mr Lee recommended that Mr Hoon raise post-conflict planning in his next phone conversation with Secretary Rumsfeld, in terms that it was a vital issue that needed "to be sorted now because it affects both the UK decision to commit to hostilities … and also international support", and that there was a need for clarity on "who is responsible to whom for what on day after planning and then execution".

307. Those talks and their outcome are addressed in more detail in Section 6.5.

JIC Assessment, 29 January 2003: 'The Emerging View from Baghdad'

308. The JIC assessed on 29 January that retaining WMD was a vital Iraqi interest and that Saddam Hussein was unlikely to agree to relinquish power or go into exile.

309. The JIC predicted that once military action began, widespread lack of loyalty to the regime would become clear and a hard-fought professional defence of Baghdad was "unlikely".

310. The JIC Assessment of 29 January 2003 sustained its earlier judgements on Iraq's ability and intent to conduct terrorist operations.

311. At the request of the FCO, the JIC produced an Assessment on 29 January reviewing developments in Iraq from the viewpoint of the Iraqi regime, particularly Saddam Hussein, and possible Iraqi moves in the coming weeks.[111] The Assessment addressed both the possible response to the obligations set out in resolution 1441 (see Section 3.6) and Iraq's potential responses to the military build-up and military action.

312. The Key Judgements included:

- "Saddam does not appear to realise the severity of the military attack he faces. Senior Iraqi officials, although increasingly convinced of the inevitability of a US-led attack, are unlikely to be telling Saddam about their concerns."

[110] Minute Lee to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 23 January 2003, 'Aftermath: Visit to Washington'.
[111] JIC Assessment, 29 January 2003, 'Iraq: The Emerging View from Baghdad'.

- "Saddam has not lost control or the capacity for rational tactical decisions. He continues to maintain regime cohesion, primarily through intimidation. He is unlikely to agree to relinquish power or to go into exile. He still believes he has a chance of averting military action or, once military action begins, forcing the Coalition to cease hostilities before his regime collapses."
- "Once military action has begun, widespread lack of loyalty to the regime will become clear. Iraqis may not welcome Coalition Forces, but most will at least acquiesce in Coalition military activity to topple the regime, as long as civilian casualties are limited. A hard fought professional defence of Baghdad is unlikely, although elite military and security elements closely identified with the regime may fight until their positions become untenable."
- "Saddam probably believes he has some strong political and military cards to play, even in the face of an inevitable attack … He may use human shields, fire CBW against Coalition Forces, launch a pre-emptive attack on the Kurds, Coalition Forces building up in Kuwait or Israel, or sabotage Iraqi oil wells and water supply."

313. The Assessment stated that: "Given the high level of uncertainty over Saddam's response once he recognises his survival is at stake, we will need to plan for a wide range of humanitarian crises, including a possible humanitarian role for Coalition Forces."

314. The Assessment also stated:

- Iraqis believed that the West was "squeamish about casualties". The JIC continued to judge that Iraq's capability to conduct terrorist attacks was "limited, especially outside the Gulf region".
- The JIC had "previously judged that terrorism could be attempted against Coalition Forces during a military build-up if Saddam believed that an attack was inevitable". There had been "no indication that Iraq was behind the recent attack on US contractors working for the US military in Kuwait". That had, however, highlighted "the vulnerability of the large numbers of Coalition Forces concentrated in an area as small as Kuwait".
- Iraq might well "seek to use its influence over some smaller militant Palestinian groups to encourage them to strike at US and Coalition interests in the Middle East in the event of a Coalition attack". There were "also uncorroborated reports of Iraq assembling teams in various countries to attack UK and US interests in the event of war against Iraq".
- "Despite the presence of terrorists in Iraq with links to Al Qaida", there was "no intelligence of current co-operation between Iraq and Al Qaida".
- There had been "no clear indication of any plan for a pre-emptive military strike against the Kurds, neighbouring countries or Israel". Saddam would have "little incentive to launch such a strike while the Iraqi strategy focuses on convincing UNMOVIC that Iraq does not have WMD holdings", but it might "become an attractive option in the face of imminent Coalition military action". There was "unlikely" to be any advance warning of an attack on the Kurds. The JIC judged that "a pre-emptive limited artillery strike on Kuwait using CBW could be launched in as little as two hours". Preparations for an attack on Israel were "likely to be, more extensive and to stretch Iraqi capabilities to the limit".

- There were indications of "plans to sabotage oil fields to prevent them falling into Coalition hands".
- There were "continuing Iraqi military defensive preparations, including deployments and reinforcements of military units in the South, West and along the border of the Kurdish autonomous zone" which appeared to be "directed against the threat of both an internal uprising and external attack". That included "possibly 1,000 troops on the al-Faw peninsula, apparently in response to the Coalition build-up in Kuwait".
- Iraq's options for redeployment in the South were "limited": "Any significant redeployment in the South would risk triggering a Coalition attack by breaching the Southern No-Drive Zone." The regime did not "trust the Republican Guard enough to deploy them in Baghdad, except possibly as a last resort, leaving them exposed beyond the capital's boundaries".
- The regime was "maintaining 'business as usual': anybody thinking of deserting will face serious consequences […] we may not see clear signs of dissent or defection until the regime is about to fall".
- The JIC judged that "most Iraqis will welcome the departure of Saddam. A few reports suggest that some Iraqis may fight to defend their homeland from what they see as external aggression […] Overall we judge that while Iraqis may not welcome military forces, they will at least acquiesce in Coalition military action to topple the regime, as long as civilian casualties are limited … [M]orale in much of regular army is low and … many soldiers are reluctant to fight. But as long as Iraqi security officers remain with military units and able to enforce discipline, fear of execution is likely to keep regular units at their posts."
- Saddam Hussein was "already placing military targets in residential areas to score a propaganda victory in the event of a Coalition air campaign".
- "In the face of an attack, or even before hostilities if he judged that an attack was imminent" Saddam Hussein might take a number of actions, including seeking to "inflict high enough casualties on any Coalition ground forces, perhaps in Kuwait, including through use of CBW, to halt a Coalition attack and to swing public opinion in the West against hostilities".
- "Once hostilities were under way", Saddam might also "seek to cause an international outcry over the level of Iraqi or Coalition casualties"; and "pursue a scorched earth policy, including the destruction of oil wells and poisoning the water supply".

315. The JIC Assessment ended by stating that Saddam Hussein still believed he had "a chance of averting military action" or "forcing the Coalition to cease hostilities" before his regime collapsed.

316. The minutes of the JIC discussion of the draft Assessment recorded that:

> "… it was difficult to predict if and when Saddam might launch pre-emptive strikes, but the paper should try and make a judgement on possible timescales. The trigger would probably be set when Saddam concluded that his fate was sealed, rather than any movements by Coalition Forces. Most of the Iraqi military would probably crumble quickly under attack. Saddam would maintain his hold of power until then, and there were no indications of possible coups beforehand. Whilst the Iraqi public might welcome the end of Saddam's regime, they were also concerned about the human costs of fighting."[112]

317. On 30 January, Mr Scarlett wrote to Sir David Manning with some "personal observations on the overall intelligence picture".[113]

318. Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "… as we get closer to the deadline, it is increasingly likely that the regime will hold until the invasion actually occurs. I am very comfortable with this assessment. A pre-invasion implosion (eg assassination or successful coup) cannot be excluded."

319. Mr Scarlett suggested that, once an invasion was under way, Saddam Hussein:

> "… knows the weaknesses of the Regular Army and does not expect them to resist effectively. He may genuinely have better hopes for the Republican Guard and place some reliance on their ability to delay the occupation of Baghdad and other cities. In his mind, he may not need such delay to last for long."

320. Mr Scarlett wrote that, "given the perceived inability of his enemies to take significant casualties or setbacks", some of the potential moves that Saddam Hussein could make, as highlighted in the JIC Assessment, "might make to give us pause even after a military operation begins". Mr Scarlett wrote that those moves must be taken seriously. He noted in particular:

- "Attempted use of CBW and missiles … immediately before an attack or (in Kuwait and southern Iraq) in the early stages of the attack itself." That would be "very difficult to pull off", but "even a small number of short range artillery rockets getting through would have a disproportionate effect" and it was "not unreasonable for Saddam to think it would give us second thoughts".
- "CBW armed Al Hussein [ballistic missile] attack on Israel. Again very difficult to achieve, but the benefits of success are obvious."

---

[112] Minutes, 29 January 2003, JIC meeting.
[113] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: JIC Assessment and Personal Observations'.

- "A move against the Kurds either immediately before or after a Coalition invasion …"

321. Mr Scarlett reminded Sir David that the JIC had judged, "over many months", that "once the invasion starts Saddam's regime is likely to prove brittle and fold quickly". It was therefore correct to prepare a military strategy to "make this 'quickly' very quick indeed".

322. Mr Scarlett wrote that circumstances required the UK to look carefully for areas in which things might go wrong. The remaining questions in his mind, other than the potential use of CBW and revenge tactics, were:

- Tough resistance from individual military units capable at least in the available time of inflicting significant casualties on the attacking force.
- Uprisings against regime forces or general blood letting especially in southern cities such as Basra. This is our proposed Area of Operations (AOR). If you have an AOR, you cannot disclaim responsibility for what happens within it.
- The end game in Baghdad especially the fate of Saddam himself … how do we ensure that Saddam's power in his own capital is truly broken …?"

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, 31 January 2003

323. In preparation for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush on 31 January, the MOD drew attention to the implications which any delay in military action beyond the spring would have for its ability to provide a major contribution to military action, and the need for the US and UK to have agreed military objectives.

324. The MOD briefing of 29 January comprised a general update and sections on targeting, "aftermath", and Saddam Hussein's options, including "Fortress Baghdad".[114]

325. The MOD "line to take" suggested for Mr Blair was that, if military operations were to be delayed beyond April/May, the UK would "struggle to put together this scale of force again for the autumn, especially if the fire strike continues. So militarily we could bear some delay but not too much."

326. The background briefing for Mr Blair advised that, if operations were not initiated in the spring, the UK would "face some awkward choices". Some "key elements of the UK contribution were unique" – including the Commando Brigade, the Assault Brigade and a specialist helicopter carrier ship. The MOD suggested:

> "If operations were not going to start until the autumn, we would need to consider bringing some forces back to the UK in the meantime. Our ability to provide a major contribution later in the year will also be severely constrained if the fire strike continues beyond the spring."

---

[114] Letter Williams to Rycroft, 29 January 2003, 'Prime Minister's Briefing – Iraq'.

327. The MOD also advised Mr Blair that agreement on the objectives for a military campaign would be needed.

328. In relation to targeting, the "line to take" offered to Mr Blair was that the UK was "working up our strategic objectives for a military campaign. We need to relate this to the legal base we establish." It was: "Very important that UK and US objectives are aligned soon and in advance of commitment to action so that we can come to a clear and common understanding on targeting issues and the information campaign." That would need "careful handling domestically".

329. The detailed advice from the MOD on targeting is set out later in this Section as part of the consideration of planning for the air campaign.

330. The background briefing for Mr Blair explained that the current thinking was that the objectives would be published "close to, or at the start of hostilities". The MOD explained that the military objectives would enable it to "satisfy" itself "that they represent[ed] minimum use of force as required by international law", and to use the CDS Directive to indicate "what military missions are legitimate, including … what targets we can legitimately attack from the air; and plan Information Operations".

331. A "publicly agreed set of aligned military objectives", being prepared by the Cabinet Office, would enable the UK to participate in a "joined up information operations campaign".

332. Mr Drummond sent Mr Rycroft a minute setting out a "few OD Sec points, just in case they slip through the briefing" provided by the FCO and MOD.[115] Those included the need to agree joint military campaign objectives for publication "shortly before any conflict starts" and that the UK should offer a draft.

333. The development of objectives for the military campaign is addressed later in this Section.

334. A document entitled 'Countdown' set out a checklist of issues for Mr Blair's discussion with President Bush.

335. A document entitled 'Countdown' appears in the No.10 files for 30 January 2003.[116] The document comprised six sections, including:

- "Military Questions." Whether there were sound plans – in the event that Saddam Hussein used WMD, attacked Israel, or destroyed oil wells – to keep rival groups and tribes apart; and to avoid civilian casualties.

---

[115] Minute Drummond to Rycroft, 28 January 2003, 'Iraq: US Visit'.
[116] Note [Blair to Bush], [30 January 2003], 'Countdown'.

336. When Mr Blair met President Bush on 31 January, it was clear that the window for peaceful disarmament would only be a few weeks. The military campaign could begin around 10 March.

337. Mr Blair and President Bush had a two hour meeting in Washington on 31 January followed by a press conference and an informal dinner.[117] The discussions are addressed in Section 3.6.

338. On military planning, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the possibility that Iraqi forces would fold quickly. Mr Blair asked about planning for the post-conflict period. In his view a UN badge would be needed. That would help with the humanitarian problems. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed an initial military occupation, how to handle the dilemma of managing the transition to civil administration and the nature of an Iraqi government.

339. Mr Blair concluded that the US and UK needed to prepare to organise on a "war footing", working very closely together "particularly on our public communications".

340. Sir David Manning recorded that it was clear that the window of opportunity would be only a few weeks. Otherwise the US would take military action. The military campaign could begin "around 10 March", and earlier if Dr Blix's report on 14 February was tough. The timing was "very tight".

341. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair at what point he had concluded that the US "had definitely decided on military action in March 2003".[118]

342. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr Blair wrote:

> "It was clear from continuing discussion with the US in late 2002/early 2003 that March was the likely date for military action. That firmed up as it became plain that there was no significant shift in the attitude of Saddam. The December Declaration … was incomplete, as Blix noted … His first report was to the effect that there was not full compliance, essentially around interviews. There were various possible alternatives to military action surfacing, including proposals for Saddam peacefully to give up power."[119]

Planning for an air campaign

THE UK CONTRIBUTION TO AN AIR CAMPAIGN

343. On 31 January, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair, advising him that he intended to announce the agreed air package on 6 February.[120]

[119] Statement, 14 January 2011, page 11.
[120] Letter Hoon to Prime Minister, 31 January 2003, 'Iraq: Announcement of Air Package'.

344. Mr Hoon wrote:

> "You will recall that we agreed the air package for planning purposes in September. With some small adjustments at the margins, the planned package now comprises 118 fixed-wing aircraft, including those routinely based in theatre in support of the No-Fly Zones."

345. Mr Hoon told Mr Blair that, because there remained "some uncertainty" over basing arrangements for some elements of the package, he would speak of "up to" 118 aircraft rather than providing a firm number. He added that the US was also "wrestling with some of the same uncertainties".

346. On 6 February, Mr Hoon told Parliament that the UK already maintained a "significant presence" in the Middle East of "around 25 aircraft and 1000 personnel".[121] He announced that, in the event of operations against Iraq, it was envisaged that the UK would increase its presence to "around 100 fixed-wing aircraft supported by around 7,000 personnel" in the "days and weeks ahead".

347. In addition, the Joint Helicopter Command would "deploy a very substantial proportion of its equipment and personnel". Its contribution would consist of 27 Puma and Chinook support helicopters and "about 1,100 people".

348. In response to a question from Mr Bernard Jenkin (Conservative), Mr Hoon said that UK forces would be "in the Gulf for as long as it takes to disarm Iraq and the regime of Saddam Hussein".[122]

THE PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN LAW

349. The principles of international humanitarian law (IHL) governing military operations are set out in the Box below.

350. The guidance issued to the Armed Forces on the application of IHL during military operations is addressed in more detail later in this Section.

Overview of international humanitarian law

International humanitarian law (IHL) is also known as the Law of Armed Conflict (LOAC) or the Law of War. IHL is part of international law and governs the conduct of armed conflict, sometimes referred to as jus in bello. It is distinct from the law governing the resort to armed conflict, jus ad bellum, which derives from the United Nations Charter (see Section 1.1).

IHL aims to limit the effects of armed conflicts for humanitarian reasons. It aims to protect persons who are not or are no longer taking part in the hostilities, the sick and wounded, prisoners and civilians, and to define the rights and obligations of the parties to a conflict [121] House of Commons, Official Report, 6 February 2003, columns 455-456.

[122] House of Commons, Official Report, 6 February 2003, column 457.

in the conduct of hostilities.[123] It derives mainly from the four 1949 Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols, and from the 1907 Hague Regulations, but also from other international conventions and protocols covering specific areas, as well as from customary law; that is, those rules derived from the established practice of states.

The cardinal principles of humanitarian law are authoritatively set out in an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice:

> "The first is aimed at the protection of the civilian population and civilian objects and establishes the distinction between combatants and non-combatants; States must never make civilians the object of attack and must consequently never use weapons that are incapable of distinguishing between civilian and military targets. According to the second principle, it is prohibited to cause unnecessary suffering to combatants: it is accordingly prohibited to use weapons causing them such harm or uselessly aggravating their suffering. In application of that second principle, States do not have unlimited freedom of choice of means in the weapons they use."[124]

The key elements of LOAC which apply to targeting of military objectives during a conflict are set out in the 1977 Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 (Protocol I). The main principles can be summarised as:

- Distinction. The parties to the conflict must at all times distinguish between the civilian population and combatants, and between civilian objects and military objectives, and shall direct their operations only against military objectives (Article 48).
- Proportionality. Military objectives must not be attacked if the attack is likely to cause civilian casualties or damage which would be excessive in relation to the concrete and direct military advantage anticipated (Article 57:2:b).
- Military Necessity. Offensive operations must be limited to those which are necessary i.e. only those which are required to secure a definite military advantage. If there is a choice between targets for obtaining a similar military advantage, the objective to be selected shall be that the attack on which may be expected to cause the least danger to civilian lives and civilian objects (Article 57:3).
- Feasible Precautions. In the conduct of military operations, constant care shall be taken to spare the civilian population, civilians and civilian objects. Those who plan or decide upon an attack must take a number of specified precautions, focusing on the principles outlined above (Article 57).

PRELIMINARY DISCUSSIONS ON TARGETING

351. To allow planning to proceed, the MOD sought Lord Goldsmith's views in early February on the considerations that should apply to the selection of targets during an air campaign.

---

[124] Report ICJ, 1996, Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, pages 226 and 257.

352. The MOD set out its position on targeting in advice prepared for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush on 31 January.[125]

353. The MOD advised that, although detailed assessments of civilian casualties resulting from the air campaign could be produced on a "target-by-target" basis, the target set was not yet sufficiently well defined to allow an estimate to be produced for the air campaign as a whole. Analysis based on estimated civilian casualties during operations over Iraq between 1998 and 1999 suggested that the civilian casualties for an air campaign would be around 150 killed and 500 injured.

354. No assessment had been produced of civilian casualties arising from "urban operations in Basra". Experience from World War II suggested that between 200 and 2,000 civilians could be killed in urban operations in Basra, depending on "circumstances, duration and the degree to which civilian casualties are minimised".

355. On 3 February, Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Lord Goldsmith's Office with a paper on the UK's military campaign objectives. It was intended to form a basis for discussion of possible targets during an air campaign at a meeting with Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw the following day.[126]

356. The paper set out three potential options for disarming Iraq:

- Enforced inspections – military force being used to support UNMOVIC inspectors on the ground.
- Enforced destruction (air) – a sustained campaign of selective targeting using precision guided weapons and other aerial bombing techniques against known weapons sites.
- Enforced dismantling/destruction (land) – ground operations enabling the international community to take control of WMD sites.

357. Each option provided a rationale within which specific targeting or other legal issues could be considered.

358. The paper concluded by stating that the first two options would not deliver the UK's objectives. The third option would require an integrated air and ground campaign to meet any military resistance from the Iraqi Armed Forces and to minimise risk to Coalition Service Personnel. The paper stated:

> "But the key driver of resistance to Coalition operations is the Iraqi regime itself. Not only would removal of the regime potentially bring the need for military action to an early conclusion, the prospect of a new and representative administration in Iraq would minimise the potential for Iraqi reversion to a WMD programme once military action was complete."

359. The paper also set out the elements of the US plan and addressed whether they were necessary and proportionate. It concluded that the current US Concept of Operations could "achieve a conventional military defeat, but that the use of force in achieving this aim is potentially proportionate and necessary".

360. At that stage, Mr Hoon and MOD officials did not know Lord Goldsmith's views on whether resolution 1441 provided a legal basis for military action without a further authorisation by the Security Council (see Section 5).

361. The record of the meeting between Lord Goldsmith, Mr Hoon and Mr Straw stated that Mr Hoon had said a way of approving individual and generic targets should be found "beforehand", along with a method of handling emergent targeting needs during the course of the campaign.[127]

362. Lord Goldsmith was clear that, in such an integrated campaign, it was "practically impossible to make a distinction" between UK and US operations. That significantly increased the legal task and reinforced the necessity for a robust audit trail. Scrutiny was to be expected.

363. Lord Goldsmith said it would be important to tackle difficult targets early but he was "open to an approach where straightforward targets could be packaged".

364. Mr Hoon asked whether it was "possible to clear easy packages early in order to make a start on the large numbers of targets" which had to be addressed. Air Commodore Mike Heath, Head of the Directorate of Targeting and Information Operations (DTIO), outlined how full collateral considerations could not be taken into account "until very shortly before the operation".

365. Lord Goldsmith welcomed the broad approach outlined in the paper:

"It correctly identified the regime as a target, but was currently too tentative in identifying it as a necessary target … The conclusion at the end of the paper that this campaign was "potentially proportionate" was insufficiently robust and a more explicit conclusion was required."

366. Mr Straw asked that more work be done to clearly identify the controlling elements of the regime.

367. Mr Blair agreed that the overall strategy of the air campaign was to contribute to the collapse of the Iraqi regime or at least prevent it from using WMD.

---

[127] Letter Williams to McDonald, 5 February 2003, 'Potential Operations in Iraq: Military Objectives and Campaign'.

368. Mr Blair also underlined the importance of minimising civilian casualties.

369. The assessments made by the Government before, and during, initial combat operations of the number of Iraqi civilian casualties are addressed in Section 17.

370. Mr Blair was briefed on the targeting aspects of an air campaign by Mr Hoon, Adm Boyce and Air Cdre Heath on 6 February.[128]

371. Mr Blair agreed "the overall strategy of the air campaign, creating an overwhelming effect so that the regime collapsed or at least was disabled from using WMD in a conflict, leading to the overall objective of Iraqi disarmament". He underlined the importance of "minimising the number of civilian casualties and ensuring that all targets were appropriate and proportionate" and that consideration should be given to "how best to explain publicly the scale and nature of the campaign".

372. Mr Blair asked for a note explaining the rationale behind the targets chosen for the proposed air campaign, and an assessment of the likely accuracy of the campaign.

373. Mr Watkins provided that advice on 10 February.[129] He wrote that the plan was to mount near simultaneous attacks of air, ground and information operations:

> "The air campaign has been crafted to ensure success … without going beyond what is necessary to achieve specific military campaign objectives. It will appear to involve overwhelming force – but it is not intended to turn Iraq into a wasteland. The targets have been selected for the effect that their disabling or destruction would have on the regime rather than to inflict physical damage. The target sets therefore mostly represent only a fraction of those that could be attacked in each category … This approach should minimise the number of civilian and potentially military casualties; ease the issues of reconstitution in the aftermath of conflict; and facilitate the earliest possible military withdrawal."

374. Target sets for the air campaign included "all those facilities which would enable the regime to activate and deploy WMD".

375. The land campaign would begin in the first few days but precise timings were not known. Mr Watkins wrote that "whether the UK brigades will become heavily engaged in fighting will very much depend on the effectiveness of the air campaign and initial US land operations".

Objectives for the military campaign

376. The UK shared its draft military campaign objectives with the US in mid-February.

[128] Letter Rycroft to Watkins, 6 February 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meeting, 6 February'.
[129] Letter Watkins to Rycroft, 10 February 2003, 'Iraq: The Military Campaign'.

377. Sir David Manning described the objectives to Dr Rice as compatible with but not identical to US objectives.

378. It was recorded at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 29 January that political and military synchronisation and timing "remained fluid".[130] The Cabinet Office was preparing a revised paper on the UK's objectives that "sought to align the UK and US positions that currently differed".

379. The minutes recorded that Adm Boyce noted that the issues of timing and objectives were urgent and that the US might "leave the UK with little warning of military action".

380. The current timelines indicated that US ground forces would not be available in the North before the third week in March, "although there was still a coercive effect to be achieved by continuing to pursue the option".

381. CENTCOM continued planning to mitigate against a decision by President Bush to act earlier than the planning assumptions: "However, the preparedness of US ground forces was behind schedule; as a result A day [Assault Day] was moving towards G day [the day that the ground campaign would begin] rather than G to A."

382. Mr Bowen sent Sir David Manning a copy of the latest draft of the objectives on 29 January.[131] He wrote:

> "It will be important before the Coalition embarks on military action to ensure that we share the same military objectives with the US, otherwise the strategic direction of the campaign risks falling apart. After your return from the US I suggest we discuss how best to do this."[132]

383. Mr Bowen explained to Sir David Manning that the objectives "flow from our policy objectives published on 7 January". They had not been agreed by departments, although Ministers had seen them and were "generally content".

384. The main tasks of the Coalition were listed as:

- remove the current Iraqi regime;
- overcome the resistance of the Iraqi security forces;
- deny the Iraqi regime the use of weapons of mass destruction;
- identify and secure the sites where weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery are located; and
- secure essential economic infrastructure, including for utilities and transport, from sabotage and wilful destruction by Iraqis."

[132] Letter Bowen to Manning, 29 January 2003, 'Iraq: Military Campaign Objectives'.

385. On 11 February, Mr Bowen sent Sir David Manning a revised draft of the UK's military campaign objectives, incorporating comments from Mr Straw and Whitehall departments.[133] The draft stated:

> "The UK's overall objective for the military campaign is to create the conditions in which Iraq disarms in accordance with its obligations under UNSCRs and remains so disarmed in the long term."

386. The Coalition's main tasks in support of that objective were to:

"a. overcome the resistance of the Iraqi security forces;

b. deny the Iraqi regime the use of weapons of mass destruction now and in the future;

c. remove the Iraqi regime, given its clear and unyielding refusal to comply with the UN Security Council's demands;

d. identify and secure the sites where weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery are located;

e. secure essential economic infrastructure, including for utilities and transport, from sabotage and wilful destruction by Iraqis; and

f. deter wider conflict both inside Iraq and the region."

387. The UK's wider political objectives in support of the military campaign and the immediate military priorities in the aftermath of hostilities are addressed in Section 6.5.

388. The MOD comments on the draft objectives focused on whether they provided "enough top cover to derive appropriate CDS and targeting directives to enable us to work in coalition with the US".[134]

389. On 12 February, the Chiefs of Staff noted that work on the UK objectives paper had been concluded, but not finally endorsed. The paper would be "ready for release at the start of any offensive campaign".[135]

390. Mr Hoon discussed the objectives with Secretary Rumsfeld in Washington on 12 February.[136]

391. Sir David Manning sent a copy to Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, on 14 February.[137] He explained that the UK military campaign objectives were "compatible but not identical" to 'Iraq: Goals, Objectives, Strategy' (a US document handed to Sir David by Dr Rice on 31 January – see Section 6.5).

392. Sir David explained that the UK and US were committed to ridding Iraq of WMD and recognised the need to remove the current Iraqi regime if military action proved necessary, but the UK document avoided references to "liberation". No firm decision had been taken, but the likelihood was that the UK would publish its objectives if and when military action was decided.

393. After discussion with Lord Goldsmith, a final version of the military campaign objectives was placed in the House of Commons Library by Mr Hoon on 20 March.

The Phase IV plan

394. During February, UK officials became increasingly concerned about the risk that the UK might agree to take responsibility for a geographical sector of Iraq before the implications had been examined.

395. The UK would not make a commitment to administer a division-sized area in the medium to long term.

396. The first detailed estimate of the type (but not the size) of force required to deliver different tasks was in Lt Gen Reith's draft Concept of Operations for Phase IV of 25 March. That is addressed in Section 8.

397. On 14 February, Mr Ehrman reported to Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, that at a "[Sir David] Manning meeting" on post-conflict issues, Sir David had "expressed strong concern that junior CENTCOM planners seemed to be dreaming up an ever larger area of Iraq for the UK to administer".[138] The Chiefs of Staff had advised Mr Blair that it would be easier for the UK to play a smaller post-conflict role if it was part of a Coalition fighting force; the opposite now seemed to be the case.

398. Sir David had said that:

> "[Mr Richard] Armitage [US Deputy Secretary of State] was talking of military administration for two years. The Pentagon seemed to be more sensible, talking of six months. Did we [the UK] not need to reduce our 40,000 troops to around 5,000 by the end of six months? And who would pay for all this? Some on the US side seemed to be saying: you pay for what you administer."

399. Mr Ehrman informed Mr Ricketts that Sir David Manning had asked the MOD:

> "… to get the best information they could, at a senior level, on what size of sector was really being proposed for the UK; and FCO, with MOD, then to let No.10 have views on the issues which would be involved in its administration, and how we would seek to deal with these."

---

[138] Minute Ehrman to Ricketts, 14 February 2003, 'Iraq: Day After'.

400. On 17 February, the inter-departmental Iraq Planning Unit (IPU), based in the FCO, sent Mr Ehrman a paper on sectorisation as part of his briefing for a meeting on post-conflict issues, including sectorisation, chaired by Lt Gen Pigott.[139] The paper, not yet agreed with the MOD, recommended that the UK should make clear to the US that it was unwilling to take responsibility for a sector for more than 60 days unless its presence was authorised by the UN and there was to be an early move to a UN transitional administration. The paper is described in Section 6.5.

401. The IPU paper's broad assumption in favour of administration of a small sector for a short period was reflected in the guidance for UK officials attending the US inter-agency Rock Drill on post-conflict issues on 21-22 February.[140]

402. On 19 February, the Chiefs of Staff discussed post-conflict planning in the context of the forthcoming Rock Drill.[141]

403. Before the meeting, MOD officials recommended that the Chiefs of Staff agree a set of assumptions about "the scale, posture and duration" of post-conflict UK military operations in order to inform IPU preparations for the Rock Drill.[142]

404. Officials recommended that the Chiefs of Staff:

"a. Agree the assumption that our aim should be to reduce to a medium scale post-conflict TELIC[143] commitment as soon as possible and pursue discussions with the US and potential Coalition allies (to determine our AOR and burden sharing) that will facilitate this.

b. Note that without a UN mandate for occupation (not necessarily the same thing as a second UNSCR) finding Coalition partners will be more difficult and that the UK may face an enduring commitment that will be difficult to sustain and damaging to the long-term health of the Armed Forces.

c. Agree that in discussions with the US, the scale and nature of UK involvement is made conditional on satisfactory UN involvement.

d. Agree the assumption that the UK will administer a sector of Iraq; within the constraint imposed by the maximum level of commitment being medium scale; this would correspond to the UK's initial AO, not one of the somewhat larger sectors currently being considered in US planning.

[141] Minutes, 19 February 2003, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

[142] Minute Chorley to COSSEC, February 2003, 'Iraq Aftermath – Medium to Long Term UK Military Commitment'.

[143] Operation TELIC was the name given to the UK's military operation in Iraq.

e. Note that some US thinking now sees a role for HQ ARRC as a follow-on HQ for post-conflict Iraq …

f. Agree that if the political gains are sufficient, we should entertain a role in Iraq for HQ ARRC – but note that a countrywide military remit for HQ ARRC (ie as HQ CJTF-I) risks the UK assuming too great a proportion of the responsibility for the stability and security of Iraq from the US …"

405. The MOD warned that:

"Once fully deployed the level of our commitment to Op TELIC will be large scale across all three services. Unless very significant risk is to be placed on the deployed force, and UK forces more widely, the force must be reduced to medium scale by October/November this year; this implies that the reduction must begin by July/August. Factors that drive this conclusion are:

a. A large scale commitment can only be sustained with the callout of certain trade groups of reserves, who have already been mobilised in toto.

b. There will be severe disruption of the Formation Readiness Cycle and Operational Commitments Plot that will have deleterious effects on training and wider capability in the medium to long term.

c. A longer deployment at large scale would imply a breach of Harmony Guidelines[144] for a very significant number of Service Personnel which may lead to a marked reduction in morale, retention and, eventually recruitment …

"Once reduced to medium scale – all other things being equal – it would be possible to maintain a medium scale commitment to Iraq indefinitely … though this would, of course, constrain our ability to take on other new tasks. Such a commitment would, however, be extremely expensive …"

406. In "pure military terms", assuming that there was a "rapid and successful conclusion to the conflict and a permissive environment", the UK would only be able to "support" the proposed AOR in southern Iraq until August. Beyond that there would need to be "substantial Coalition support". Without it, the UK could be left with "an unsustainable commitment". The area currently proposed included "a very substantial proportion of the Iraqi population, a substantial oilfield content and responsibility for key religious sites".

407. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 19 February, Lt Gen Reith reported that Mr Blair wanted:

"… an exemplary aftermath but [was] not committed to any particular size of UK AOR pending further advice on objectives, capability and capacity to sustain. It was … unclear who the US anticipated placing as sector leaders given that few other nations would be able to support the task within three months. Therefore, there may be an unsupportable expectation that the UK would control a relatively large area. Pragmatically, however, aftermath operations would commence locally whenever and wherever hostilities ceased, not necessarily coincident with any plan.

"The FCO view was that other nations should be involved as soon as possible and that early commitment to any nascent US sector plan should be avoided …

"The UK line to take at the Rock Drill would be the commitment in principle to the immediate involvement in aftermath ops but not yet to any long-term plan, noting the PM's wish to exert maximum influence in aftermath planning. Clarity was needed on the proposed command chain in Phase IV and whose political and legal authority would prevail."[145]

408. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that humanitarian operations formed an essential part of the overall campaign, not least as a force protection measure, and should therefore attract Treasury contingency funding. Adm Boyce directed that humanitarian assistance be covered in the joint FCO/MOD position paper on post-conflict issues for the Rock Drill, which should make clear the potential for conflict and post-conflict phases to run in parallel from an early stage.

409. Adm Boyce summarised the key points of the discussion on post-conflict preparations, including:

- The Rock Drill should be used "to secure maximum [UK] influence without early commitment to detail".
- A "UN-approved international civilian administrator" would be required.
- UK Phase IV activity should centre on the region around Basra.
- The UK military commitment should be "scaled down from large to medium in the autumn".[146]

410. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

"… the initial expectation was that we would be there for a while, without defining exactly what it was. But we certainly weren't expecting, the day after achieving success, to start drawing down our numbers; we were expecting to be there for a considerable period of time."[147]

---

[146] This is the only reference to reducing troop numbers "in the autumn" seen by the Inquiry. All subsequent references are to a reduction "by the autumn".
[147] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, page 101.

411. Lord Boyce explained: "I thought we would be there for three or four years at least, and said so at the time." He added:

> "The theoretical planning against the Defence Planning Assumptions is you don't do this sort of operation for an extended period longer than about six months. But it never seemed to me very likely that we would be out [of] there in six months."

412. Asked about the assumption that the UK contingent would reduce to "Brigade level" or "medium scale", Lord Boyce replied:

> "For the job that we would have to do in the Basra area, it might have been that a Brigade size might have been sufficient, as conditions pertained in the middle of 2003."[148]

413. On 20 February, Mr Dominick Chilcott, Head of the IPU, sent Mr Straw an IPU guidance note for officials taking part in the Rock Drill.[149]

414. Mr Chilcott's covering minute to Mr Straw stated:

> "There is barely any mention of the UN in the CENTCOM plans we have seen for Phase IV (post-conflict) to date. But there are gaps in the plan, which is still fluid and which we have the opportunity to influence. We shall encourage the US players at the Rock Drill to draw the conclusion that the job of administering Iraq is too large even for the US to undertake, that putting together a large Coalition – drawing on Arab countries – is the key to success, and that this can only be achieved by getting UN authorisation for Phase IV."

415. The attached guidance note stated that the UK and US agreed that "there must be a phased approach to the 'day after'". For the UK, that meant "(a) military administration, (b) a UN transitional administration and (c) handover of power to a new Iraqi government". The US referred to "stabilisation", "recovery" and "transition to security".

416. On sectorisation, the guidance stated:

> - UK will have, in the very short term, to administer the area where its forces are at the end of hostilities. No commitment to administer divisional size area in the medium to longer term. More likely a small area around Basra.
> - No commitment to administering any part of Baghdad.
> - Where we are involved in administration, will want to be so in an exemplary fashion."

417. The guidance stated that the UK force would reduce from large scale (three brigades plus) to medium scale (one brigade plus), "if possible by the autumn".

418. Mr Stephen Pollard, Head of MOD Overseas Secretariat (Sec(O)), showed the IPU paper to Mr Hoon the same day.[150] He explained that a more detailed cross-government paper, setting out potential UK involvement in Iraq in the short, medium and long term, would be prepared after the Rock Drill.

419. The first paper matching that description was the 'UK Vision for Phase IV' sent to No.10 on 26 February, described in Section 6.5. Section 6.5 also describes how sectorisation remained unresolved after the Rock Drill and how the UK was unclear about how large its AOR was likely to be during the stabilisation phase.

Iraq's response to an invasion

420. A JIC Assessment on 10 February warned of the possibility of terrorist attacks against Coalition Forces in Iraq, during and after conflict.

421. On 10 February, at the request of the MOD and the FCO, the JIC produced its second Assessment on the potential terrorist threat in the event of conflict in Iraq.[151]

422. The earlier Assessment, produced on 10 October 2002, is described in Section 3.5.

423. The Assessment's Key Judgements included:

- "Al Qaida associated terrorists in Iraq and in the Kurdish Autonomous Zone in Northern Iraq could conduct attacks against Coalition Forces and interests during, or in the aftermath of, war with Iraq."
- "In the event of imminent regime collapse, Iraqi chemical and biological material could be transferred to terrorists including Al Qaida …"

424. The Assessment is considered in more detail in Section 3.7.

425. The JIC judged on 19 February that Iraqi conventional forces in southern Iraq could rapidly be defeated and that southern Iraq was "the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition Forces and the local population".

426. On 19 February, at the request of OD Sec, the JIC issued an Assessment, 'Southern Iraq: What is in Store?', of the situation in southern Iraq and what might happen before, during and after any Coalition military action.[152]

427. In the discussion of the draft Assessment, the points made by the members of the JIC included:

- It was an "important paper for informing planning following a Coalition attack".
- Saddam Hussein "might target oilfields but whether he would try fundamentally to destroy the wells was not known". It would be "useful to have more information on Saddam's options given the efforts which would be needed for reconstruction of the oilfields".[153]

- Saddam was "likely to use CBW first in southern Iraq, if anywhere". The implications needed further discussion in the final Assessment "to bring out the scale of the potential humanitarian crisis", which would, in the initial period, need to be dealt with by Coalition troops.

428. The JIC's Key Judgements were:

- The Iraqi forces currently guarding southern Iraq are a relatively weak first line of conventional defence. They face rapid defeat. There is little evidence so far that the Iraqis are preparing for a hard-fought defence of Basra and other urban centres.
- Southern Iraq is the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition Forces and the local population.
- Coalition Forces will face large refugee flows, possibly compounded by contamination and panic caused by CBW use. They may also face millions of Iraqis needing food and clean water without an effective UN presence and environmental disaster from burning oil wells.
- Iran does not have an agreed policy on Iraq beyond active neutrality. Nevertheless Iran may support small-scale cross-border interventions by armed groups to attack the Mujahideen e-Khalq (MEK). The Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps (IRGC) will continue to meddle in southern Iraq. Iranian reactions to a Coalition presence in Southern Iraq remain unclear but are unlikely to be aggressive.
- Post-Saddam the security situation in the south will be unpredictable. There is a high risk of revenge killings of former regime officials. Law and order may be further undermined by settling of scores between armed tribal groups.
- Popular support for any post-Saddam administration in the South will depend on adequately involving the Shia in the government of Iraq as a whole as well as engaging the remains of the state bureaucracy in the South, local tribal leaders and Shia clerics in local government."

429. The Assessment stated that there was "limited intelligence on the particular conditions of southern Iraq". It had, therefore, "Where possible tried to show how southern Iraq may differ from other parts of the country" and "to give as full a picture as possible of the conditions there". It had also "referred to intelligence describing conditions prevailing throughout the country".

[153] Minutes, 19 February 2003, JIC meeting.

430. The JIC stated that:

> "Unlike central and northern Iraq the regular army is not reinforced in the South by divisions of the elite Republican Guard, which are forbidden by UNSCR 949 [1994] from moving into the No-Drive Zone south of the 32nd parallel."

431. The JIC stated that the regime was "particularly concerned about the lack of loyalty of the Shia" who constituted the "majority of conscripts in the regular army". The absence of the Republican Guard coupled with low morale, poor equipment and limited training of the Regular Army led the JIC to conclude that the forces guarding southern Iraq were "a relatively weak first line of conventional defence. They face rapid defeat in the face of a massive military onslaught."

432. There were indications that a division of the Regular Army had redeployed "southwards" to al-Qurnah, "a key town located at a strategic road junction", and that elements of another had deployed to the al-Faw Peninsula "in mid-January, apparently to counter a possible amphibious landing there". The JIC knew "little about Iraqi plans for the defence of Basra, but there is as yet no sign of preparations for a hard-fought defence of this or other urban centres in southern Iraq". There was no mention in the Key Judgements that the al-Faw Peninsula had been reinforced.

433. The Assessment stated that reporting indicated that Saddam Hussein's regime had "contingency plans for a regional military command structure", and that he had:

> "… appointed his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid [Chemical Ali] as regional commander of the southern sector … (covering the provinces of Basra, Dhi Qar, Maysan and Muthanna) with authority over all forces in the area. Iraq practice in the Iran/Iraq war suggests this would include tactical control over CBW. Ali is a loyal member of Saddam's inner circle. He was a brutal Governor of occupied Kuwait in 1990-91. He also played a leading role in suppressing the Shia uprising in 1991 and Kurdish rebels in the late 1980s (using chemical weapons against the Kurds). His appointment may reflect an Iraqi leadership view that a particularly loyal and ruthless figure is needed to take command in the South in a crisis, both to suppress the Shia and to maintain discipline among the Iraqi forces."

434. The JIC Assessment stated:

> "The relative weakness of Iraqi forces in the South and the fact that those forces will face the brunt of a Coalition attack mean southern Iraq is the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition Forces and the local population."

435. The Assessment added that one report from August 2002 had indicated that there were:

> "… Iraqi plans to use CBW in southern Iraq to cause mass casualties among the Shia in the event of a US-led attack. The regime would seek to pin the blame for the resulting high-level of casualties on the Coalition."

436. In its Assessment of 19 February 2003, the JIC stated that: "Reporting has previously indicated that the regime is concerned about a Shia uprising in the South after the outbreak of hostilities." Recent reporting had confirmed its judgements that the Shia would be:

> "… cautious in opposing Saddam until they see the regime is finished and its capability to retaliate is substantially weakened. The experience of 1991 will be a major influence … Even if the initial severity of any Coalition attack makes clear that the regime is finished, the Shia may still fear what the regime could do to them in its dying days … Overall we judge there will be no immediate, unified Shia response to a Coalition attack."

437. The Assessment stated that:

> "Given the Shia in southern Iraq have borne the brunt of regime oppression since 1991, there is a high probability of revenge killing of Ba'ath officials, both Sunni and Shia. This could be particularly widespread and bloody, if the regime collapses quickly and few Ba'ath officials have the chance to escape … the extent of any further breakdown of law and order is difficult to predict. But there will be large numbers of armed groups and some potential for tribal score settling … Overall there is a risk of a wider breakdown as the regime's authority crumbles. There are no indications … of Shia preparations for an all-out civil war against Sunni Iraqis."

438. The JIC also assessed:

> "We know very little about the Iraqi Shia. […] they are not politically organised above the local, tribal level and there are no clear candidates for overall Shia leadership. They are very diverse, straddling the urban/rural and secular/Islamist divides. They have had little opportunity to discuss their preferred political arrangements. Shia politics post-Saddam therefore look highly unpredictable."

439. In relation to Iraq's response, the Assessment stated that there was:

> "… no conclusive intelligence on Iraqi plans but they could:
>
> - defend oil wells against attack;
> - set fire to them to stop production, cause pollution and disrupt Coalition Forces; and
> - cause long-term, possibly irreparable, damage to prevent others from benefitting from future production.
>
> "The potential environmental disaster, coupled with the possible use of CBW … could cause widespread panic and contamination. This could result in hundreds of thousands of displaced persons and refugees, many needing immediate help.
> "… [I]nterruption of food supplies … could boost the number of refugees and displaced persons throughout Iraq … Tackling such problems in southern Iraq will > be complicated by possible CBW contamination … The UN will be particularly badly placed if a humanitarian disaster occurs in the South while fighting continues in close proximity."

440. The points in the Assessment on the post-Saddam Hussein political and security landscape are set out in Section 6.5.

441. The Assessment also warned that: "The establishment of popular support for any post-Saddam administration cannot be taken for granted." The factors that could undermine it included:

- "damage to holy sites";
- "major civilian casualties";
- "heavy-handed peace enforcement"; and
- "failure to rapidly restore law and order".

442. In an Assessment issued on 26 February of how Iraq would respond in northern Iraq to a Coalition attack, the JIC judged:

> "The Iraqi regime would be willing to use CBW against the Coalition and the Kurds."[154]

443. The Assessment made clear that that judgement was a continuation from earlier Assessments.

444. The International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) published an Adelphi Paper,[155] Iraq at the Crossroads: State and Society in the Shadow of Regime Change, in January 2003.[156] It included a number of contributions addressing what might happen in the event of a military invasion of Iraq which had originally been prepared for a one-day workshop, 'Iraqi Futures', held in October 2002.

445. Key points which were raised in relation to a military invasion of Iraq are set out in the Box below.

Iraq at the Crossroads: State and Society in the Shadow of Regime Change

Mr David Ochmanek, a senior analyst at RAND and a former member of the US Air Force and a Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Strategy in the Pentagon from 1993 to 1995, concluded that a robust invasion force would be needed because Saddam Hussein's troops were "unlikely to crack unless faced with an overwhelming adversary".[157]

Dr Toby Dodge, a Research Fellow at the ESRC Centre for the Study of Globalisation and Regionalisation, University of Warwick, wrote that the Iraqi regime had sacrificed the military efficiency of the Iraqi armed forces to ensure they did not pose a threat to Saddam Hussein's continued rule. That meant that although conventional military opposition to an invasion might be short lived, a coup launched against the regime from within the security services would happen, if at all, in the final moments of any war. The military campaign would be fought in the cities of Iraq, primarily Baghdad, against a background of intense media coverage.

Dr Faleh A. Jaber, an Iraqi sociologist based in London, argued that the Iraqi Army might react in ways comparable to 1991 with sections opting for mutiny, some surrendering and others fighting to defend the Government. A coup was unlikely unless the US succeeded in attracting a considerable segment of the "ruling tribal alliance" to its side.

In a separate essay, Dr Jaber concluded that, in the light of the inherent weakness of organised political parties in the South, the response to an invasion could range from sustained, organised or disorganised rebellions to mob-like violence or gangster-like retribution. That would help bring Ba'athist rule to an end, but could also bring forward unfettered chaos.

Several contributors to the Adelphi Paper warned of the potential for violent disorder in post-conflict Iraq (see Section 6.5).

446. Mr Blair read the Adelphi Paper in mid-February and asked a number of questions, including:

"
- What is our military's assessment of the likely consequences of an attack on Iraq; ie how many casualties; how quickly the collapse?
- Why do we not think the SRG [Special Republican Guard] will dig in, inside Baghdad and fight a guerrilla campaign?
- What is the prospect of a pre-emptive BW or CW attack on our troops in Kuwait, and are we certain we are adequately prepared and our troops protected?
- Why will the 2,000 key individuals and the 26,000 SRG personnel … not fight to the death, given the hatred of them by ordinary Iraqis?"[158]

447. Mr Blair's questions about post-conflict issues, including how to prevent the Shia "rising up to take over from the Sunnis", are addressed in Section 6.5.

448. In its response on 24 February, the MOD advised that the US plan was to achieve "overwhelming effect very early in the campaign" and to dislocate the regime (by decapitating command and control and disrupting communications), supported by the deployment of ground forces into Iraq and their move "towards Baghdad".[159] The MOD stated that, apart from the practical consequences of those elements of the plan, they should "remove any doubt in Iraqi minds about the Coalition's determination to remove the regime". It was "therefore possible that the regime will collapse … in the first few days. Nonetheless it is impossible to predict … and US planning assumes up to 125 days of decisive ground operations".

449. The SRG would be "the final line of defence in inner Baghdad … [and] may have tactical control of CBW within the city". Security elements close to the regime might "fight until their position becomes untenable". Lack of training and the attitude of the population might "mitigate the SRG's ability to mount a protracted guerrilla campaign". There were fewer SRG personnel in Baghdad than the Adelphi Paper estimated; and "their capability to mount any form of organised resistance … is minimal".

450. Iraq retained "the capability (through a variety of means) pre-emptively to deliver CBW against Coalition Forces in Kuwait. The question is one of intent." There was "no intelligence" to indicate that the regime was "currently planning a pre-emptive strike". In the MOD view, that was "highly unlikely whilst Saddam believes war can be averted". If he was convinced that war was "inevitable and imminent", that "might make a pre-emptive move more attractive" but it was "more likely that Saddam would deploy CBW after the onset of the campaign". The planned levels of Nuclear Biological Chemical (NBC) defence equipment "should enable all troops to withstand initial BW or CW attack" (see Section 6.3).

451. On the potential number of casualties, the MOD stated:

> "This question is easier to ask than to answer. Casualty estimation is an imprecise and contextual process, requiring a significant number of assumptions to be made for it to take place at all. Whilst the range of outcomes of a specific engagement in which both sides choose to fight may be predicted with reasonable confidence, forecasting which engagements will take place, in what sequence and under what conditions is much less certain."

452. The MOD explained that it was harder still to take account of low-probability, high-impact events, such as a successful chemical or biological attack. In the worst foreseeable case, a surprise chemical attack could result in up to 100 individuals being killed and over 200 needing medical treatment.

---

[159] Letter Watkins to Rycroft, 24 February 2003, 'Iraq: Political and Military Questions'.

453. Estimates of potential UK casualties from a ground campaign, excluding Special Forces casualties and casualties incurred through fighting in urban areas, were between 30 and 60 individuals killed and between 120 and 200 individuals wounded.

454. The total Iraqi land battle casualties were assessed as "in the order of 500-1,200 killed and 2,000-4,800 wounded". Detailed assessments of likely casualties from the air campaign, including civilian casualties, could only be made on a "target-by-target" basis and this work was "in hand". The MOD stated:

> "Iraqi civilian casualties from anything other than the air campaign are likely to be relatively few, unless Coalition Forces become engaged in fighting in urban areas."

455. The MOD estimates were based on assumptions that:

- Iraqi forces would not suffer a rapid, total collapse at the start of the campaign;
- the campaign would last 30 days; and
- the US and UK operational plans did not change in any significant way.

The Red Team

On 15 January, Mr Hoon had asked for work on predicting Saddam Hussein's possible responses to military action to be taken forward in the context of a comprehensive "red teaming" of the military plan to identify all conceivable risks to its success.

The "Red Team" was established within the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) and was led by Major General Andrew Ridgway, the Chief of Defence Intelligence (designate).[160] Its purpose was:

> "… to provide COS [Chiefs of Staff] and key planners within the MOD and Whitehall with an independent view of current intelligence assumptions and key judgements, to challenge if appropriate and to identify areas where more work may be required."

Papers were copied to the Chiefs of Staff, PJHQ, the MOD, the FCO, the IPU and the JIC. There is no evidence that they were seen in No.10.

The first Red Team report was issued on 28 February.[161] Its key judgements drew heavily on earlier JIC Assessments and included:

- the need for Coalition Forces to assume immediate responsibility for law and order to avoid other forces stepping into an internal security vacuum;
- that most Iraqis would initially view the Coalition as a liberating force, but support was likely to erode rapidly if the interim administration was not acceptable to the population and it could not see a road map towards a pluralist, representative Iraqi-led administration; and [160] Minute MOD [junior official] to APS2/SofS [MOD], 25 February 2003, 'Iraq: Red Teaming in the DIS'.

[161] Minute PS/CDI to APS2/SofS [MOD], 28 February 2003, 'Iraq Red Team – Regional Responses to Conflict in Iraq and the Aftermath' attaching Paper, DIS Red Team, 'Regional Responses to Conflict in Iraq and the Aftermath'.

- the risk of creating fertile ground for Al Qaida, which could deliberately cause civilian casualties to undermine the establishment of a representative Iraqi-led administration.

The report stated that Al Qaida:

> "… seeks removal of Western presence/influence from the Gulf and wants to see the US/UK operation go badly. AQ are currently in some disarray but will wish to take the opportunity presented by the US/UK operation to re-establish credibility and encourage widespread anti-Western activity in the region. However:
> - Initially AQ shared a common goal with the Coalition: regime change. Once completed, goals will diverge rapidly and UK/US forces will present a rich target for terrorist attack.
> - AQ feared the establishment of a pluralist, representative Iraqi government as it undermines their argument that Muslims can only achieve self-determination in a unitary Islamic theocracy. They could deliberately cause civilian casualties to undermine the Coalition's position."

Debate on the UK role in combat operations

456. By 21 February, HQ 1 (UK) Div and 3 Commando Brigade were fully deployed and at full operating capability and 16 Air Assault Brigade was expected to be deployed within days.

457. Discussions had begun with the US about a more substantial role for 7th Armoured Brigade, which was expected to be fully deployed in Kuwait by 10 March.

458. The MOD provided No.10 with an update on military preparations on 21 February.[162] It stated:

- The National Contingent HQ was fully deployed in Qatar and at full operating capability.
- The Maritime Contingent Commander and his staff were deployed in Bahrain. All ships were at sea, mostly in the Gulf.
- HQ 1 (UK) Div was fully deployed in Kuwait and was at full operating capability. Its support elements would not reach full operating capability until ships transporting elements of equipment arrived in theatre in early March.
- The deployment of 3 Commando Brigade was complete, with all units at full operating capability.
- The deployment of 16 Air Assault Brigade to Kuwait was due to be completed "within the next couple of days".

[162] Minute Williams to Manning, 21 February 2003, 'Iraq: Update' attaching Paper [undated], 'Iraq: Defence Update 21 Feb 03'.

- The “main body” of 7 Armoured Brigade personnel was expected to arrive in Kuwait between 25 February and 10 March. An initial capability of two armoured battlegroups would be complete in theatre by 3 March, with the “vast majority” of their equipment in place by 9 March. They would have full operating capability by 20 March.
- Deployment of aircraft had “only just begun”.

459. The MOD wrote that “the precise timing of the commencement of the land campaign” had not been finalised. Land operations were expected to begin in “the first few days” of the campaign.

460. While the overall US plan remained as briefed to Mr Blair, its details might “yet develop in important ways”. Much of that revolved around timings; if the current uncertainty over the deployment of US land forces through Turkey was not resolved, it could “require changes to the plan in the South to compensate for lack of ‘Northern effects’”.

461. The latest “in a succession of US deadlines for Turkish agreement” on land forces was 22 February, “after which (they say) they would send their 4th Infantry Division south”.

462. The US was “looking at a number of variations on the current plan”. If implemented, those might give UK forces “(particularly 7 Armoured Brigade) a more substantial role than under the current plan”. The MOD stated:

> “No commitment to any changed plan will be given to the US, even in principle, without Ministerial approval.”

463. The MOD wrote that Saddam Hussein remained focused on averting a US attack and it was only once he had determined that was “unavoidable and imminent” that he would consider pre-emptive options. Saddam Hussein currently had the capability to pre-emptively:

- Militarily re-occupy the Kurdish Autonomous Zone within 72 hours. A humanitarian crisis would result.
- Mount a limited CBW strike on Coalition Forces/civil populace of Kuwait. In the very worst case this could be effected within hours of a decision to do so.
- Mount a limited CBW strike on regional neighbours (most likely Israel). Again in the very worst case this could happen within hours of a decision.”

464. The MOD’s ability to provide “unambiguous intelligence” warning of those events would be minimal.

465. The MOD was content that the current draft of campaign objectives offered “a coherent basis for UK participation” but recognised that a legal basis for the use of force was needed before the objectives could come into effect. It also required

Lord Goldsmith's endorsement of the MOD's assessment that the US military plan represented minimum use of force, and a handling plan for announcing the objectives.

466. Gen Franks told Mr Blair that he expected the conflict to be over in weeks rather than months.

467. Mr Blair stated that there was a need for a strategy that destroyed the regime but minimised civilian casualties.

468. Mr Blair met Gen Franks on 25 February.[163] Mr William Farish, US Ambassador to the UK, Mr Powell, Sir David Manning and Adm Boyce were also present.

469. Gen Franks told Mr Blair that threats came, in ascending order, from:

> "… the Iraqi Army, which would offer little resistance; the Republican Guard, located between 25 and 100 km from Baghdad; and the Special Republican Guard (SRG) stationed in downtown Baghdad to defend the regime itself. In Baghdad, there were the highest risks of collateral damage and civilian casualties, including those caused by the use of human shields."

470. Gen Franks told Mr Blair that any campaign against Iraq would be "over in weeks rather than months" and that "the force available was equal to the task". Resources were "robust and capable in the west and south, and in the air, and information management was getting better". The northern front was problematic "because of the Turks".

471. Mr Blair asked if Gen Franks had "any idea" of the scale of likely civilian casualties and "underlined our preference for a short conflict".

472. Gen Franks replied that:

> "… during the 43 days of the Gulf War, 3,300 targets had been attacked. Plans for this campaign envisaged attacking 1,500 targets in the first 96 hours. Some 11 percent of weapons did not hit their precise target. So we must expect some civilian casualties. But the intensity of the initial attack was key to reducing the duration of the conflict."

473. Gen Franks said that dual-use facilities, where civilians worked alongside military personnel, "were a real problem"; they raised the risk of civilian casualties and the destruction of infrastructure that could delay reconstruction.

474. Adm Boyce stated that civilian casualties were likely to be in the "low hundreds". Gen Franks stated that ways to minimise civilian casualties were being explored.

475. Mr Blair concluded that "we must set out our strategy: to destroy the regime but minimise civilian casualties".

[163] Letter Cannon to Owen, 25 February 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meeting with General Franks'.

476. There was also a discussion about the role of the UN in a post-Saddam Hussein administration (see Section 6.5.)

477. When Mr Hoon met Gen Franks, he stated that the UK was keen for a serious and substantial role for UK forces.

478. Gen Franks told Mr Hoon that it was "not yet necessary to clarify the final plan". He "understood the strategic requirement for a UK profile".

479. The same day, Gen Franks had attended a working breakfast hosted by Adm Boyce and briefed the Chiefs of Staff.[164] Sir David Manning, Sir Richard Dearlove and Mr Watkins were also present.

480. Mr Watkins sent a record of the meeting to Mr Hoon (who was due to meet Gen Franks in Qatar on 26 February), stating that Gen Franks had said the US would "make the call on Turkey tomorrow" and that while the ability to deploy "heavy armour" from the North would have been helpful, it was not critical.

481. Mr Watkins advised Mr Hoon to press Gen Franks on the precise utilisation of UK forces in Phase III (the conflict phase of operations): "Politically and constitutionally, Ministers need to know this and in good time."

482. Mr Hoon and Air Marshal Brian Burridge, UK National Contingent Commander (NCC), met Gen Franks in Qatar on 26 February.[165]

483. The record of the meeting reported that there was a chance to get a northern option in place through the Parliamentary process in Turkey, but sadly the Parliamentary debate had been suspended.

484. Gen Franks had said there were now 195,000 US troops in the region and, when that figure rose to 250,000 in mid-March, he would be ready to support any "policy decision".

485. Gen Franks believed that it would "be possible to reach an agreement" on targeting. He recognised the difficulties associated with dual-use targets but there could be "serious military consequences" if they shied away from some of the communication facilities. Mr Hoon explained he would have "no problem clearing the targets where there was a definite military advantage".

486. Mr Hoon had noted the "proportionally very significant investment which the UK had made to the force build up" and "was keen for a serious and substantial role for British forces".

[165] Minute Williams to DG Op Pol, 27 February 2003, 'Secretary of State's Call on General Franks (CENTCOM) – 26 February 2003'.

487. Gen Franks had said that "the British forces with whom he had talked had made this clear to him". There were a variety of roles which could be assigned to units under his command and "it was not yet necessary to clarify the final plan". He would be in a better position to do so in seven to 10 days (5 to 8 March).

488. Mr Hoon asked whether the UK role would only be determined after offensive action had started. Gen Franks said that was not the case but he had to have early flexible options in case there was a requirement to move before the armour was ready. He "understood the strategic requirement for a UK profile in any operation".

489. On 28 February, Mr Hoon's Private Office sent Sir David Manning an update on military planning.[166] With respect to post-conflict operations, it warned that the UK was "currently at risk of taking on a very substantial commitment" that it would have "great difficulty in sustaining beyond the immediate conclusion of conflict". That is addressed in detail in Section 6.5.

490. On 4 March, Lt Gen Reith advocated an expanded combat role for UK forces to the Chiefs of Staff.

491. On 4 March, Lt Gen Reith sent the Chiefs of Staff two papers setting out proposals for employing UK land forces on combat missions with or without "a dedicated 'UK box'" based on "the agreed 1(UK) Div AO".[167]

492. Lt Gen Reith explained that a "UK box" would "allow UK forces to move first in a ground offensive and thereby set the conditions for the 'exemplary performance' in Phase IV", but US resistance to the creation of a UK box would "probably only be overcome by high level intervention".

493. Lt Gen Reith asked the Chiefs of Staff whether, in those circumstances, he should "explore integration of UK niche elements into US planning on a task, time and space limited basis", or whether "the 'exemplary performance' for Phase IV should override opportunities to make a significant contribution to Coalition Phase III operations".

494. In the first of the two papers, Lt Gen Reith set out:

- 1 (UK) Div's mission was likely to be "to attack to defeat enemy forces within boundaries, secure key oil infrastructure and seize Umm Qasr port to prevent or mitigate environmental disaster and enable humanitarian operations". Subsequently the UK division would relieve US forces to support their rapid movement north.

[167] Minute Reith to COSSEC, 4 March 2003, 'Op Telic Employment of UK forces' attaching Paper CJO, 3 March 2003, 'Op TELIC Land Options for 1(UK) Armoured Division – Update' and Paper CJO, 4 March 2003, 'Op TELIC Land Options for 1(UK) Armoured Division – Alternative Options'.

- 3 Commando Brigade would seize the oil infrastructure on the al-Faw Peninsula, Umm Qasr port, and set the conditions for Coalition mine countermeasures operations and the clearance of the Khawr Abd Allah waterway.
- 16 Air Assault Brigade and 7 Armoured Brigade would relieve US forces: 16 Air Assault Brigade would assume responsibility for the security of the Rumaylah oilfields and 7 Armoured Brigade would be responsible for the isolation of Basra, securing az-Zubayr, and the protection of oil infrastructure within its boundaries.
- Security of Basra International Airport and Basra itself were described as "be prepared to" tasks.

495. Lt Gen Reith commented:

> "Critically, this plan only really sees 3 Cdo Bde being committed to combat operations with the net effect … that the balance of the UK land element may be largely involved in Phase IV operations unless there is some form of egress from Basra or movement to the south or west by 6 Armd Div [Iraqi forces]."

496. Lt Gen Reith summarised that the plan:

> "… probably doesn't appropriately reflect the level of our commitment of ground forces. Moreover, the whole issue of teeing soldiers up for combat operations must, potentially, be difficult on the basis of the tasks currently on offer for 7 and 16 Bdes. In other words, whilst the task is eminently manageable, it probably represents, for the Army, a poor return, militarily, on the forces committed."

497. Lt Gen Reith addressed the advantages and disadvantages of "UK ownership of its full AO from the start". Under the existing Base Plan, the UK AO would expand into space vacated by US forces as they moved north and UK forces would not be able to shape their own Phase IV AOR. Lt Gen Reith explained that one of the contingency plans already worked up by the Land Component Command (LCC) assumed full UK ownership of its AO from the start. It would see all three UK brigades "potentially being committed to combat operations and being responsible for defeating all enemy forces … This plan also allows UK forces to shape the AO in Phase III for Phase IV by employing an appropriate balance of kinetic and non-kinetic effect."

498. Lt Gen Reith concluded: "There can be no doubt at all that this represents a far better option for UK forces than the Base Plan".

499. In the second paper, Lt Gen Reith explained that his forthcoming meetings with Lt Gen McKiernan and others would "almost certainly be the last chance that the operational commanders will have to discuss the plan face to face before ground operations commence". US commanders were likely to press him on UK land contributions beyond the provisions in the Base Plan.

500. Lt Gen Reith put forward two options:

- "National focus with limited operational exposure." The Base Plan, involving "operations within the AO as presently defined, concentrating on making the early transition from Phase III to Phase IV, with an end state defined as 'exemplary performance' in Phase IV within Basra region". One advantage of the Base Plan was that it preserved UK combat power "for the major Phase IV task in the AO (Basra, for example is a city of 1.5m people and may not be a benign environment)".
- "Coalition focus with unconstrained operational exposure." This approach reflected a number of contingency plans (CONPLANS) in different stages of development and involved "selective deployment of UK formations where their capabilities are most efficiently used, consistent with the requirement to service the Basra AO". Among the disadvantages of this approach was a reduction in the number of troops available for Phase IV operations in the UK AO, which "may impact on our ability to produce exemplary early effect during Phase IV".

501. Lt Gen Reith concluded:

> "US commanders are likely to press on branch planning and UK land contributions beyond the provisions of the Base Plan.
>
> "The situation is changing: the potential for a UK Box remains my aspiration but is in practical terms receding …
>
> "In discussing the campaign, and subject to their [the Chiefs of Staff] agreement, CJO [Chief of Joint Operations, Lt Gen Reith] will balance the desire to husband our land forces for Phase IV in our own AO, against the possible Coalition requirement to take a greater part of the Phase III effort, with the risks this implies in terms of the ease with which we transition to Phase IV."

502. The Chiefs of Staff discussed the papers on 5 March.[168] They rejected the proposal for a UK box.

503. In Lt Gen Reith's absence, Maj Gen Fry sought guidance from the Chiefs of Staff on offering "UK 'niche' contributions beyond the provisions of the Base Plan" in the context of the requirement to deliver an exemplary Phase IV.

504. The Chiefs of Staff noted that until the arrival of US 4th Infantry Division, the UK would be providing "a disproportionately high percentage of the combat power in the South and that it would disadvantage the Coalition campaign to ring-fence UK land forces in a national boundary". A more flexible approach would be needed and a "balance had to be struck between achieving closure to Phase III and the delivery of an 'exemplar' Phase IV".

[168] Minutes, 5 March 2003, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

505. Adm Boyce directed Lt Gen Reith to "push for a 'niche' role for the UK … and make it clear that the UK was ready to be asked to contribute further in order to exploit any operational opportunities that arose during the campaign", subject to US logistics support and assurances that UK forces would be "relieved-in-place" as soon as possible for Phase IV activities in the South.

506. Discussing a draft of a Ministerial note on Phase IV operations, the Chiefs of Staff noted that delivering an exemplary Phase IV required "the concomitant resources and OGD [Other Government Departments] commitment". Adm Boyce stressed that Phase IV could not be delivered by military activity alone.

507. Adm Boyce directed that the Ministerial note should include indicative numbers to give a better understanding of what was being provided in terms of medium scale and large scale commitment. The minutes recorded:

> "It was also important to emphasise that MOD commitments should be guided by DPAs [Defence Planning Assumptions], which provided for large scale up to 6 months. Medium scale was to be considered a divisional HQ plus a bde [brigade] of troops. Undertaking such an operation for longer would break harmony guidelines and was likely to lead to the Department's failure to meet its PSA [Public Service Agreement] targets."

508. The MOD advised Mr Blair on 6 March that the UK might play additional "cutting edge" roles in combat operations.

509. On 6 March, Mr Watkins informed Sir David Manning that the MOD's assumption that UK land forces would "hold ground behind the advancing US formations" had been "overtaken by events".[169] The "continuing impasse over Turkey" could result in the UK playing "additional 'cutting edge' roles".

510. Both 3 Commando Brigade and 16 Air Assault Brigade had achieved their full operating capability and 7 Armoured Brigade was expected to do so "by about 18 March". Although the timing of the start of military action remained uncertain, "a sizeable proportion of the UK land package" was now likely to be in a position to participate in combat operations from the start of the ground campaign.

511. Mr Watkins wrote:

> "As a result, 1(UK) Div is now likely to represent a higher and more significant proportion of the overall combat power available in the early stages of the ground campaign."

512. Mr Hoon and the Chiefs of Staff judged that "it would not be wise at this late stage to seek a major revision to the US plan", but that it could make better use of some of the niche capabilities in 1 (UK) Div. Mr Hoon had agreed that the UK should encourage US commanders to identify a niche role.

---

[169] Letter Watkins to Manning, 6 March 2003, 'Iraq: Options for Employment of UK Land Forces'.

513. The US was looking at a number of variations to its plan, including involving 7 Armoured Brigade in "decisive manoeuvre operations beyond south-eastern Iraq" and "possibly in a decisive phase around Baghdad". That would raise a number of issues, including for post-conflict operations:

> "At the beginning of Phase IV … operations, 1(UK) Division would initially find itself spread across two different areas at once. While 7 Armoured Brigade was engaged in combat operations around Baghdad, 1(UK) Division would have only its two light brigades available to deal with any immediate problems in south-eastern Iraq. At the very least we would need US assurances that they would facilitate rapid re-adjustment at the earliest opportunity, to allow 7 Armoured Brigade to rejoin the rest of 1(UK) Division."

514. Mr Watkins explained that Mr Hoon and the Chiefs of Staff had therefore agreed that the UK "should not actively seek this sort of wider role, but that we should be prepared to consider any unsolicited US requests on their merits". The MOD would produce further advice on the outcome of discussions with the US, but warned it was likely that "decisions may need to be made very rapidly".

515. In early March, Lt Gen Reith discussed the expansion of the UK combat role with US commanders. He continued to advise the Chiefs of Staff to extend the UK AO.

516. Lt Gen Reith visited the Middle East from 5 to 7 March where he discussed optimising the use of 1 (UK) Div combat power "in some detail" with General John Abizaid, Gen Franks' Deputy Commander (Forward), and then with Lt Gen McKiernan.[170]

517. The record of the visit stated that Lt Gen Reith "offered" two options for UK forces to play a role in later operations:

- using 7 Armoured Brigade to provide additional combat power to either 1 MEF or 5 Corps in their advance on Baghdad; or
- 16 Air Assault Brigade to be deployed forward by air to the Baghdad area to "assist in developing stability in case of sudden regime collapse".

518. A manuscript note on Maj Gen Fry's copy of the record stated:

> "CDS was most unhappy … COS [Chiefs of Staff] & SofS [Secretary of State] riding instructions were to not offer anything outside the UK AO but be receptive to requests ('request mode rather than push mode'). CDS wanted to talk to CJO [170] Minute Dutton to PSO/CDS, 7 March 2003, 'CJO Visit to Middle East 5-7 Mar 03'.

[Lt Gen Reith] immediately – but will close the loop on Saturday [8 March]. In the meantime this note is being kept away from Ministers' offices."[171]

519. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff, visited UK forces in Kuwait between 6 and 8 March and was involved in Lt Gen Reith's discussion with Lt Gen McKiernan.[172]

520. In his report to Adm Boyce, Gen Jackson offered two observations on the Phase III plan:

- that the UK's "limited role" was "by no means ideal given the considerable capabilities" inherent within 1 (UK) Div; and
- "just how little combat power the US have on the ground" now that 4th Infantry Division could not deploy in time to influence the outcome. "Holding a little under one third of the available coalition armour, 1 (UK) Armoured Division has combat power that may prove decisive for operations around Baghdad."

521. Gen Jackson added that it was for that reason that US forces had "made very clear their wish" to use 7 Armoured Brigade for subsequent tasks. That would be discussed at the Chiefs of Staff meeting that week.

522. On what might happen after combat operations, Gen Jackson wrote:

"… I judge that, realistically, it will be some time before Coalition partners join US and British forces in any real strength, if at all. I draw two conclusions from this: first, that as much as possible of Iraq's administrative and military structure should be preserved; and second, that we should beware rapid US drawdown on the American assumption that UK (perhaps through the ARRC) will form the focus for an international force that in the event fails to materialise.

"… GOC 1 Div [Maj Gen Brims] made it clear to me that in clarifying his role in Phase IV, he needed simply to know what his title was, to whom he would be responsible, and how quickly a civil administrator would be appointed. While he judges that Basra has adequate short-term food stocks, it will urgently need water, electricity and medical supplies … Only the ICRC has humanitarian stocks in position … there was little confidence within 1 Div that DFID has a coherent plan in place. I support GOC 1 Div's intent to manage Phase IV with as light a touch as possible, but it will be important to establish the rule of law quickly – the question, as in Kosovo, will be whose law?"

523. Gen Jackson concluded:

"We are ready not just to demonstrate solidarity with our Coalition partner, but to contribute considerable and potentially decisive combat power to achieve rapid success in Phase III. Rapid success will set the conditions for Phase IV, which in turn will determine the overall success of the enterprise."

DEVELOPMENT OF PHASE IV PLANNING

524. On 6 March, Mr Blair chaired the first Ministerial meeting convened solely to address humanitarian and other post-conflict issues.

525. Officials recommended that the UK should not seek responsibility for general administration of a geographical area of Iraq in the medium term and pressed Ministers to take an urgent decision on the issue.

526. No decision was taken.

527. After Cabinet on 6 March, Mr Blair chaired a meeting on post-conflict issues with Mr Brown, Mr Hoon, Ms Clare Short (International Development Secretary), Baroness Symons (joint FCO/DTI Minister of State for International Trade and Investment), Sir Michael Jay (FCO Permanent Under Secretary) and "other officials".[173]

528. The annotated agenda and the meeting are described in more detail in Section 6.5.

529. With the invasion possibly only weeks away, the IPU explained that US and UK planning assumed that, in the "medium term after the conflict", Coalition Forces would be "re-deployed into six or seven geographical sectors in order to provide a secure environment for the civil transitional administration to conduct humanitarian assistance and reconstruction work". The US expected the UK Division in Iraq to be responsible for a geographical sector, which would be very expensive and carry wider resource implications. The UK Division would probably be based in or near Basra, with the size of its AOR depending on a number of factors, including the permissiveness of the environment and the size of the Division in relation to the rest of the Coalition.

530. The annotated agenda stated:

"Ministers need urgently to take a view on this before the military planning assumptions become a fait accompli."

531. The questions Ministers were asked included:

- To choose between options for a medium-term post-conflict military presence. The Chiefs of Staff believed it would be necessary to reduce the UK's military contribution from about 45,000 to 15,000 in the "medium term (by the autumn)" to "avoid long term damage to the Armed Forces". At the same time, the US expected the UK to contribute forces "for the security of a geographic area … over the medium term". The IPU considered it "reasonable to assume that a brigade should be able to manage a single, well-populated province" the size of Basra, but there were four options available:

- a brigade responsible for security in a single province;
- a UK divisional headquarters could take responsibility for security, under Coalition command, in a wider area of Iraq (US planners envisaged Basra, Maysan, Dhi Qar and Wasit being a single sector), supported by Coalition partners, which, the paper recognised, could be difficult to find;
- deployment of the ARRC in addition or as an alternative to a brigade; or
- withdrawal of all forces in the medium term, although it was warned that would be politically difficult.

- Whether to follow the US plan, which had to be right, to administer Iraq as a whole and not seek general UK responsibility for the administration of any geographic area in the medium term. In any area where the UK took responsibility for security, it could, with a UN mandate, also take on wider responsibility for reconstruction (including humanitarian assistance and aspects of civil administration), but that would "very likely be beyond the resources of the UK alone and have implications for domestic Departments".

532. MOD advice to Mr Hoon was explicit about the inadequacy of those preparations.

533. The MOD briefing for Mr Hoon stated:

"… any UK involvement in the administration of post-conflict Iraq will necessarily require a significant civilian administrative and specialist component; this component has not yet been identified or resourced by OGDs. This is the key issue. The success of civil administration will be essential to Iraq's long term future. The UK military cannot do this on their own.

"… [T]he current Defence Planning Assumption is that UK forces can only sustain large scale operations for a period of six months without doing long term damage to capability. This implies that UK forces reduce to a medium scale (i.e. roughly one brigade) post-conflict TELIC commitment.

"… US planning is currently tending to assume UK involvement in Phase IV at a level that is the maximum, if not higher than, that we can sustain. If Ministers wish to set limits on the UK's Phase IV contribution they should be set now so that US planning can be adjusted …

"… [A]s US planning stands, the UK will need substantial support from other nations. There are no arrangements yet in place formally to gather such support. Such support will be largely contingent on a suitable second/third UNSCR and a UN mandate for the occupation of Iraq. The FCO need to build on their recent 'market survey' to identify candidates and persuade them to shorten the time it will take them to deploy."[174]

534. Possible levels of UK commitment to Phase IV were set out in an annex:

"i. Maximum payoff (and maximum cost): Tackle a problem area (eg Basra) with a UK two-star lead (subsequently becoming a multinational HQ). A UK Brigade in the SE sector. HQ ARRC taking on the CJTF(I) role early for six months. UK involvement (but not military) in a reconstruction pillar. This would be contingent on US burden sharing …

ii. Regional (+): The SE Sector with a UK two-star lead (subsequently becoming a multinational HQ). A UK Brigade in the SE sector. No HQ ARRC but UK involvement (including military) in a reconstruction pillar and a significant staff contribution to CJTF-I.

iii. Regional: The SE Sector with a UK two-star lead (subsequently becoming a multinational HQ). A UK Brigade in the SE sector.

iv. Regional (-): A UK Brigade in the SE sector – not UK led. UK involvement (including military) in a reconstruction pillar.

v. Regional (- -): A UK Brigade in the SE sector – not UK led."

535. Mirroring the urgency expressed in the IPU Annotated Agenda, the MOD warned that, in the absence of settled UK policy on the scale or duration of the UK contribution to post-conflict Iraq, that contribution risked being determined "by decisions being taken by CENTCOM now".

536. The MOD identified a number of specific concerns, including:

- US plans envisaged the UK having responsibility for security in one of seven sectors. The UK had neither agreed formally nor challenged the US assumption. Nor had other departments scoped what non-military UK contributions could be sustained. The UK was "currently at risk of taking on an unsustainable task if there is no further Coalition contribution to the occupation of Iraq".
- If the UK did lead a military sector, there was a risk of the UK military being "intimately involved" in the civil administration, "not a role they would seek". There was "a pressing need to identify civil capacity across the international civil admin effort, including to support civil administration in a UK military sector".
- The UK was "carrying some risk of early humanitarian assistance failures in the UK AO".

[174] Minute Sec(O)4 to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 6 March 2003, 'Iraq: Aftermath – Medium to Long Term UK Military Commitment'.

537. The policy considerations included:

- the degree to which the UK wanted to stand "shoulder to shoulder" with the US – "a fundamental political judgement … where are the UK's red lines?"; and
- the UK's attitude to the future of Iraq. "Does the UK wish to become intimately involved in reconstruction and civil administration? This is not a military task … but it will both affect and be affected by the level of military engagement. It will also have significant resource implications, across government."

538. The briefing concluded with a section on the worst case scenario:

> "Much of the above is predicated on best-case assumptions for the progress of a conflict (swift, short and successful), the condition of Iraq post-conflict (infrastructure not greatly damaged by fighting, limited internecine conflict) and the degree of international buy-in with civil and military resources, including cash (considerable and UN endorsed). The Secretary of State may wish to take the opportunity of this meeting to remind his colleagues that there is at least a credible possibility that none of these conditions will obtain.
> "Even if there is a second (and possibly third) UNSCR this is no guarantee of broad-based international buy-in into Phase IV … [T]here is a real possibility of the UK (along with the US and a few forward leaning smaller military nations) being committed to Phase IV engagement without international burden sharing and without an immediate exit strategy. At its worst this could expose the UK to an enduring large scale military commitment (20-30,000 in theatre) – and the commensurate civil support required to contribute to the rebuilding of Iraq … The potential consequences are severe … This is not the most likely risk, but it is one that increases the further the outcome post-conflict is from a UN-mandated solution."

539. In the speaking note for Mr Hoon attached to the brief, officials highlighted concerns about the tendency of discussion of the post-conflict phase, and the IPU annotated agenda, to focus on the military contribution:

> "A military presence will be a necessary but not a sufficient condition for success in Iraq. A large, organised and properly funded humanitarian assistance plan (supported by DFID) is needed from the outset."

540. Mr Nicholas Cannon, Mr Blair's Assistant Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, briefed Mr Blair that Ministers needed to make progress on three interlinked issues: the humanitarian response; the UN mandate; and whether the UK should take on a geographical sector in Iraq.[175] Basra was "the obvious choice" if the UK decided to take on one of seven geographical sectors in Iraq.

---

[175] Minute Cannon to Prime Minister, 5 March 2002, 'Iraq: Post-Conflict Issues'.

541. The conclusions of the meeting on 6 March included:

- DFID and the MOD should draw up a plan for immediate humanitarian action in the UK AO.
- Planning for a medium-term post-conflict action should continue on the assumption that a UN mandate would be forthcoming.
- The FCO should prepare a Phase IV plan with other departments, including the key decisions for Ministers to take.
- The Phase IV plan should cover sectorisation.

542. The "UK overall plan for Phase IV" was shown to Mr Blair on 7 March.[176] Much of the plan, prepared by the IPU, was drawn from the Annotated Agenda prepared for the meeting on 6 March.[177] That is addressed in Section 6.5.

Commitment to military action

543. On 7 March, Mr Lee sent Mr Hoon's Private Office a "critical decision checklist", setting out the issues which needed to be resolved before forces could be committed to action.[178] Those included:

- legal authority for use of military force;
- Parliamentary approval;
- confirmation that the military plan was viable and the risks acceptable;
- agreement of host nations to conduct offensive operations from their territory;
- provision of resources for immediate humanitarian assistance;
- targeting policy and delegation;
- agreement with the US on Phase IV assumptions; and
- finalisation of military campaign objectives.

544. Mr Lee asked No.10 to be notified using the checklist.

545. Adm Boyce decided on 10 March that UK forces should focus on achieving the UK objectives in its planned AO.

546. The Chiefs of Staff were concerned that Lt Gen Reith's recommendation to allow operations further north would overstretch UK resources in both the combat and post-combat phases.

547. Lt Gen Reith sent the Chiefs of Staff an update on military planning options on 10 March.[179] It reflected the undertaking (in Mr Watkins' letter to Sir David Manning of 6 March) that the MOD would provide further advice on the outcome of discussions with the US.

548. Lt Gen Reith wrote that the update also followed discussion among the Chiefs of Staff about "a less constrained approach to operations such that [the] UK can make a decisive contribution to Phase III operations, without impacting on the strategic goal of an exemplary Phase IV plan".

549. Lt Gen Reith recommended that the Chiefs of Staff agree that:

- with UK forces likely to be at Full Operating Capability (FOC) before any committal to combat, UK combat elements could enhance the US plan;
- NBC (nuclear, biological and chemical) and specialist engineer elements be released to US forces for use during the seizure of the Rumaylah oilfields;
- the Joint Commander be authorised to allow 1 (UK) Div to operate north of the current planned UK AO, no further than Al Amara, "if this enhances 1 MEF's ability to achieve its mission, on the understanding that the Division will only exploit forward as far as security and transition to Phase IV within the current AO allows"; and
- plans should be developed with the US for subsequent use of UK forces in the event of sudden regime collapse or if decisive additional combat power were required.

550. In the attached paper, Lt Gen Reith advised:

> "Further opportunities to support a Coalition main effort also exist and will be event driven … Whilst each scenario will differ, there will be occasions where an imperative for Phase III success could drive us to balance risk between supporting the main effort and our Phase IV exemplary action. Further work is needed in this area."

551. Lt Gen Reith outlined the plan to extend the UK AO to the north at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 10 March.[180] He explained that the "current UK AO could potentially result in enemy forces around Basra interfering with Phase IV operations". There was "a clear military task to ensure that enemy forces in the areas outside the current UK AO were unable to interfere with the UK Main Effort".

552. On 10 March, the Chiefs of Staff discussed Lt Gen Reith's paper. It endorsed the NBC and specialist roles as time limited tasks within the UK's AO.

553. Lt Gen Reith highlighted potential roles for UK forces in the event of sudden regime collapse. Adm Boyce directed Lt Gen Reith to develop options and brief the Chiefs of Staff accordingly.

---

[180] Minutes, 10 March 2003, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

554. The Chiefs of Staff were "concerned that extending the AO would overstretch Phase III and Phase IV resources and potentially detract from the Main Effort in the UK AO".

555. Adm Boyce directed Lt Gen Reith "to proceed with the main effort, of an exemplary Phase IV, in the original AO (Southern AO) with operations in the Northern AO as required to achieve a speedy and successful Phase III and to shape Phase IV".

556. AM Burridge wrote in his Hauldown Report on 8 May:

> "Our overriding consideration was for the GOC [Maj Gen Brims] to condition his own AO, in preparation for stability operations (Phase IV), rather than inherit circumstances [created by others] …"[181]

557. Lt Gen Reith's advice of 11 March for the Chiefs of Staff on the gaps in UK and US planning for post-conflict operations, including the absence of a detailed UK/US policy on the role of the military in maintaining law and order and detaining civilians, is addressed in Section 6.5.

Mr Blair's meeting, 11 March 2003: agreement to the military plan

558. Sir Kevin Tebbit raised the absence of an agreed legal basis for military action with Sir Andrew Turnbull on 5 March.

559. Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Sir Andrew Turnbull on 5 March, stating:

> "I am sure you have this in hand already, but in case it might help, I should like to offer you my thoughts on the procedure for handling the legal basis for any offensive operations … in Iraq – a subject touching on my responsibilities since it is the CDS [Chief of the Defence Staff] who will need to be assured that he will be acting on the basis of a lawful instruction from the Prime Minister and the Defence Secretary.
> "It is not possible to be certain about the precise circumstances in which this would arise because we cannot be sure about the UN scenario involved … Clearly full UN cover is devoutly to be desired – and not just for the military operation itself …
>
> "My purpose in writing, however, is not to argue the legal merits of the case … but to flag up … that the call to action from President Bush could come at quite short notice and that we need to be prepared to handle the legalities so we can deliver …
> "In these circumstances, I suggest that the Prime Minister should be prepared to convene a special meeting of the inner 'war' Cabinet (Defence and Foreign Secretaries certainly, Chancellor, DPM [Deputy Prime Minister], Home Secretary possibly, Attorney General, crucially) at which CDS effectively receives his legal and constitutional authorisation. We have already given the Attorney General information and MOD briefings on objectives and rationale, and I understand that John Scarlett is conducting further briefing on the basis of the intelligence material.

"While it is not possible to predict the timing of the event precisely … [it] could conceivably be as early as 10 March … in the event, albeit unlikely, that the Americans lost hope in the UN and move fast. Michael Jay may have a better fix on this, but I guess the more likely timing would be for Security Council action around the weekend of 15/16 March, and therefore for a meeting after that."[182]

560. Copies of the letter were sent to Sir Michael Jay and Sir David Manning.

561. Sir Michael commented that both Adm Boyce and Gen Jackson had told him that they would need "explicit legal authorisation".[183] Sir Kevin's proposal "would be one way of achieving this: though the timetable looks a bit leisurely".

562. On 5 March, the US requested the UK Government's agreement to the use of British bases in the UK and overseas.

563. On 5 March, the US requested the UK's permission to use Diego Garcia and RAF Fairford for operations against Iraq.[184]

564. Mr Straw's Private Office wrote to No.10 on 11 March reporting that the request followed "a series of informal requests and notifications" over the past few weeks to FCO and MOD officials.[185] Both departments had taken the view that a more formal request should be made "to remind the US that any use by the US forces of British bases or Diego Garcia must be on the basis of joint decision, as laid down under existing agreements".

565. The US had formally requested the UK Government's agreement to the use of RAF Fairford, Diego Garcia and, possibly, other British bases for military operations against Iraq. It was now pressing for a response "as soon as possible".

566. The FCO advised that "under international law, the UK would be responsible for any US action in breach of international law in which the UK knowingly assisted". The draft response was "premised on a decision that UNSCR 1441 and other relevant resolutions" provided "the authority for action".

567. On 7 March, Lord Goldsmith sent Mr Blair formal advice on the legality of military action against Iraq without another resolution of the Security Council, further to resolution 1441.

568. Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March, which set out his reasoning in considerable depth, is addressed in detail in Section 5.[186]

569. Lord Goldsmith's conclusions are summarised in the Box below.

Lord Goldsmith's advice, 7 March 2003

Lord Goldsmith identified three possible bases for the use of military force. He explained that neither self-defence nor the use of force to avert overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe applied in this case.

Lord Goldsmith concluded that he remained "of the opinion that the safest legal course would be to secure the adoption of a further resolution to authorise the use of force", and that he had "already advised" that he did "not believe that such a resolution need be explicit in its terms" if it established that the Security Council had "concluded" that Iraq had "failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441".

Lord Goldsmith added:

> "Nevertheless, having regard to the information on the negotiating history which I have been given and to the arguments of the US Administration which I heard in Washington, I accept that a reasonable case can be made that resolution 1441 is capable in principle of reviving the authorisation in 678 without a further resolution."

Lord Goldsmith added that that would:

> "… only be sustainable if there are strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity. In other words, we would need to be able to demonstrate hard evidence of non-compliance and non-co-operation. Given the structure of the resolution as a whole, the views of UNMOVIC and the IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency] will be highly significant in this respect. In the light of the latest reporting by UNMOVIC, you will need to consider extremely carefully whether the evidence … is sufficiently compelling to justify the conclusion that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity."

570. Lord Goldsmith stressed, in paragraph 36 of his advice, that the lawfulness of military action depended on the question of proportionality as well as the existence of a legal basis:

> "Any force used pursuant to the authorisation in resolution 678:
> - must have as its objective the enforcement [of] the terms of the cease-fire contained in resolution 687 [1991] and subsequent relevant resolutions;
> - be limited to what is necessary to achieve that objective; and
> - must be a proportionate response to that objective, ie securing compliance with Iraq's disarmament obligations."

[186] Minute Goldsmith to Prime Minister, 7 March 2003, 'Iraq: Resolution 1441'.

571. Lord Goldsmith continued:

> "That is not to say that action may not be taken to remove Saddam Hussein from power if it can be demonstrated that such action is a necessary and proportionate measure to secure the disarmament of Iraq. But regime change cannot be the objective of military action. This should be borne in mind in considering the list of military targets and in making public statements about any campaign."

572. Mr Hoon wrote to Lord Goldsmith on 10 March forwarding two papers:

- one on targeting considerations (addressed later in this Section); and
- a second, 'Disarming Iraq', written to underpin "the choice of military tasks in the Government's draft campaign objectives".[187]

573. On 11 March, Ministers discussed legal issues, including holding back for a few days the response to a US request for the use of UK bases, and the viability of the military plan.

574. Mr Blair held a meeting on 11 March with Mr Prescott, Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith and Adm Boyce.[188] Mr Straw attended part of the meeting. Sir Andrew Turnbull, Mr Powell, Mr Alastair Campbell (Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy), Baroness Morgan (Mr Blair's Director of Political and Government Relations), Sir David Manning and Mr Rycroft were also present.

575. Mr Blair was advised beforehand that the main purpose of the meeting was to confirm viability of the overall military plan.[189] Suggested questions for Mr Blair to raise included:

- Did the US have a winning concept?
- Did he agree with Mr Hoon that: specialist roles should be secured for the UK; the UK area should be extended northwards; and options should be explored for reinforcing US forces?
- What conditions should UK forces expect in Basra?
- How would the US "reorganise" if UK forces were not involved?

576. Mr Bowen advised Sir David Manning that the US request for the use of UK bases was to be discussed at Mr Blair's meeting with Lord Goldsmith, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon on 11 March.[190] He understood that Mr Straw and Mr Hoon had copies of Lord Goldsmith's advice.

577. As Section 5 makes clear, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Dr John Reid, Minister without Portfolio and Labour Party Chair, and the Chiefs of Staff had all seen Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March before Mr Blair's meeting on 11 March, but it is not clear how and when it reached them.

578. Ms Cathy Adams, Legal Counsellor in the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers, advised Lord Goldsmith that she understood "the principal purpose of the meeting to be to discuss the ad bellum issue".[191]

579. An hour before the meeting took place, MOD Legal Advisers provided questions for Mr Hoon to raise at the meeting, explaining:

> "… some in the FCO – whether having read the AG [Attorney General]'s letter or not, I don't know – are beginning to believe that the legal base is already OK. It seems to us – and I have discussed this with Martin Hemming [the MOD Legal Adviser] – that the position is not yet so clear."[192]

580. The document provided for Mr Hoon stated:

> "Questions for the Attorney General
>
> "If no 2nd resolution is adopted (for whatever reason), and the PM decides that sufficient evidence exists that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity to comply offered by 1441, is he satisfied that the currently proposed use of force would be lawful under international law?
>
> "Comment: The AG's minute to the PM is equivocal: he says 'a reasonable case can be made' [for the revival argument] but also says that his view is that 'different considerations apply in different circumstances' [meaning the nature of the Security Council discussions under OP12]. He ends his summary thus: 'If we fail to achieve the adoption of a second resolution we would need to consider urgently at that stage the strength of our legal case in the light of circumstances at the time'.
> "If the answer is yes to the above, can it be assumed that the Attorney will be able to confirm formally at the time that CDS's order to implement the planned operation would be a lawful order (anybody subject to military law commits an offence if he disobeys any lawful command).
> "Comment: Notwithstanding the current uncertainties, when it comes to the crunch, CDS will need to be assured that his orders are lawful. As the Attorney points out in his letter, 'on previous occasions when military action was taken on the basis of a reasonably arguable case, the degree of public and Parliamentary scrutiny of the legal issue was nothing like as great as it is today'."

581. The record of the meeting on 11 March reported that Mr Blair had started by addressing the legal basis for military action.[193] He stated that Lord Goldsmith's "advice made it clear that a reasonable case could be made" that resolution 1441 was "capable of reviving" the authorisation of resolution 678 (1990), "although of course a second resolution would be preferable".

582. Adm Boyce and Mr Hoon described the military plan, the proposed UK involvement, possible Iraqi tactics, and responses to them. Adm Boyce was "confident that the battle plan would work". The record stated that Mr Blair asked a number of questions and confirmed he was "in general content with it".

583. Mr Blair stated that "we must concentrate on averting unintended consequences of military action. On targeting, we must minimise the risks to civilians."

584. Other points recorded by Mr Rycroft included:

- Adm Boyce said he "would need to put a short paragraph in his directive to members of the Armed Forces".
- The paragraph "should be cleared with the Attorney General".
- The UK would send the US a positive reply to its request to use Diego Garcia and RAF Fairford "in a day or two, with the usual conditions attached".
- Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce advised that "once we had given our approval, the US might give very little notice before the start of the campaign".
- Sir Andrew Turnbull asked whether a legal basis for military action was required for civil servants, as well as for members of the Armed Forces.
- Mr Hoon asked whether the Attorney General's legal advice was ever disclosed.
- Mr Blair asked for a quick study into the precedents for that.

585. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that:

- Mr Hoon had "said he would be happier with a clearer green light from the AG".
- Mr Blair had been "really irritated" when Sir Andrew Turnbull had "said he would need something to put round the Civil Service that what they were engaged in was legal". Mr Blair was "clear we would do nothing that wasn't legal".
- Lord Goldsmith had provided "a version of the arguments he had put to TB, on the one hand, on the other, reasonable case".
- Mr Hoon had advised that the response to the "US request for the use of Diego Garcia and [RAF] Fairford" should be that it was "not … automatic but had to go round the system". Mr Blair had said he "did not want to send a signal that we would not do it".

---

[193] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 11 March 2003, 'Iraq: Legal and Military Aspects'.

- Mr Hoon and Mr Straw were telling Mr Blair that the US could act as early as that weekend, and "some of our forces would have to be in before".[194]

586. Mr Hemming wrote to Mr David Brummell, the Legal Secretary to the Law Officers, on 12 March stating:

> "It is clear that legal controversy will undoubtedly surround the announcement of any decision by the Government to proceed to military action in the absence of the adoption of a further resolution by the UN Security Council. The CDS is naturally concerned to be assured that his order to commit UK Armed Forces to the conflict in such circumstances would be a lawful order by him. I have informed the CDS that if the Attorney General has advised that he is satisfied that the proposed military action by the UK would be in accordance with national and international law, he [CDS] can properly give his order committing UK forces.
>
> "In view of the rapidly developing situation, I thought that the Attorney would wish to know what I have said on this question."[195]

587. Lord Goldsmith and Mr Brummell agreed that:

- It would be proper for Mr Brummell to confirm to Mr Hemming that the proposed military action would be in accordance with national and international law.
- "[It] would be necessary to prepare a statement setting out the Attorney's view of the legal position which could be deployed at Cabinet and in Parliament the following week."[196]

588. Mr Brummell wrote to Mr Hemming on 14 March to "confirm" that Lord Goldsmith was "satisfied that the proposed military action by the UK would be in accordance with national and international law".[197]

589. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Hoon, Adm Boyce and Sir Kevin Tebbit, as well as to Mr Bowen and Ms Juliet Wheldon, the Treasury Solicitor.

590. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "… the propriety and/or the legality of what we were about to do was obviously a concern of mine, not least of it, since, somewhat against my better instincts, we had signed up to the ICC [International Criminal Court]. I always made it perfectly clear to the Prime Minister face-to-face, and, indeed, to the Cabinet, that if we were invited to go into Iraq, we had to have a good legal basis for doing so, which obviously a second resolution would have completely nailed."[198]

591. Lord Boyce added:

"… that wasn't new, it was something which I had told the Prime Minister that I would need at the end of the day, long before March. This is back in January when we started to commit our forces out there, and, as you say, I received that assurance. This was an important issue, particularly because of the speculation in the press about the legality or otherwise and, as far as I was concerned particularly for my constituency, in other words, soldiers, sailors and airmen and their families had to be told that what they were doing was legal. So it formed the first line of my Operational Directive which I signed on 20 March, and it was important for me just to have a one-liner, because that was what was required, as far as I was concerned, from the Government Law Officer, which, as you say, I received."[199]

592. The background to Lord Goldsmith's response and the subsequent discussions on the legal basis for military action are addressed in Section 5.

593. Following Mr Blair's meeting, the MOD provided details of the military plan and proposed that commanders should be given discretion to make further contributions outside the agreed UK AO.

594. Mr Watkins sent Sir David Manning an outline of the military plan for Iraq and advice on the decisions needed on the development of the UK's role.[200]

595. Mr Watkins wrote:

"The US Concept of Operations can achieve a conventional military defeat, and the use of force to secure regime change offers the best route to achieve Iraq's disarmament consistent with the principle of the minimum use of force … Overall, the plan represents a robust basis for the committal of UK forces.

"We should confirm to the US our willingness – subject to decisions by UK commanders at the time – to contribute specialist capabilities (NBC, engineering and bridging) to facilitate their advance from the South, and to a limited expansion northwards of our Area of Operations during the conflict phase: we need to confirm this by mid-week. We should continue to explore other options for contributing to the US decisive main effort, but without commitment at this stage.

[199] Public hearing, 3 December 2009, pages 88-89.
[200] Letter Watkins to Manning, 11 March 2003, 'Iraq: the Military Plan'.

> "Following further military-to-military discussions in theatre, the Defence Secretary [Mr Hoon] believes that it is timely to take stock of the US plan and take decisions on the further development of the UK role within it."

596. Mr Watkins wrote that the original US plan envisaged the US 4th Infantry Division seizing the Kirkuk oilfields, but that plan had been "compromised by Turkish delays". The US plan in the North therefore remained "fragile".

597. Mr Watkins advised that the commitment of specialist NBC, engineering and bridging capabilities "would reinforce key gaps in US capability and facilitate a rapid US advance, without detriment to the tasks required of UK forces in our Area of Operations".

598. On the expansion of the UK AO northwards, Mr Watkins explained:

> "The US Land Component Commander has … developed a plan that would expand the UK Area of Operations by up to 150km up to and beyond al-Amara [in Maysan province] (but short of al-Kut [in Wasit province]) …
> "The case for pushing a UK formation northwards will ultimately have to be judged at the time. Clearly it will depend to some extent on what is happening in the Basra area. It is also the case that an exemplary Phase IV operation depends on a satisfactory conclusion to the conflict phase. The Defence Secretary therefore judges that the senior UK operational commander (the Chief of Joint Operations [Lt Gen Reith]) should be authorised to expand the Phase III Area of Operations northwards if that is required to achieve a satisfactory outcome to Phase III. The focus for the UK in Phase IV should, however, remain the South-Eastern Area of Operations as currently understood."

599. Mr Watkins explained that, given delays in the deployment of some US forces, there were certain scenarios in which the US might need the additional combat power that the UK land component could provide:

> "In circumstances where the situation in the UK's existing Area of Operations was benign, and where Iraqi forces had generally collapsed, it might be possible for 1 (UK) Division to provide forces to contribute to decisive US action in addition to the specialist contributions and the northward expansion described above. The Defence Secretary believes that the Chief of Joint Operations should be authorised to participate in planning discussions with the US without commitment, and on the understanding that any decision to commit UK forces to reinforce the US in decisive action would be a matter for Ministers."

600. Mr Watkins explained that, on that basis, Mr Hoon judged:

- The "first priority" should be for the UK to confirm its willingness to contribute specialist capabilities to facilitate the US advance from the South.
- Second, "provided that UK commanders judge[d] this sensible in the circumstances at the time", the UK should be "forward-leaning" on the idea of extending the UK Area of Operations north during the conflict phase. If that was required to achieve a satisfactory conclusion to Phase III, on which "an exemplary Phase IV depends".

- Third, the UK "should be prepared to continue exploring options for reinforcing US forces at decisive points … but without commitment at this stage".

601. Mr Hoon spoke to Secretary Rumsfeld that evening, setting out the risks to starting operations at the time of a full moon and the political implications of not giving the second resolution sufficient time to secure votes (see Section 3.8).[201]

602. The MOD reported that Secretary Rumsfeld had said Gen Franks was looking at how to "work around" a position in which the UK could not participate in military action but which assumed that the UK would be available for post-conflict activities. Mr Hoon had responded that the UK would not want to be in that position and restated the case for waiting a few more days.

603. In a subsequent press briefing, Secretary Rumsfeld said that it was unclear what the UK role would be in the event that a decision was made to use force: "until we know what the resolution is, we won't know the answer to what their role will be".[202]

604. Secretary Rumsfeld subsequently clarified his comments, saying that he had "no doubt of the full support of the United Kingdom for the international community's efforts to disarm Iraq".[203] Obtaining a second resolution was important to the UK and the US was "working to achieve that". He added:

> "In the event that a decision to use force is made, we have every reason to believe that there will be a significant military contribution from the United Kingdom."

605. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that Secretary Rumsfeld had been "trying to be helpful", but it had not helped and "by then the military were absolutely determined, rightly, that they would be part of the action from the outset, and took amiss any sense that we might be in the second rank".[204]

606. In the entry for 11 March in the edition of his diaries published in 2012, Mr Campbell wrote that the incident was "indicative of the difficulties" of working with the US.[205] Secretary Rumsfeld's clarification was the result of a further telephone call from Mr Hoon "making it clear that we were with them".

607. Adm Boyce also spoke to Gen Myers on 11 March.[206] He reported that, following his visits to Op TELIC theatre, and discussions with commanders, units were ready and people would be deployed by 19 March.

608. Gen Myers indicated that he had told Gen Franks to work the "no UK option".

609. The minutes from the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 12 March stated that Secretary Rumsfeld had spoken publicly about the possibility of the US commencing action "without the UK at her side".[207] The political decision to commit UK forces to Phases III and IV had "not yet been made, though planning continued as directed by HMG".

610. In response to the request for a statement on the basis for his assurance to Mr Blair that the US plan for the invasion represented a "winning concept", Lord Boyce wrote:

> "The threat was carefully assessed, including taking into account the possible deployment of CW/BW weapons by Saddam, and measured against the capability of the Coalition Forces. There was complete confidence from CENTCOM and ourselves that Iraqi forces could be defeated."[208]

611. Lord Boyce's statement in respect of Phase IV is addressed in Section 6.5.

612. Asked whether Ministers had a clear sense of how important the UK contribution had become to the campaign plan, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry: "I think so …"[209]

613. Lord Boyce added that his personal view was that the US could not have begun the military campaign without the UK contribution: Secretary Rumsfeld's comments that the US could manage on its own were right, but the US would not have managed on its own on 19 March.[210]

614. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "… as far as the fighting phase is concerned we were satisfied we were there. As far as the aftermath planning was concerned, we thought we had something which was going to cope with, as far as our imagination allowed us to look; our imaginations didn't basically go wide enough … to what actually transpired when the time came."[211]

DIS Memorandum, 11 March 2003: 'Basra: Post-Saddam Governance'

615. The DIS produced a Memorandum on the "post-Saddam" political and security environment Coalition Forces were likely to encounter in Basra City on 11 March.[212]

[210] Public hearing, 27 January 2011, page 63.
[211] Public hearing, 27 January 2011, page 99.
[212] Paper DIS, 11 March 2003, 'Basra: Post Saddam Governance'.

616. The Memorandum included an assessment of the likely reaction in the first 72 hours after a Coalition attack. The DIS stated that, while judging the overall attitudes of the populace to the regime was "fraught with difficulty", "there seems little doubt that the vast majority of Basra's inhabitants are opposed to the regime and would welcome its removal".

617. Reflecting on the lessons of the 1991 uprising and that, in 2003, the "circumstances might be very different", the DIS identified "several noteworthy characteristics":

- "Total collapse of the Security forces and civil administration: Though there was some fierce fighting … security forces within the city … quickly collapsed … Within days (even hours) Basra became an administrative and governmental vacuum."
- "Lack of political or popular leadership: … With no real religious leadership within Basra City and with the majority of rural tribal leaders unwilling to lend support to the urban uprising there was … no one to curb the worst excesses of the populace."
- "Popular targeting of regime installations: … typically ransacked and burnt to the ground."
- "Reprisals against regime associated personnel: … Much anecdotal reporting and academic accounts identify Basra (along with Karbala) as the site of the worst excesses of the uprising, with summary executions and indiscriminate massacres of security personnel."
- "General collapse of law and order: … the insurrection in Basra soon descended into general anarchy, with looting a major feature … [W]anton destruction of public buildings and even the pillaging of museums occurred in Basra."
- "Entry of Iranian backed Iraqi groups: It seems apparent that Iranian backed Shia groups (including forces linked to the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, SCIRI) entered the environs of Basra on the second or third day of the uprising … they also pursued an Islamic revolutionary agenda – destroying examples of 'unislamic' practice …"

618. Addressing the likely reaction of the civil populace in 2003, the DIS stated that it had "no definitive intelligence" but there were "a number of scenarios that might occur", possibly simultaneously in the city. Those included:

- "Spontaneous civil uprising: … either before or during Coalition engagement with Iraqi forces in Basra governorate is unlikely … [R]ecollections of 1991 … are likely to lead to an extremely cautious reaction …"
- "Reprisals: … only high ranking regime personnel and those associated with particularly repressive behaviour would be targeted …"

- "Resistance activity: … Both SCIRI … and the Dawa Party would appear to have well-established urban support networks … and have over the years committed numerous acts of sabotage and assassination … Equally we assume that urban support structures for the rural based Shia opposition … may well exist. The Iraqi Communist Party might also retain an underground presence. We have little idea of the size or capability of such groups but many resistance networks might try to seize controls of local neighbourhoods within the southern cities … once the regime has collapsed … Many of these groups have access to considerable weaponry including small arms and RPGs [Rocket Propelled Grenades]."

619. The DIS stated that some of the groups "may pursue an agenda inimical to Coalition interests … and might resent Coalition presence"; and that criminals and opportunists "looking to exploit the situation would supplement resistance groups pursuing an 'anti-Saddam' agenda".

620. The DIS also warned that:

> "The continued activity of armed groups will set a dangerous precedent for Basra's future political landscape. We must expect political groupings with a religious (Shia) agenda and Iranian backing to emerge very quickly within Basra (and across southern Iraq) … [I]t would be highly destabilising for such groups to base their political influence on their control of armed elements. The armed wings of such groups will need to be disarmed or disbanded."

621. The DIS also warned that it expected the civil police "at least initially" to "disappear from view", and that many of the population were "fearful of a generalised breakdown in law and order". Disarming the populace "might be interpreted as running contrary to cultural norms and could be resisted".

622. The DIS had "no intelligence on regime planning to mount an urban defence of Basra City" but stated that "individual or localised resistance could occur". It also identified the forces which were likely to be at the disposal of the regime. Those are set out in Section 8.

623. The DIS advice on reactions to subsequent Coalition control of Basra, including the assessment that UK forces would be "required in the city to provide security", is addressed in Section 6.5.

624. General Franks wrote in his memoir that:

> "Intel[ligence] estimated that the vast majority of Basra's population of almost one million Shiites would remain neutral, neither helping nor hindering, while the British dealt with the Ba'athist leadership of the garrison."[213]

JIC Note, 13 March 2003: 'Saddam's Plan for Baghdad'

625. In its meeting on 12 March, the JIC discussed a letter on the defence of Baghdad circulated to members by Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff, on 6 March.[214]

626. In addition to the points already covered, the JIC concluded that the paper "should also say something about the possibility of CB use".

627. A JIC Note issued on 13 March set out the JIC's understanding of Iraqi military preparations in Baghdad, and an initial view of their potential effectiveness.[215]
It judged that:

- The Iraqi regime expected the Regular Army only to delay any Coalition attack en-route to Baghdad. It wanted to "drag out fighting and play for time, hoping that international pressure will force the Coalition to halt its attack and come to a negotiated settlement, leaving Saddam in power".
- Much of the Republican Guard (RG), including Iraq's best-equipped military units, was based around Baghdad. That was roughly 35,000 of the RG's 75,000 troops, with 600 of Iraq's best tanks and 900 other armoured vehicles. Defensive positions had been prepared 15-25 km to the west and south of the city. "Less significant preparations" had been made to the north and the east. Those defences had "clear vulnerabilities" and were "not sufficient to stop a Coalition assault".
- Iraqi security and militia organisations, backed by RG special forces brigades, were responsible for the inner city. Together they "could muster at least 10,000 men in Baghdad, possibly many more". There was "no evidence of a systematic fortification of the city for use by large-scale conventional ground forces" but surviving RG forces could retreat into Baghdad and "quickly prepare ad-hoc fall-back positions. Even a few thousand lightly armed troops could require disproportionate time and resources to overcome, with significant risk of Coalition and civilian casualties."
- Iraq's plans for Baghdad depended on the "morale and cohesion of its forces, including the ability of the authorities to continue exercising effective command and control". Intelligence "strongly" suggested that morale was already low.

628. The JIC did not know whether Saddam Hussein would remain in Baghdad. Baghdad was the best defended area and the best place for him to influence events. Saddam Hussein was "very security-conscious". Until there was "intense fighting" in Baghdad, the JIC assessed that Saddam Hussein would be able to move around Baghdad without detection.

---

[214] Minutes, 12 March 2003, JIC meeting.
[215] Note JIC, 13 March 2003, 'Saddam's Plan for Baghdad'.

629. The JIC stated that it had "previously judged that Saddam would be willing to use chemical and biological warfare (CBW) against the Coalition and the Iraqi population".[216]

630. The JIC assessed that it was "likely that, even if it had not done so already, the regime would use CBW in the defence of Baghdad if it could". That "would depend on the survival of leadership command and control, and of some delivery means, such as artillery". Intelligence indicated that the Special Republican Guard and Special Security Organisation retained "control over CBW munitions" and that the regime had "been distributing protective CBW clothing and medical supplies for treating exposure to nerve agents to units around Baghdad".

Two additional UK units deployed

On 10 March, Mr Hoon was asked to agree two additional UK deployments:

- 1st Battalion The Duke of Wellington's Regiment, to guard Prisoners of War as a consequence of the plan for UK units to provide "reliefs-in-place of US ground forces";[217] and
- 202 Field Hospital (Volunteer), to increase the number of field hospitals from two to three in response to concerns that the medical capability could be "overwhelmed early in the course of operations".[218]

Mr Hoon announced both deployments on 13 March, stating that they would provide 1 (UK) Div with "further flexibility to respond to a range of possible tasks and circumstances".[219]

631. Mr Blair agreed the military plan on 13 March.

632. Mr Blair held a further meeting to discuss the military plan and timetable with Mr Prescott, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce on 13 March.[220] That discussed the timing of the start of the military campaign and formal approval of the military plan set out in Mr Watkins' letter of 11 March.

633. There was "a discussion about the timing of the end of the UN process … and the start of military action". It was agreed that Mr Blair would pursue the timing issues with President Bush.

634. Adm Boyce advised that:

> "… the full moon meant that a later start date […] would certainly be preferable, but that the projected date was not a show stopper. The US military shared the preference for a later date, but had been told to accept the earlier date."

635. Sir David Manning confirmed Mr Blair's approval for the plan in a letter to Mr Watkins the following day.[221]

636. On 17 March, Mr Watkins replied to a separate letter from Sir David Manning of 14 March, asking whether the MOD was confident that the military planning took full account of the risks and problems identified in the JIC Assessment of Saddam Hussein's plans to defend Baghdad.[222]

637. Mr Watkins wrote that it "largely confirms the analysis" in the MOD advice of 28 February. In particular, it underlined the Iraqi regime's "dilemma" about whether to withdraw the RG's heavy armour into Baghdad. The US intention was to make it difficult for heavy units to reinforce the light forces providing the inner-city defence. The Special Republican Guard was not trained to mount a guerrilla campaign.

638. Mr Watkins also wrote that:

> "The setting alight of oil-filled trenches has the potential to cause some delay. As with Iraqi use of CBW, there is not much – apart from information operations – we can do to stop the Iraqis doing it. But their effect on Coalition Forces is likely to be limited … As the JIC paper notes, this tactic may be a two-edged sword … because it is unlikely to encourage loyalty amongst the local population … But we must be willing to recognise that the regime is likely to be willing to inflict extreme suffering on its own population and seek to blame the Coalition.
> "A key variable is the extent to which the regime's orders will be obeyed and the impact of the early campaign on Iraqi forces' will to fight. If necessary, General Franks is prepared to mount an air assault to create an enclave within the city from which operations could be mounted to combat resisting forces. As we noted on 28 February, in the worst case this could be a messy and protracted process."

639. Sir David Manning commented: "I take it that this amounts to a statement that MOD have taken account of the factors/risks identified in the JIC paper."[223]

[223] Manuscript comment Manning on Letter Watkins to Manning, 17 March 2003, 'JIC Paper: Saddam's Plan for Baghdad'.

640. ACM Burridge told the Inquiry that the "Republican Guard had been planned to form a ring around Baghdad". Saddam Hussein could also use weapons of mass destruction and:

> "… irregular warfare … to try and draw us into urban warfare.
>
> "He had developed the view … that western militaries don't do urban warfare. He had also developed the view that large numbers of civilian casualties – he had a Grozny [Chechnya] vision in mind [unfinished sentence]
> "The idea that the world's media would show this terrible destruction which, in his rather warped perception, would put him on the moral high ground …
>
> "What we didn't know was to what extent he would front load those southern cities, Basra in particular, and we subsequently recognised he put small elements of the Republican Guard in amongst the Ba'ath militia the Al Quds and people such as that, to … make them militarily more effective and … to put the frighteners on the 51 Division people who had effectively melted away, and they were coerced into getting back into their equipment."[224]

641. ACM Burridge also told the Inquiry:

> "Be under no illusion we believed that he did have tactical battlefield weapons with chemical or biological tips. He had used them previously …
> "So – but what we did know was that this wasn't the same as fighting through the central front in Warsaw Pact days when the entire battle space would be drenched in chemical agents. This was relatively limited. This was the sort of capability that normally you would choose to manoeuvre around, rather than have to consider a complete change of tactic …
>
> "So – and we were happy with the level of individual protection, and I take from that not only suits, and it is well recorded that had some of the suits were out of their perceived shelf life. They had to be tested and extended, and the same with canisters, inoculation programmes and the taking of NAPS [nerve agent pre-treatment] tablets. So we were clear what we were up against, and we were contented that we could deal with that element of risk."[225]

Cabinet, 17 March 2003

642. A specially convened Cabinet at 1600 on 17 March 2003 endorsed the decision to give Saddam Hussein an ultimatum to leave Iraq and to ask the House of Commons to endorse the use of military action against Iraq to enforce compliance, if necessary.

---

[224] Public hearing, 8 December 2010, pages 38-39.
[225] Public hearing, 9 December 2009, pages 44-45.

643. Mr Blair told his colleagues that he had called the Cabinet because "an impasse" had been reached at the United Nations.[226]

644. The Government had tried its "utmost", and had "tabled a draft … resolution, amended it, and then been prepared to apply tests against which Iraq's co-operation … could be judged". Although the UK had been "gathering increasing support from members of the Security Council", the French statement "that they would veto a resolution in all circumstances had made it impossible to achieve a new … resolution". France, with Russia in support, "were not prepared to accept" that if Saddam Hussein "did not comply with the United Nations obligations, military action should follow". The UK was in a situation it had "striven to avoid": "There would be no second resolution and military action was likely to be necessary … to enforce compliance by Saddam Hussein with Iraq's obligations."

645. The points made during discussion included that, in conducting military operations, it would be important to show "we wished to protect civilians, seek the surrender of Iraqi conscripts, and protect religious and cultural sites".

646. Mr Blair concluded that:

> "… the diplomatic process was now at an end. Saddam Hussein would be given an ultimatum to leave Iraq; and the House of Commons would be asked to endorse the use of military action against Iraq to enforce compliance, if necessary."

647. The Cabinet: "Took note."

648. The discussion in Cabinet is addressed in Section 3.8.

The ultimatum to Saddam Hussein

649. In an "Address to the Nation" at 8pm Eastern Standard Time on 17 March, President Bush stated that "the final days of decision" had been reached and issued an ultimatum giving Saddam Hussein and his sons 48 hours to leave Iraq.[227]

650. In a message to Iraqis, President Bush stated:

> "If we must begin a military campaign, it will be directed against the lawless men who rule your country and not against you … The day of your liberation is near.
>
> "… It is not too late for the Iraqi military to act with honor and protect your country by permitting the peaceful entry of Coalition Forces to eliminate weapons of mass destruction …"

---

[226] Cabinet Conclusions, 17 March 2003.
[227] The White House, 17 March 2003, President says Saddam Hussein must leave within 48 hours.

651. President Bush explicitly warned all Iraqis against destroying oil wells or using weapons of mass destruction: "War crimes will be prosecuted. War criminals will be punished."

652. The British Embassy Washington reported that a White House spokesman had "amplified" the President's statement and said that, if Saddam were to comply with the deadline and go into exile, US troops would still enter Iraq in order to pursue and disarm WMD; and that he hoped the international community would consider prosecuting Saddam Hussein for war crimes even in the case of exile.[228]

653. Separately, the Embassy reported that President Bush had decided to publish the names of nine Iraqis who were regarded as either war criminals or having decisive command and control responsibilities.[229]

Debates in Parliament, 18 March 2003

654. Debates on Iraq took place in both the House of Commons and the House of Lords on 18 March 2003 (see Section 3.8).

655. The Government motion for the debate included an invitation to the House of Commons to:

- note the opinion of the Attorney General that, Iraq having failed to comply and Iraq being at the time of resolution 1441 and continuing to be in material breach, the authority to use force under resolution 1441 had revived and so continued that day;
- believe that the United Kingdom must uphold the authority of the United Nations as set out in resolution 1441 and many resolutions preceding it, and therefore support the decision of Her Majesty's Government that the United Kingdom should use all means necessary to ensure the disarmament of Iraq's weapon's of mass destruction;
- offer wholehearted support to the men and women of Her Majesty's Armed Forces on duty in the Middle East; and
- in the event of military action require that, on an urgent basis, the United Kingdom should seek a new Security Council resolution that would affirm Iraq's territorial integrity, ensure rapid delivery of humanitarian relief, allow for the earliest possible lifting of UN sanctions, an international reconstruction programme, and the use of all oil revenues for the benefit of the Iraqi people and endorse an appropriate post-conflict administration for Iraq, leading to a representative government which upholds human rights and the rule of law for all Iraqis.[230]

The final preparations for conflict

656. On 18 March, Sir David Manning wrote to Dr Rice, formally confirming the UK's agreement to US use of Diego Garcia and RAF Fairford for "operations to enforce compliance by Iraq with the obligations on weapons of mass destruction laid down in UNSCR 1441 and previous relevant resolutions".[231]

657. The CDS Directive to Lt Gen Reith, the UK Commander Joint Operations for Operation TELIC, was issued at 2300 on 18 March. Operations would not begin before 1800 the following day.[232]

658. At the first Ad Hoc Meeting on Iraq on 19 March, Mr Scarlett provided an update on the intelligence picture "highlighting Iraqi military deployments and the poor morale of Iraqi forces".[233]

659. Adm Boyce stated that the "British forces were balanced and ready for action"; and that the "US military were well advanced in their preparations for immediate humanitarian relief".

660. The minutes of the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 19 March reported that military planners were looking at accelerating the plan "in anticipation of an early collapse of the Iraqi 51st Division in the South".[234]

661. Adm Boyce also informed the Chiefs of Staff that he had signed and issued the Execute Directive for Op TELIC, the military operation against Iraq, to Lt Gen Reith earlier that day.[235]

662. The Directive set out: the situation and legal basis for operations; the UK Government's political, strategic and military objectives; the concept of operations and detailed instructions for the mission.[236]

663. The details in respect of combat operations are set out in Section 8.

664. The provisions on IHL and on targeting and Rules of Engagement are addressed later in this Section.

665. The instructions for the post-conflict phase are described in Section 6.5.

666. Shortly before midnight on 19 March, the US informed Sir David Manning that there was to be a change to the plan and US air strikes would be launched at 0300 GMT on 20 March.[237]

667. Early on the morning of 20 March, US forces crossed into Iraq and seized the port area of Umm Qasr.[238]

668. The invasion of Iraq is addressed in Section 8. The continuing discussions about the planning and preparations for a post-conflict Iraq and the UK's role in that are addressed in Section 6.5.

669. The Military Campaign Objectives were published on 20 March.[239] They are addressed in Section 8.

670. Lord Goldsmith's approval had been sought for the document.[240]

671. The final version reflected Lord Goldsmith's request for a number of amendments.[241]

JIC Note, 19 March 2003: 'Saddam: The Beginning of the End'

672. The record of the JIC discussion on 19 March stated that the draft Note, 'Saddam: The Beginning of the End', "tried to answer some difficult questions about Saddam's likely actions as the endgame approached, but the picture was moving fast and predictions remained difficult". Saddam was "likely to go out fighting". The JIC also asked that the Note be reordered "to include judgements on Iraq's CBW intentions, possibly against a Shia uprising; Saddam's intentions in each of the three main geographical areas of Iraq; threats to the oilfields; regime and military cohesion in the light of army desertions; Saddam's ability to maintain control … and the defence of Baghdad. The Daily Updates needed to record developments in these areas."[242]

673. The JIC Note produced on the same day stated that the Iraqi regime was making its final preparations for war.[243] Saddam Hussein had publicly activated his regional command structure on 15 March and Iraq's military and security services were "on the highest state of alert". The JIC stated that "Saddam's scope for extreme and unpredictable action" was increasing as the prospect of an attack increased. The timing and sequence of his next moves were "already highly uncertain".

[242] Minutes, 19 March 2003, JIC meeting.
[243] Note JIC, 19 March 2003, 'Saddam: The Beginning of the End'.

674. The JIC judged:

> "There are indications that regime cohesion is under increasing pressure, but no sign that it will collapse before military action begins. Reporting suggests desertion rates are rising in the Republican Guard (RG), up to some 20 percent. One report also indicates that members of the RG are waiting for an attack to begin before escaping. Media reporting shows small numbers of Iraqi soldiers already offering to surrender. The regime proved able, however, to restore stability rapidly after limited anti-regime protests in mid-March."

675. The JIC assessed that Saddam Hussein was focusing on the defence of Baghdad:

> "Imagery indicates elements of the Special Republican Guard (SRG) have been deployed near to Saddam International airport and SRG security units have been dispersed in central Baghdad. One report indicated SRG had also been deployed in the northern outskirts of Baghdad in the direction of Tikrit. Imagery indicates Republican Guard units deploying to the South, West and East 30km outside the capital, apparently to concealment sites for protection against air strikes."

676. The JIC judged that Iraq had "a useable CBW capability, deliverable using artillery, missiles and possibly unmanned aerial vehicles". While a report in mid-March had indicated that Iraq's chemical weapons had not been assembled, there was intelligence to suggest that Iraq planned to use them. Reporting also suggested that Iraq could try to blame civilian deaths resulting from CBW use on the Coalition.

677. The JIC added that:

- "Intelligence on the timing of CBW use is inconsistent […]."
- Intelligence on the deployment of CBW was "sparse".
- "Uncorroborated reporting" suggested the "delivery of CW shells to Republican Guard units … south of Baghdad".
- There was "no evidence" that ballistic missiles destroyed by Coalition air action in February "were equipped with CBW warheads", but the JIC could not be sure that it "would receive indications prior to an attack".
- Saddam Hussein retained "ultimate control of CBW use", but there were suggestions that he had "contingency plans to devolve military decision making, including CBW, to regional commands, if communications are cut with Baghdad".
- Saddam Hussein "might take this decision early, once the severity of the initial attack becomes clear or in the face of Kurdish or Shia uprisings", although the possibility of Saddam offering concessions to remain in power "would argue against pre-emptive attacks and devolving control".
- An "early strategic U-turn, once Saddam realises the intensity of the attack … and the risk of losing control of his CBW capability" could not be ruled out, and he might "then order early CBW attacks".

- The JIC continued to judge that "in the face of death and the destruction of his regime", Saddam would "try to wreak as much havoc as possible", but his ability to do so could be limited.
- There was a "further risk … that CBW could become available to extremist groups either as a last vindictive act by Saddam, or through the loss of control in the final days of his regime".

678. In his account of the campaign, Gen Franks wrote on 20 March:

> "For the past two days we had been receiving increasingly urgent Intelligence reporting that Republican Guard units in Baghdad had moved south to the city of al-Kut – and that they had been issued mustard gas and an unknown nerve agent."[244]

Joint minute on the UK military contribution to post-conflict Iraq

679. Most of the issues raised at Mr Blair's meeting on 6 March, including sectorisation, remained unresolved as the invasion began.

680. On 19 March, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon informed Mr Blair that:

- the UK would not be expected to contribute resources to anything other than security during the first phase of the US post-conflict plan;
- it would be premature to take a view on the merits of sectors for the following phase; but
- it would help the US and military planners to agree on the UK's medium-term contribution.

681. The minute concluded with a warning that Coalition partners were thin on the ground. If the campaign did not go well, there would not be many who were prepared or able to take part.

682. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon considered only the UK's military presence in Iraq. They made no reference to the civilian contribution.

683. Sir Kevin Tebbit expressed concern about the transition from a primarily military effort to longer-term civilian-led reconstruction. It would be necessary to work hard to avoid dependence on the Armed Forces to carry out civilian tasks.

684. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon sent Mr Blair a joint minute on the UK military contribution to post-conflict Iraq on 19 March.[245]

685. The draft was subject to "intensive consultations at official level in the MOD and FCO".[246]

686. In the FCO, Mr Ricketts sent the draft to Mr Straw's Private Office with the comment:

> "This is a clear note on a crucial issue. If the Secretary of State [Mr Straw] could OK it (I showed him a slightly earlier draft this morning) it can go to No.10 tonight, for discussion at the PM's meeting at 0830 on 20 March."[247]

687. In the MOD, the draft was cleared by Adm Boyce and Sir Kevin Tebbit.

688. Sir Kevin commented:

> "In terms of our military capacity, with an eye to the aftermath, it would clearly be preferable to confine ourselves to SE Iraq and not bite off more than we can chew. I accept, however, that we should be prepared, initially, for our forces to be fairly widely dispersed across Iraq, depending on how Phase III goes, because without successful Phase III, Phase IV becomes harder, if not academic. The trick will be to be able to regroup in a smaller area of SE Iraq once hostilities are ended.
> "I also agree that we should be clear about our medium/long term scale of military commitment. While we are putting all we can into the war effort, we should plan ahead to stay broadly within … [Strategic Defence Review guidelines].[248]
> "What concerns me most is the process of transiting from a primarily military effort to the civil-led longer term humanitarian and reconstruction phase. Recent history does not offer too much encouragement and we shall have to work hard to avoid 'dependence culture' on the Armed Forces to do things which should be for civil departments – initially through aid, subsequently through Iraqi own efforts. The politics of the issue do, I believe, point in the same direction. To meet the PM's wish for us to play an exemplary role, we shall need to remember that memories of the UK in the region from the 1920s are not all positive, and we should make clear our desire to hand over and withdraw on the right basis as early as we can."[249]

689. In their joint minute, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon warned that some issues "could confront us as early as next week" and invited agreement to five propositions:

"(a) The maximum size of task that UK forces would contribute to in the early days should not exceed our overall military capability. A focus in the South-East of Iraq would be reasonable.

(b) The UK contribution to such a task in advance of a Security Council resolution would be limited to the facilitation of humanitarian assistance and a secure environment and the elimination of WMD.

(c) We therefore need to agree urgently with the US a realistic authorising Security Council resolution for post-conflict Iraq.

(d) We should agree urgently a plan with the US to help us find military partners to enable us to draw down and, in due course, design an exit strategy.

(e) In broad terms the MOD will need to draw down its scale of effort to nearer a third of its commitment by the autumn."[250]

690. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon gave little detail of what UK forces would be required to do immediately after the invasion:

"Much will depend on how the campaign develops, but in the first few weeks we should expect Coalition Forces to be spread across Iraq. The expectation is that UK forces will end up in southern Iraq, loosely centred on Basra. However, we should be prepared for elements of our forces to be dispersed fairly widely across Iraq …

"US military planning continues to be fluid. But it envisages Coalition Forces re-deploying into a more tailored security framework as soon as the situation permits. The military task will be to facilitate a secure environment (including law and order, deterring adventurism and a variety of military-technical tasks) to enable immediate humanitarian relief to be conducted …

"The expectation is that UK forces would be responsible for a task focused on Basra and other key military objectives in the South-East of Iraq, which could include 20 percent of the Iraqi population. This task is broadly proportionate to the size of the UK's contribution to overall Coalition land forces …

"In parallel, and under the overall military command, the US plan to bring in a transitional administration[251] to co-ordinate immediate civil relief and humanitarian assistance. The transitional administration is making plans for allocating its limited resources, including provision of public sector salaries, on a nation wide, Coalition basis. There is no expectation that the UK would be asked to contribute any resources to anything other than security. So there is no suggestion that the UK would be left to foot the bill for the civil administration or the costs of humanitarian relief and reconstruction in any area."

691. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon reported that US planning remained "sensibly flexible" once the initial phase was over and "a major part of Iraq has been stabilised". They advised that US planning:

"… recognises that parts of Iraq will be more permissive than others and that security could well be provided through something other than sectors. It would be premature now to take a view on the merits of sectors for this stage. We are well placed to influence US thinking with a number of military officers and officials embedded within their military headquarters and in ITCA [International Transitional Civil Authority]. It would be helpful for them, and for military planners generally, to agree what our scale of effort should be in our medium-term contribution to Iraq."

692. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon advised that it would be necessary to reduce the UK military contribution "to nearer a third by no later than the autumn in order to avoid long-term damage to the Armed Forces" and to remain within current Defence Planning Assumptions: "If Ministers wanted us to, we would need decisions now so that we would be able to recommend what would have to give elsewhere." Scaling down to nearer a third would limit the UK contribution thereafter to "a maximum of around one brigade, a two-star headquarters and possibly a contribution to higher level command and control". They recommended telling the US now, for planning purposes, that this was the upper limit of the UK contribution.

693. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon also recorded that the ARRC [Allied Rapid Reaction Corps] featured in current CENTCOM planning as a multi-national headquarters that could play a role in post-conflict Iraq, but would be the subject of a separate paper (see Section 9.1).

694. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon ended with a section on "Setting the conditions for success". The conditions in which UK forces operated needed to be conducive to success. There needed to be a resolution authorising international activity in the post-conflict period; and:

"We should also let the US know the key importance of internationalising the security arrangements now so that we can reduce our commitment as set out above. And we would expect US support in building a wider Coalition to operate alongside our forces, allow us to draw down and eventually to provide us with an exit strategy."

695. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon concluded:

"We should be realistic about the limited prospects of our finding any genuine military capability to help us take this task on. New … Coalition partners are thin on the ground and, if the post-conflict phase does not go well, there will not be many nations who will be prepared or able to take part.

"And finally, we shall need to return to this issue once we are clear how the campaign is developing and look at our wider contribution in the round."

696. The Cabinet Office took a different position on whether it would be "premature" to take a view on the merits of sectors.

697. Before the joint minute from Mr Straw and Mr Hoon reached No.10, Mr Drummond advised Mr Rycroft that "we need Ministers to decide on sectors". The joint minute and sectors should be on the agenda for the Ad Hoc Meeting on Iraq (the "War Cabinet") on 20 March.[252]

698. Mr Drummond suggested that Ministers would want to agree the proposals in the joint minute:

"… provided they are satisfied that:

- UK Forces will be capable of providing security for an area around Basra including about 20 percent of Iraq's population.
- How long will we have this responsibility, and what is the exit strategy (benign security environment created, UK forces replaced by others). Will we be able to limit 'our area' to say Basra by the autumn, when we want to withdraw two-thirds of our troops?
- That the assertion that the transitional administration will handle civil administration including humanitarian reconstruction issues is correct: This is clearly the plan, but it must be doubtful that ORHA [the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance] will have the capacity, and therefore the troops on the ground may be called on to help. The UK certainly doesn't have civilian capacity to help govern 20 percent of Iraq."

699. The invasion of Iraq began overnight on 19/20 March 2003. Military operations during the invasion are described in Section 8.

700. Discussion of the issues raised in the joint minute from Mr Straw and Mr Hoon continued after the start of the invasion and is addressed in Sections 6.5 and 8.

701. The transition from conflict (Phase III) to post-conflict (Phase IV) military operations began immediately Coalition troops started to occupy Iraqi territory.

702. When that transition began, the Government had not taken firm decisions on the nature or duration of the UK's military commitment in post-conflict Iraq or on the extent of the UK's AOR. There had been no systematic analysis of the UK's military or civilian capacity to fulfil its likely obligations in the South in a range of circumstances, including:

- in the prolonged absence of an authorising resolution;
- in the absence of additional Coalition partners;
- in a hostile security environment with low levels of Iraqi consent; and
- over different timescales, in particular the medium and long term.

703. Each of those issues had been identified as a potential risk to UK strategic objectives in Iraq, but no detailed contingency plans or preparations were in place to mitigate those risks.

Guidance to the Armed Forces on the application of international humanitarian law

704. Guidance on the principles and application of international humanitarian law (IHL) was disseminated to those engaged at all levels in military action through a number of different mechanisms.

705. The CDS Directive to CJO on 18 March 2003, the 'Execute Directive to the Joint Commander for Operation TELIC', set out: the situation and legal basis for operations; the UK Government's political, strategic and military objectives; the concept of operations and detailed instructions for the mission.[253] It included a paragraph to the effect that all military operations, by UK forces and from UK territory, were to be conducted in accordance with the UK's Obligations under the Law of Armed Conflict (otherwise known as IHL) and UK national law.

706. The principles of IHL are set out in the Box earlier in this Section, 'Overview of international humanitarian law'.

707. The CDS Directive also contained a number of annexes, including a Targeting Directive and a draft Rules of Engagement (ROE) profile, although at the time of issue that had not yet been authorised by Ministers.

708. ROE are explained in the Box below.

[253] Directive CDS to CJO, 18 March 2003, 'Chief of Defence Staff Execute Directive to the Joint Commander Operation TELIC, Edition 2'.

Rules of Engagement

Rules of Engagement (ROE) are defined by the MOD as "directions for operational commands that set out the circumstances and limitations under which armed force may be applied by UK forces to achieve military objectives for the furtherance of UK government policy".[254] They are the means by which Ministers provide political direction and guidance to commanders on the application of force, within identified legal constraints, and they have specific Ministerial authority.

The ROE Compendium, Joint Service Publication 398, is divided into 21 "Rules", each of which addresses a different type of action (and each has a number of options ranging from prohibition, through qualified permissions, to unrestricted use of the capability).[255] The Compendium thus offers a menu of options from which a "ROE profile" can be selected (and, if necessary, amended) and authorised by Ministers for each operation.

An ROE profile is issued "as a set of parameters to inform commanders of the limits of constraint imposed or of freedom permitted when carrying out their assigned tasks … In passing orders, subordinate commanders at any level must always act within the ROE received but they are not bound to use the full extent of the permissions granted." The profile is also disseminated as appropriate to subordinate commanders.

The ROE profile for Operation TELIC, issued to the Joint Commander on 18 March 2003, rehearsed the legal basis relied upon by the UK in taking military action against Iraq and approved by the Attorney General.[256] It stated that Iraq "has failed to comply with the terms of Resolution 1441" and was "in further material breach of its obligations". The UK Government had concluded that military action was necessary to enforce Iraqi compliance with UNSCRs 678, 687 and 1441, and it was "therefore necessary" to remove the current regime from power "in order to create the conditions in which Iraq could be disarmed in accordance with its obligations".

All military operations were "to be limited to what is necessary to create those conditions"; and all military action was to be carried out in accordance with the Law of Armed Conflict, "which requires that at all stages the principles of distinction, proportionality, and military necessity are to be applied to the use of minimum force".

709. ROE for sites of religious or cultural significance are addressed later in this Section.

710. The content of the CDS Directive was further disseminated through Directives from the CJO to the National Contingent Commander (NCC) and to the three UK Contingent Commanders for Maritime, Land and Air.[257] The CJO Directive included copies of the ROE and Targeting Directives. Each Commander was reminded that he was to ensure that UK personnel complied with IHL and with national ROE.

[257] Directive Reith to Burridge, 19 March 2003, 'Joint Commander's Directive to the UK National Contingent Commander Operation TELIC'.

711. Each of the Directives contained a paragraph on Prisoners of War and detainees, reminding the recipient that they had a legal liability to acquaint themselves with the Geneva Conventions and Protocols, and that they were responsible for ensuring that all members of UK contingents and components complied with them. The Directive also referred to the requirement that any handling of Prisoners of War and detainees must be conducted strictly in accordance with the provisions of JWP-1-10, the Joint Warfare Publication on the handling of Prisoners of War.

712. In addition to the Directives issued to senior commanders, all personnel deployed were issued with an aide memoire on the Law of Armed Conflict, setting out the basic rules of the Law of Armed Conflict in simple language and in a portable form so all service personnel could carry them on their person.[258]

Guidance on targeting

713. On 13 March, the MOD Legal Adviser sought Lord Goldsmith's views on a draft Targeting Directive.

714. On 10 March, Mr Hoon wrote to Lord Goldsmith with a draft of the 'Disarming Iraq' paper which underpinned the choice of military tasks in the Government's draft campaign objectives.[259]

715. Mr Hoon also provided a second paper on targeting considerations. Potential targets were examined by category with a description of the intelligence surrounding it, its military necessity, targeting considerations and a suggested level to which authority would be delegated for decisions on attacks.

716. Delegation was based on an assessment of the likely civilian casualties, categorised as:

- … no civilian structures within […] metres of aim point; casualty estimate: LOW […].
- … assessment of whether any civilian objects in weapon effect radius; casualty estimate: LOW or MEDIUM […].
- … assessment using attack specific data; civilian casualty estimate: LOW; MEDIUM or HIGH […]."

717. One category was "Regime Leadership Targets", including Presidential Palaces, and comprised "secure facilities" from where regime leaders could exercise command and control. The targets were designed to prevent Saddam Hussein from governing Iraq and deny him command and control of the Iraqi Armed Forces, including use of WMD.

[259] Letter Hoon to Goldsmith, 10 March 2003, 'Iraq: Targeting Policy' attaching Paper 'Disarming Iraq' and Paper 'Operation TELIC: Targeting Consideration'.

718. The paper stated that, to be effective, all targets identified as being active, or historically used as regime command centres, must be disabled. Issues of proportionality were to be "judged against the proportionality of the entire set […] against the military necessity of achieving denial of WMD use".

719. Mr Hoon wrote that the targeting paper would "form part of the guidance to senior military commanders" to whom authority was delegated and that they would "take decisions based on the same target clearance process" that was used for Ministerial decisions on targeting and "on the basis of the legal advice available directly to them".

720. The paper informed, but was "not a substitute" for, the Targeting Directive, which formed part of the CDS Directive to the CJO for Op TELIC.

721. The paper stated that any delegation would be exercised in accordance with international law and with the benefit of legal advice. Mr Hoon wrote that agreement of the paper was "independent of any overall decision to authorise the use of force" and would have no impact on the UK's operational policy until such a decision was taken.

722. On 13 March 2003, an official sent AM Burridge a 2001 policy paper entitled 'Joint Targeting and Battle Damage Assessment for UK Forces', which was described as the "benchmark" for the process by which target authorisation and delegation should be conducted.[260]

723. The paper provided comprehensive guidance on definitions and principles of targeting, and contained detailed annexes on:

- legal considerations for "targeteers";
- guidance on calculation of collateral damage predictions and casualty estimates;
- process maps for decision-making;
- a pro forma targeting checklist; and
- guidance on Battle Damage Assessment.

724. The paper stated that IHL principles were:

- the need to be satisfied that the target was required to fulfil a military objective;
- that all reasonable steps had been taken to avoid and in all cases minimise collateral damage to civilians and civilian objects; and
- that the anticipated military advantage outweighed the expected collateral damage.

[260] Minute Harris to UK NCC, 13 March 2003, 'Targeting Lexicon' attaching Paper, 23 January 2001, 'Joint Targeting and Battle Damage Assessment for UK Forces'.

725. On 13 March, Mr Hemming wrote to Ms Adams with a draft of the Targeting Directive and the CDS Directive.[261] He wrote that some assumptions "may need adjustment" in the light of Lord Goldsmith's advice, and of Ministers' and Adm Boyce's views.

726. Mr Hemming wrote that, in particular, Mr Hoon had "not yet formed a view about the nature and extent of any delegation in relation to the targeting of key regime individuals". He added: "We expect to know his views shortly."

727. The Targeting Directive attached to Mr Hemming's letter set out a number of designated target sets that would not require the application of the UK's collateral damage estimation methodology, including a category of "Regime Leadership Personnel". That category included Saddam Hussein, Uday Hussein and Qusay Hussein.

728. Mr Hemming explained the process through which the Targeting Directive would work:

- Mr Hoon would approve the authorisation proposal.
- Adm Boyce would issue the Directive to Lt Gen Reith.
- Lt Gen Reith would pass authority to AM Burridge and sub-delegate authority to Air Vice Marshal Glenn Torpy, Air Contingent Commander, for particular categories of targets.

729. There were nine legal advisers integrated into the clearance process: three at each level for the relevant commander. Each lawyer had the ability to seek advice from further up the command chain and each legal office was overseen by the next legal office in the chain of command.

730. Mr Hemming wrote that the Targeting Directive was kept "under constant review" and targets authorised by AM Burridge or AVM Torpy would be reported to, and monitored by the DTIO on a daily basis. The DTIO would report to Adm Boyce and Ministers.

731. Lord Goldsmith emphasised that Mr Hoon would need to satisfy himself that adequate arrangements were in place to ensure that targets fully complied with the UK's obligations under IHL.

732. Lord Goldsmith also asked to receive daily reports on the targets attacked.

733. Ms Adams replied to Mr Hemming on 19 March with Lord Goldsmith's views in the light of a further briefing he had received on 17 March.[262]

---

[261] Letter Hemming to Adams, 13 March 2003, 'Iraq Targeting' attaching Paper 'Op TELIC – Targeting Directive'.
[262] Letter Adams to Hemming, 19 March 2003, 'Iraq: Targeting Directive'.

734. Lord Goldsmith said it was for Mr Hoon "to decide, on the basis of military and political advice, the extent to which he should delegate his authority to approve targets". However, "given the heightened scrutiny of the proposed campaign", Lord Goldsmith emphasised that Mr Hoon needed to satisfy himself that adequate arrangements were in place to ensure that targets approved under the delegated authority would fully comply with the UK's obligations under IHL.

735. Lord Goldsmith saw no legal objection in principle to delegation "provided that":

- the scope of the delegation was clearly defined (to protect the position of the relevant commander);
- clear instructions were given that the commander to whom authority was delegated was required to comply with IHL;
- Mr Hoon was satisfied that arrangements had been made to ensure that the commander to whom authority had been delegated had access both to adequate legal advice on IHL and technical advice from UK targeteers trained in the requirements of IHL; and
- the public record, "especially in Parliament", reflected the reality of the target clearance process and the fact of delegation.

736. Lord Goldsmith considered it "unwise" to delegate authority to attack targets that would raise "significant legal issues" or which were "politically sensitive". Those targets should remain subject to "appropriate political control".

737. Mr Hoon needed to be satisfied that arrangements were in place "to do everything feasible to avoid accidental harm to refuges, humanitarian convoys and other civilians". Lord Goldsmith stressed the need to ensure that attacks on airports or air fields did not impede the delivery of humanitarian assistance.

738. Ms Adams wrote that Lord Goldsmith had considered the process of approving targets under delegated authority, including the arrangements for the provision of legal advice, as explained in Mr Hemming's letter.

739. Lord Goldsmith believed that the proposed delegation in the Targeting Directive was "acceptable" subject to seven points where he suggested amendments or clarification.

740. One of those points was Lord Goldsmith's understanding that the Targeting Directive would be issued "for the time being without delegated authority to attack individual members of the Iraqi regime".

741. Such targets were likely to be "highly politically sensitive" and Mr Hoon should consider very carefully whether to delegate authority for those targets. If Mr Hoon were minded to do so, Lord Goldsmith requested further briefing on the considerations Mr Hoon believed would justify the targeting of specific individuals and recommended that Mr Straw was involved in any consideration of the issue.

742. Lord Goldsmith also asked to receive copies of the daily reports on targets attacked under delegated authority.

743. On 20 March, Lord Goldsmith advised Mr Hoon that he would need to consider whether an individual was a legitimate military target and proportionality in considering delegation of authority to attack Iraqi leadership targets.

744. On 20 March, Lord Goldsmith wrote to Mr Hoon with advice about the points he should address in considering whether to delegate authority to target particular individuals in the Iraqi regime.[263] The letter followed a meeting the previous evening between Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw.

745. Lord Goldsmith referred to his previous advice that Mr Hoon must be satisfied that adequate arrangements were in place to ensure that targets approved under the delegated authority complied with the UK's obligations under IHL. The delegation granted for the campaign was "extremely wide" and AM Burridge had "been granted authority to authorise attacks which, collectively, could cause significant civilian casualties".

746. Lord Goldsmith wrote:

> "While I recognise the need for some delegation, given the likely speed and extent of the campaign, I think it right to note that when we met in Jack [Straw]'s office in the House on 4 February I proposed a system under which we could have personally approved more targets identified for the first stage of the campaign. Given the degree of public interest in the IHL aspects of the campaign, you will of course have to be prepared to justify publicly and in Parliament the decision to delegate authority to approve targets in the event of any controversial incidents."

747. Lord Goldsmith set out two issues that Mr Hoon should consider in deciding whether to delegate authority for "individual leadership targets".

748. First, Mr Hoon must be satisfied that targeting a particular individual was a legitimate military objective under IHL. There were two circumstances in which individuals might be a legitimate target:

- if they were a member of the armed forces of Iraq within the meaning of Article 43 of the 1st Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions (AP1); or
- civilians "for such time as they take a direct part in the hostilities" under Article 5(13) of AP1.

749. The assessment of whether an individual fell under either category of being a legitimate target was "a question of fact to be made on the basis of the actual status, functions and activities of the person concerned". An individual's constitutional position could not by itself justify the conclusion that he was a member of the Armed Forces.

---

[263] Letter Goldsmith to Hoon, 20 March 2003, [untitled].

750. Lord Goldsmith said that in relation to the "three 'dramatic' targets", Mr Hoon would need to be satisfied that there was "sufficient evidence to justify the conclusion that they actively participate in military command and control". It was not enough "to assess that a person is likely, if certain circumstances occur, to take over military command and control". Article 51(3) AP1 did not allow for the pre-emptive targeting of civilians.

751. Second, having established that an individual was a legitimate target, Mr Hoon should consider "the question of proportionality".

752. The proportionality assessment would need to be considered at the time an attack was authorised, based on the place where the person was suspected to be and having regard to IHL.

753. Lord Goldsmith had "no doubt" that AM Burridge would consider carefully whether any proposed attack was proportionate:

> "But given the sensitivity of targeting individuals and the distinct possibility that an attack may not succeed (either because the intelligence was wrong or because the individual moved on before the strike took place), my advice is that you should consider carefully the possibility of giving guidance to the commander on how he is to assess proportionality in relation to these targets. You should bear in mind in this context the delegation proposed in your letter would give Air Marshal Burridge authority to authorise an attack on any of the three key individuals which would cause unlimited civilian casualties, no matter where the individual was located. So, for example, an attack on such an individual could be authorised without reference to Ministers if intelligence suggested he were in a school, hospital, mosque or densely populated residential area of Baghdad."

754. Lord Goldsmith advised that there were a number of points to consider in deciding what guidance Mr Hoon might give, including:

- What was "the concrete military advantage of killing each particular individual?"
- If Mr Hoon was prepared to contemplate the delegation of authority with a high estimate of casualties, was it feasible to place an upper limit on the casualties which might be caused by an attack?
- Since the extent of the military advantage was likely to change as the campaign progressed, it would be important to keep the delegation under constant and careful review.

755. Following further exchanges with Lord Goldsmith, Mr Hoon replied on 7 April confirming the delegations to AM Burridge and that they would be kept under constant review.

756. On 28 March, Dr Simon Cholerton, MOD Assistant Director Iraq (Secretariat), advised Mr Hoon on the considerations raised by Lord Goldsmith.[264] Dr Cholerton was to meet Mr Hoon later that day.

757. Dr Cholerton wrote that the MOD had previously thought it unlikely that time-sensitive intelligence on the whereabouts of key individuals would be available to enable a Coalition attack specifically directed at an individual. That position had changed since the campaign "began in earnest" and significant resources were being devoted to obtaining further intelligence. AM Burridge was "now very keen" to establish the UK position "as soon as possible".

758. Dr Cholerton advised that the MOD was satisfied that all named individuals were legitimate objectives under IHL; they were either members of the Iraqi Armed Forces or assessed to be taking a direct part in hostilities.

759. In providing guidance for assessing the proportionality of an attack, Dr Cholerton wrote that the MOD could place strict limits upon AM Burridge, such as an upper limit on the number of civilian casualties as suggested by Lord Goldsmith. He added:

> "Alternatively, we could remind the NCC [AM Burridge] in guidance that these factors should be taken into account in coming to any decision, and suggest an overall limit on civilian casualties of no more than […]."

760. Dr Cholerton assured Mr Hoon that the military justification for the targets would be reviewed on "a day by day basis" and he would be advised "as soon as there was any significant change with the position".

761. Later that day, Dr Cholerton sent a second piece of advice to Mr Hoon following their meeting with Air Cdre Heath and Mr Hemming.[265] Mr Hoon had asked how delegation could be varied according to the location of the individual.

762. Dr Cholerton set out an approach which discriminated between the categories of site where the target was believed to be located:

- "military location";
- "special location" – such as medical facilities, places of religious worship, historic and cultural sites, places of mass recreation and educational establishments "and other child centred facilities"; and
- "non-military location" – described as "any place or premises that are neither a military location or a special location".

[265] Minute Cholerton to APS/Secretary of State [MOD], 28 March 2003, 'Op TELIC: Targeting Individuals'.

763. Dr Cholerton recommended that Mr Hoon should delegate target clearance authority to AM Burridge:

- For Category A individuals in a military location with potentially HIGH numbers of civilian casualties […] or in a non-military location with potentially MEDIUM numbers of civilian casualties […].
- For Category B individuals in a military location with potentially MEDIUM numbers of civilian casualties or in a non-military location with potentially LOW numbers of civilian casualties […].

764. That delegation was on condition that Mr Hoon was "informed as soon as possible of the planned attack" and, if at all possible, before it took place.

765. The names of the individuals listed under either category would be provided separately.

766. Dr Cholerton recommended, where targets were "outside the above casualty ceilings" or were located at a "special location", that Mr Hoon delegated unlimited authority to AM Burridge. That was subject to the condition that Mr Hoon "must be informed" of his decision to attack in advance, and that the attack could only take place after AM Burridge had received confirmation that Mr Hoon had not overruled his decision.

767. In deciding whether or not to overrule AM Burridge's decision, Mr Hoon would be provided with details about the target's identity, location and an estimate on the number of civilian casualties.

768. If Mr Hoon was content, that approach would be set out in an annex to the CDS Directive and AM Burridge would not be able to delegate those responsibilities further.

769. Mr Hoon wrote to Lord Goldsmith on 29 March, setting out the approach recommended by Dr Cholerton.[266] On whether the named individuals were legitimate targets, Mr Hoon wrote:

> "I have satisfied myself that the individuals we were considering who are not formally members of the Iraqi Armed Forces are taking a direct part in hostilities by their senior functions in the Iraqi military command structure. Each of them is therefore in principle a legitimate target who may, subject to the proportionality test, be lawfully attacked."

770. An Annex was attached to the letter setting out the two categories of individuals. Category A was entitled "dramatic" and comprised Saddam, Qusay and Uday Hussain. Category B was entitled "significant" and listed four senior members of the Iraqi Armed Forces.

[266] Letter Hoon to Goldsmith, 29 March 2003, 'Iraq: Targeting Individuals' attaching Paper 'Iraq: Personalities'.

771. Lord Goldsmith responded on 30 March, highlighting areas where Mr Hoon's approach might require clarification.[267]

772. Lord Goldsmith noted that "military location" had been defined using the language of Article 52(2) AP1, which defined a "military objective", but without the second limb of that definition.[268] It was not therefore the case that all military locations would necessarily be military objectives. Lord Goldsmith added:

> "In any event, the location is not the objective; the objective is the individual. It is not obvious why as a matter of law there should be a higher (civilian) casualty limit for your category of "military location" as defined."

773. Lord Goldsmith asked if it had been intended that military locations could include dual-use facilities, which could fall under the current definition. If that was not the case, Lord Goldsmith recommended revising the definition to refer to locations which were considered part of the military infrastructure.

774. In relation to attacks on individuals believed to be in a location which was not itself a military objective, Lord Goldsmith wrote that Mr Hoon would need to be able to demonstrate that he was not making a civilian object, such as a school, the object of the attack: "Attacks must be limited to strictly military objectives (in this case the individual): see Additional Protocol 1, Article 52."

775. Lord Goldsmith noted paragraph 1979 of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) Commentary to Article 51(3), which suggested that the attacks must be carried out "with means which are not disproportionate in relation to the objective, but are suited to destroying only that objective". While it was "not entirely clear" what the commentary meant, it was indicative that "any decision to attack one of the individual leaders", if it caused substantial loss of civilian life, would be "legally and politically controversial", especially if the attack failed to take out the individual leader targeted.

776. Those points also had to be considered in addition to the requirement that "incidental civilian loss/damage should not be excessive in relation to the military advantage". Lord Goldsmith wrote that there could otherwise be a "strong risk" of the UK being accused of directing attacks at the civilian population and objects in breach of IHL. He advised that consideration applied "even more strongly in relation to any attacks which you might be asked to approve on individuals believed to be in 'special locations', since many of these locations are entitled to special protection under IHL and it may be prohibited to commit acts of hostility directed against them".

[267] Letter Goldsmith to Hoon, 30 March 2003, 'Iraq: Targeting Individuals'.
[268] Article 52(2) AP1 provides that: "In so far as objects are concerned, military objectives are limited to those objects which by their nature, location, purpose or use make an effective contribution to military action and whose total or partial destruction, capture or neutralization, in the circumstances ruling at the time, offers a definite military advantage."

777. On AM Burridge's authority outside the delegated limits, Lord Goldsmith wrote that Mr Hoon had "not delegated authority" because effectively AM Burridge could not proceed without Mr Hoon's approval. He added:

> "It does not seem entirely clear why you have not said this in terms, particularly given the need for clarity in the scope of any delegation in order to protect the position of the commander (which I emphasised in my earlier advice)."

778. Lord Goldsmith wrote that his understanding was that Mr Hoon would not seek his advice on the lawfulness of the attack, given the time-sensitive nature of such targets:

> "This is a matter for you. However, the judgement as to whether such attacks are lawful is likely to be a very difficult one to make. You will therefore wish to satisfy yourself that the legal position has been fully considered, bearing in mind that you could ultimately be held legally responsible for any such decision."

779. Mr Hoon replied on 7 April, confirming that he had decided to continue with the delegations as he had set out in his letter of 29 March but that he would keep them under constant review.[269]

780. Mr Hoon confirmed that he appreciated the distinction between military location and military objective, acknowledging that it could include dual-use facilities. He added that, in deciding on the delegation for Category A targets, he had considered that any high number of casualties at a military location "would be somewhat less controversial than at any other sort of location". He had hoped that this was in keeping with Lord Goldsmith's suggestion that he should consider placing limitations on the circumstances in which attacks might be authorised by considering their locations.

781. Mr Hoon wrote that the process whereby he could overrule AM Burridge's decisions was created because Mr Hoon could not take advice "in the normal way in the time available". He explained:

> "… I can overrule the National Contingent Commander's decision, but I cannot take it for him. Air Marshal Burridge only refers to me when he has already decided that he believes an attack should go ahead, and that it would be lawful based upon the legal advice available to him. As you are aware, we have already tested this mechanism and Brian Burridge is in no doubt about the position: the decision to attack remains his."

782. Mr Hoon concluded that the position remained different for matters outside AM Burridge's other delegations. Those would continue to be referred to Mr Hoon and he would take Lord Goldsmith's advice in the normal way.

---

[269] Letter Hoon to Goldsmith, 7 April 2003, 'Iraq: Targeting Individuals'.

783. In his post-operation report, AM Burrridge drew attention to the risks which might have arisen because directives on targeting and ROE were only issued shortly before operations began.

784. AM Burridge produced his post-operation report on 8 May 2003.[270] On lessons identified, he wrote that the MOD was "understandably reluctant to press for legal advice at the highest level on issues relating to the jus in bello before the Attorney General had advised on the jus ad bellum". The impact was "that a significant number of assumptions had to be made in the planning process which, had they been wrong, might have had a serious impact upon the conduct of the operation".

785. AM Burridge continued:

> "Several key directives (ROE and Targeting in particular) were issued only shortly before operations began, and certainly too late for safe implementation had they contained significant changes. While the traditional Law of Armed Conflict provided at least the hymn sheet, many questions remained outstanding, and some of the staffing issues (such as targeting delegations) betrayed a corporate difficulty in coming to terms with the prospect of war-fighting operations of this scale and character. Of particular importance was the juxtaposing of the ROE and Targeting Directives, which has probably never been more significant. The final ROE profile was received in my Headquarters two hours before operations commenced."

786. AM Burridge wrote that the UK's history over the last 12 years of "peacekeeping in relatively benign environments" had reduced its ability to "exercise military judgment guided only by the principles of LOAC". That had "manifested itself at every level, not only during the lengthy consideration of where targeting delegations should lie, but also at the tactical level where complaints of over-regulation were followed by complaints of insufficient guidance".

787. In the period leading up to operations, and even in the early stages of combat, AM Burridge stated that the questions asked across all three environments revealed that "the lack of further guidance was at first disconcerting". That lesson was "quickly and successfully learned, that responsibility should rest at the lowest level and that military commanders respond well to the freedoms given to them despite the attendant responsibilities".

788. Witnesses to the Inquiry emphasised the care which had been exercised in establishing the legal framework for military operations and the authority delegated to UK commanders.

---

[270] Report Burridge to CJO, 8 May 2003, 'NCC Operation Telic Hauldown Report: 07 Feb 03 – 08 May 03'.

789. Mr Bowen told the Inquiry that the MOD had "very clear rules" about undertaking operations and tasks within a legal framework.[271] He stated:

> "On every occasion there will be a legal opinion. On many occasions when we are operating in coalition with others, we find ourselves having to say to coalition partners, because we are closely engaged with them, that is not an acceptable target or this has to be done in a different way. That is a dialogue that goes on absolutely constantly and nobody in the Ministry of Defence has any difficulty about conveying that view, that legal view. And if it means that an operation or an undertaking has to be aborted, then that's what happens. There is no question of … saying 'Oh well, there is a greater good to be served by working with a coalition'. The answer is you don't do it because it is illegal, and that's not something that there is any chance taken on."

790. Speaking about its distinction to the US system, ACM Sir Brian Burridge set out the UK approach to targeting to the Inquiry:

> "We are absolutely doctrinally rigid. We use a template called strategy to task to target. So that we can show an audit trail, and are required to show an audit trail, from any target back to the strategy, thereby passing through all the aspects of the law of armed conflict such as discrimination, military necessity, et cetera. We are required to do that for our Law Officers in this country and we go through that process with every target."[272]

791. ACM Burridge said that US colleagues were "new to that as a discipline" but recognised its value because "it made the dialogue with the international community a little easier".

792. ACM Burridge added:

> " … in being the conscience, as it were, quite often there will be nuances even amongst the same operational team on the front bench at CENTCOM. So someone who is able to say actually, to me, it looks a bit like this – and I do remember on a couple of occasions saying 'General, that may look okay in Washington, but let me just tell you how it might look in London, or more so, Berlin or Paris or wherever.' It is not to say they needed reining in, it is just to get these nuances right they needed the input from someone perhaps whose perspective was a little different."

793. Lt Gen Sir Robert Fry told the Inquiry that Sir Brian Burridge had been able to influence the US "in terms of tactical engagement, targeting, the nitty gritty of operational combat on a regular basis".[273]

794. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that the campaign was "very much about creating an effect on the ground and making clear to the Iraqi people that our target was Saddam Hussein and his regime, rather than … a more conventional military attack on the country as a whole".[274]

795. Mr Hoon said that "in the early phase" he saw "pretty much every target that was going to be attacked" but did not know whether the attack would actually take place.[275]

796. Asked about lessons learned in relation to targeting, Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that he learned how accurate modern weapons were because he had initially been "fairly cautious" in his approach to targeting:

> "If I was told that there was a civilian facility alongside a military one, we had quite a debate. Saddam Hussein had some – at least 50 palaces located around the country that he would move from one to the other, and we had quite a debate about, if we hit one of these targets, what about the people who worked there? Were they necessarily part of the regime?"[276]

797. Lord Goldsmith told the Inquiry that he was satisfied with the assurances he received about targeting issues.[277] He described how he approached it with care, asked questions, and was satisfied about the basis of the decisions which had been made.

798. DSF1 told the Inquiry that AM Burridge had the same delegated authority for collateral damage as the US Secretary of Defense, and that the UK system had delegated "a lot more authority" to the NCC than the US had.[278]

799. Air Chief Marshal Sir Glenn Torpy, UK Air Contingent Commander in 2003, was asked if he had been satisfied with the delegations afforded to commanders for targeting. He told the Inquiry:

> "I think we made very significant progress in the run-up to the second Gulf War building on the experience we had had during the No-Fly Zones, the first Gulf War, and the Secretary of State … realised that the only way to maintain the tempo of the campaign was to delegate responsibility down to the lowest possible level. So I had a delegation. Brian Burridge had a delegation, and I thought it worked very effectively, and we cleared a lot of targets before the campaign even started."[279]

800. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "We had a differing view from the Americans and the Americans came more to our way in terms of the proportionality, legality, collateral damage and all those sorts of things. We shaped quite a lot of the American thinking in terms of how one should actually not trash the joint and try to leave something at the end for us to regenerate from; which was very much the view – the view of some Americans was you reduce it [sic] rubble and sort it out afterwards. That was not our view."[280]

Sites of religious and cultural significance

801. UK forces deployed in Iraq were given clear guidance about the need to preserve sites of religious or cultural significance.

802. The ROE profile for Op TELIC included clear guidance on the approach to sites of religious or cultural significance:

> "Offensive action must be directed only against military objectives … All feasible precautions are to be taken to avoid, and in any event to minimise, loss of civilian life and damage to civilian objects, particularly sites of religious or cultural significance and specially protected objects."[281]

803. The UK's legal obligations are set out in the Box below.

Legal obligations for the preservation of religious, historic and cultural property

Whilst the Law of Armed Conflict Provision (LOAC) has sought, generally, to mitigate the impact of armed conflict, specific rules have been agreed in international treaties with the object of protecting civilian property and objects with religious, historic or cultural significance in particular.

Both the 1907 Hague and the 1949 Geneva Conventions include such provision.

Article 27 of the 1907 Hague Convention IV (Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land), provides:

> "In sieges and bombardments all necessary steps must be taken to spare, as far as possible, buildings dedicated to religion, art, science, or charitable purposes, historic monuments, hospitals, and places where the sick and wounded are collected, provided they are not being used at the time for military purposes".[282]

[282] The Hague, 18 October 1907, 'Convention respecting the Laws and Custom of War on Land' and Annex 'Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land'.

Article 5 of The 1907 Hague Convention IX (Concerning Bombardment by Naval Forces in Time of War) provides:

> "In bombardments by naval forces all the necessary measures must be taken by the commander to spare as far as possible sacred edifices, buildings used for artistic purposes, historic monuments, hospitals and places where the sick or wounded are collected, on the understanding that they are not used at the same time for military purposes."

Further protection for historic monuments and places of worship is provided by Article 53 of First Protocol to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, which states that, without prejudice to the provisions of the Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict of 14 May 1954, and of other international instruments, it is prohibited:

"(a) to commit any acts of hostility directed against the historic monuments, works of art or places of worship which constitute the cultural or spiritual heritage of peoples;

(b) to use such objects in support of the military effort;

(c) to make such objects the object of reprisals."[283]

The First Protocol to the Geneva Conventions, according to its terms, entered into force on 7 December 1978. It was ratified by the UK on 28 January 1998.

In 1954 the terms of the Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict were agreed at an Intergovernmental Conference at the Hague ("the 1954 Hague Convention").

Under the terms of the Convention "Cultural property" was defined in Article 1 as comprising:

"(a) movable or immovable property of great importance to the cultural heritage of every people, such as monuments of architecture, art or history, whether religious or secular; archaeological sites; groups of buildings which, as a whole, are of historical or artistic interest; works of art; manuscripts, books, and other objects of artistic, historical or archaeological interest; as well as scientific collections and important collections of books or archives or of reproductions of [such] property…";

"(b) buildings whose main and effective purpose is to preserve or exhibit the movable cultural property defined in sub-paragraph (a) such as museums, large libraries and depositories of archives, and refuges intended to shelter, in the event of armed conflict, the movable cultural property defined in sub-paragraph (a);

(c) centres containing a large amount of cultural property as defined in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) …"

[283] Protocol Additional (1) to the Geneva Conventions, Article 53, 12 August 1949.

Parties to the 1954 Hague Convention agree:

- to make provision in times of peace for the protection of cultural property from the foreseeable effects of armed conflict;
- "to respect cultural property situated within their own territory as well as within the territory of other [parties to the Convention] by refraining from any use of the property and its immediate surroundings for purposes which are likely to expose it to destruction or damage in the event of armed conflict; and by refraining from any act of hostility directed against such property.

The 1954 Hague Convention imposes explicit obligations on Occupying Powers to support "competent national authorities" of an occupied country to safeguard and preserve its cultural property and where those competent national authorities are unable to do so, to take "as far as possible, and in close cooperation with those authorities, the most necessary measures of preservation".

The First Protocol to the 1954 Hague Convention, also agreed in 1954, contains provisions banning the export of cultural property from occupied territory and requiring the restitution of such property removed in contravention of the terms of the Convention.

The Second Protocol to the Convention contains further reinforcing provisions:

- Article 9 imposes, without prejudice to the provisions of the Convention, an express obligation to prohibit and prevent any illicit export or other removal or transfer of cultural property or unauthorised excavation of it;
- Article 15, includes provisions requiring parties to the Convention to impose criminal sanctions on persons who, in violation of the Convention and the Protocol, make cultural property the object of attack, use cultural property in support of military action, or cause extensive damage to, vandalise, or steal such property.

The 1954 Hague Convention and the First Protocol, according to their terms, entered into force on 7 August 1956. The Second Protocol entered into force in on 9 March 2004.

The UK, US and Iraq signed the Convention in 1954. Iraq ratified the treaty in 1967: the US in 2009. The UK has not, to date, ratified the Convention or the First Protocol and it has not signed the Second Protocol.

In 1998 the UK signed, and in 2002, ratified the 1970 UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property.

Parties to the 1970 UNESCO Convention agree to outlaw and take measures to prevent the unlawful import, export or transfer of ownership of cultural property.

On 30 December 2003, the UK enacted the Dealing in Cultural Objects (Offences) Act 2003, which made it an offence for any person to dishonestly deal in a cultural object 'tainted' as defined in the Act.

Under the terms of the Act, a cultural object is "tainted" if its removal or excavation from a building, structure or monument of historical, architectural or archaeological interest, (including any site comprising the remains of a building, structure or of any work, cave or excavation) constituted an offence under the law of the UK or any other country or territory.

804. On 18 February 2003, Mr George Lambrick, Director of the British Council for Archaeology, wrote to Dr Lewis Moonie, MOD Parliamentary Under Secretary of State and Minister for Veterans.[284] The letter was primarily about an ongoing maritime heritage issue but Mr Lambrick also raised concerns about the steps being taken to minimise potential damage to cultural sites in Iraq.

805. Mr Lambrick asked that the Government take steps to ratify the 1954 Hague Convention "as soon as possible and – at the very least – that Government should declare its commitment to abide by the provisions of the Convention in any forthcoming conflict".

806. Dr Moonie replied on 20 March, acknowledging that Mr Lambrick had also written to Mr Hoon along similar lines.[285]

807. Dr Moonie stated that the UK had signed but not yet ratified the 1954 Hague Convention or its protocols but hoped "to be in a position to do so soon". He added that although the Convention was yet to be ratified, the UK remained "fully committed to the protection of cultural property in time of armed conflict in accordance with international law".

808. Dr Moonie wrote:

> "In all our military planning, no matter the campaign, very careful attention is applied to ensure that we do all we can to minimise the risk of damage to all civilian sites and infrastructure. Of course damage to infrastructure inflicted by Iraqi forces cannot be ruled out, and it remains a priority concern for the Coalition to address this threat."

809. The Inquiry received a joint written submission from 13 heritage and cultural organisations on 17 February 2010 which addressed the problems faced by UK forces with respect to safeguarding the cultural heritage in Iraq.[286]

810. The submission stated that archaeological and cultural heritage experts had made numerous attempts to alert political and military personnel engaged in the anticipated invasion of Iraq "on both sides of the Atlantic" about the importance of cultural sites. It stated that "because no UK government department had taken responsibility for cultural heritage matters, most such letters were met with little or no response".

811. The submission stated that, on 2 February 2003, Dr Peter Stone, an archaeological and cultural heritage expert from the University of Newcastle, was approached informally by a serving officer in the Royal Navy seeking help to identify archaeological sites in Iraq that might require protection in the event of a conflict.

812. The MOD told the Inquiry that the Royal Navy officer was part of the Defence Intelligence Human Factors (DI-HF branch), which was part of DTIO.[287]

813. Professor Stone wrote later in his book, The Destruction of Cultural Heritage in Iraq, that he worked with Professor Roger Matthews, Director of the British School of Archaeology in Iraq, and Dr Neil Brodie, a specialist in the illicit trade of antiquities, to provide the MOD with an itemisation of the locations and details of the most important historic sites in Iraq.[288]

814. Professor Stone wrote that those sites were added to the British military maps for the conflict and British Military Field Orders identified them as places to be avoided. Professor Stone reported that the list was also drawn to the attention of Lord Goldsmith, who provided advice on the legality of potential targets, and was also shared with Coalition partners.

815. Mr Hoon told the House of Commons on 3 April 2003 that:

> "The Coalition is taking every precaution to avoid damage to the holy sites in Najaf and Karbala. By contrast, we know that Saddam Hussein has plans to damage these sites and blame the Coalition. Indeed his forces have used the site at Najaf as a defensive position, firing on United States forces, who commendably did not return the fire."[289]

816. On 12 April, Mr Jacques Chirac, the French President, and Mr Bashar al-Assad, the Syrian President, raised the looting of culturally significant sites, including museums and archaeological remains, in conversations with Mr Blair.[290] That is addressed in Section 9.1.

817. Mr Hoon's Private Office sent a paper to No.10 on 14 April in response to the concerns raised on 12 April about culturally significant sites.[291] It stated that both the US and the UK had stressed their commitment to protecting sites such as mosques, medical facilities, heritage sites and schools:

> "The Coalition consulted widely before the commencement of the military campaign, including with the archaeological community. A comprehensive list was established that included such Iraqi sites, and was designed to ensure that these were avoided as far as possible during the bombing campaign. We are confident that minimal damage has been done to Iraqi religious, cultural and archaeological sites a result of Coalition activity."

818. In September 2003, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (DCMS) produced a review of its involvement in the preparations for the Iraq conflict.[292]

819. Referring to Dr Stone's involvement in identifying sites of cultural heritage significance, the review stated that DCMS had only become aware of Dr Stone's work "after the event". DCMS recommended that:

> "In any future such cases DCMS should be consulted and kept in the loop since inevitably DCMS Ministers will be questioned subsequently about any damage which occurs to cultural heritage sites."

820. The review stated that "by and large" it seemed that instructions to avoid targeting historic sites and buildings were heeded by the Coalition Forces. The most important heritage sites were undamaged in the fighting and their special status appeared to have been respected.

821. The Inquiry has not addressed individual targeting decisions.

822. Robust systems and processes were put in place for taking targeting decisions, and targeting decisions were properly supported by legal advice.

823. Ministers were concerned about the consequences of the air campaign and the selection of targets and were proactive in their review of the guidance.

824. The final versions of Directives and ROE were sent at a very late stage in the preparations for military operations, but the Inquiry is satisfied that comprehensive guidance was available to those taking decisions.

825. International humanitarian law principles and considerations were properly emphasised, and explained in easily comprehensible terms.

826. There was consultation with archaeological experts (in particular Professor Stone), but the Inquiry questions whether the approach taken by the MOD to secure expert advice in advance of the conflict could be said to constitute "wide consultation". It considers that DCMS should have been asked for advice.

Conclusions 106

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses:

- the arrangements made to provide equipment to forces deploying for operations in Iraq;
- difficulties in the provision of Combat Identification (Combat ID), ammunition, Enhanced Combat Body Armour (ECBA), desert clothing, and equipment to protect against a chemical or biological attack; and
- asset tracking.

2. This Section does not address:

- the UK's military planning for the invasion of Iraq, which is addressed in Sections 6.1 and 6.2;
- the background to decisions made by the Treasury on equipment and Urgent Operational Requirement (UOR) funding, which is described in Section 13.1; and
- assessments of Iraq's capabilities and intent. Intelligence assessments relevant to military planning are addressed in Section 6.2 and the UK's assessment of Iraq's WMD programmes in Sections 4.1 to 4.4.

Key findings

- The decisions taken between mid-December 2002 and mid-January 2003 to increase combat forces and bring forward the date on which UK forces might participate in combat operations compressed the timescales available for preparation.
- The achievements made in preparing the forces in the time available were very considerable, but the deployment of forces more quickly than anticipated in the Defence Planning Assumptions meant that there were some serious equipment shortfalls when conflict began.
- Those shortfalls were exacerbated by the lack of an effective asset tracking system, a lesson from previous operations and exercises that the Ministry of Defence (MOD) had identified but not adequately addressed.
- Ministers were not fully aware of the risks inherent in the decisions and the MOD and Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) were not fully aware of the situation on the ground during the conflict.

Planning and readiness for expeditionary operations

3. The Armed Forces' capacity to deploy and sustain expeditionary operations was determined by decisions in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR).

4. The SDR identified a major regional crisis, including in the Gulf, as the most demanding scenario against which the UK should plan for military operations.

5. The SDR set out the UK's "defence requirements in the period to 2015".[1] That included the UK's defence priorities, the scenarios in which the Government envisaged deploying military forces, and what this meant for the UK's military force structure.

6. The SDR explained that, "in the post Cold War world", there was a greater need for the Armed Forces to build an expeditionary capability because "we must be prepared to go to the crisis, rather than have the crisis come to us".

7. A supporting essay to the SDR about future military capabilities listed those it considered "increasingly important", including:

- command, control, communications and computers and Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR);
- transport or lift capabilities because of "the trend towards force projections operations, for which we may need to deploy very rapidly in order to be successful";
- combat service support (logistics, equipment and medical support), which was "key to sustaining deployed operations, particularly those of significant duration"; and
- "protection against chemical and biological weapons" which was described as critically important in some of the regions in which we are likely to have to operate, such as the Gulf".[2]

8. The SDR was explicit in envisaging the UK operating in a number of areas, including the Gulf region. It stated:

> "We have particularly important national interests and close friendships in the Gulf … There are already significant sources of instability in these regions – including the continuing threat represented by Saddam Hussein's Iraq … These dangers seem unlikely to diminish and may grow. Many of our Allies and Partners have similar important interests and friendships in these areas. We would therefore expect to work with them in responding to any future crises."[3]

9. The SDR continued:

> "Outside Europe, the greatest risks to our national economic and political interest – and probably to international stability – will remain in the Gulf … this Mission may involve major combat operations … Such operations also impose demanding requirements, for example, in relation to strategic transport for deployment and supply, and to command and control … In operational terms, the most demanding individual scenario against which we must now plan is no longer all-out war in Europe but a major regional crisis involving our national interest, perhaps on NATO's periphery or in the Gulf."

10. The SDR acknowledged that "major equipments take years to develop".

11. While the SDR identified no definitive timescales for its proposed changes, the MOD did publish a series of targets in December 1998 as part of its Public Service Agreement for 1999 to 2002.[4] Targets included achieving a "Full Joint Rapid Reaction Forces Capability by October 2001" and to "achieve reductions in book value of stocks of non-munitions of £2.2bn by April 2001".

12. The Public Service Agreement recognised that the plans set out in the SDR would "require substantial investment to improve inherited areas of weakness measured against future operational needs and to fund a continuing major equipment modernisation programme". The resources necessary to achieve this would be found "from making savings from rationalisation in other areas, a continuing programme of efficiency improvements and smarter procurement".

13. Decisions on the allocation of resources to the MOD, and within the MOD, were underpinned by a set of Defence Planning Assumptions (DPAs) about the totality of the commitments that the MOD would expect to meet and sustain at any one time and the time needed to prepare for operations.

14. The ability of the UK to deploy and sustain forces on operations was determined by the size of the Armed Forces and the readiness of units within the force structure. That is still the case today.

15. Decisions on those issues and the allocation of resources to and within the MOD were based on the DPAs. DPAs were developed by the MOD to convert policy into detailed guidance that could be used by military planners.[5] The DPAs outlined the levels of activity the Armed Forces were expected to be able to undertake, and the contexts in which they were expected to operate. They were (and are) used to identify and resource the planned force structure, capabilities and equipment of the Armed Forces.

16. The SDR "set some broad benchmarks for the scale of our planning" and said that the UK should be able to:

" – respond to a major international crisis which might require a military effort and combat operations of a similar scale and duration to the Gulf War when we deployed an armoured division, 26 major warships and over 80 combat aircraft.

"or

[4] Public Services for the Future: Modernisation, Reform, Accountability, December 1998, Cm 4181.

" – undertake a more extended deployment on a lesser scale (as over the last few years in Bosnia) while retaining the ability to mount a second substantial deployment – which might involve a combat brigade and appropriate naval and air forces – if this were made necessary by a second crisis. We would not, however, expect both deployments to involve war-fighting or to maintain them simultaneously for longer than six months."

17. The DPAs are addressed in more detail in Section 6.1.

18. The 'Defence Strategic Plan' was a confidential MOD document which included greater detail than was published in the SDR report.[6] The Plan identified some specific readiness criteria in relation to regional conflict outside NATO:

"… we need to maintain the ability to respond within short warning times to an Iraqi threat, and to build up forces thereafter. This again requires us to hold capabilities needed to mount a medium scale deployment at high readiness (30 days) … For a large scale deployment we need to plan on a framework division being ready within 90 days."

Scales of military operation

To inform the DPAs, the scales of military effort, over and above those required for day-to-day commitments, were defined in the SDR as:

- small scale: "a deployment of battalion size or equivalent";
- medium scale: "deployments of brigade size or equivalent", such as the UK's contribution to Bosnia in the mid-1990s;
- large scale: "deployments of division size or equivalent", such as the UK's contribution to the 1991 Gulf Conflict; and
- very large scale and full scale: forces needed "to meet significant aggression against an Ally", the difference between the two reflected the time available for preparation – "warning time" – and the size of the threat.[7]

Other factors to be considered included:

- endurance – the likely duration of any operation and the potential need to sustain a deployment for an indefinite period; and
- concurrency – the number of operations of a given scale of effort and duration that could be sustained by the force structure.

More detail on the planning assumptions for the scales of military operation is provided in Section 6.1.

Testing the UK's expeditionary capability: lessons learned?

19. The first Gulf Conflict had highlighted inadequacies in the UK's asset tracking and Combat ID equipment.

20. The UK deployed an armoured division during the Gulf Conflict in 1991, Operation GRANBY, comprising two combat brigades: 4 Brigade and 7 Armoured Brigade.[8]

21. The MOD identified a number of lessons relating to equipment following the 1991 Gulf Conflict in its Statement on the Defence Estimates in 1992.[9] It found that deficiencies in the reliability of older equipment had "considerable implications" for the UK's operational capability, and were "only overcome by a disproportionate application of maintenance effort and deployment of spares".

22. The MOD also found that the volume of stores and equipment that had to be moved to theatre, and the compressed timescales involved, led to problems with the visibility of stockholdings and items in transit.[10] A temporary system was devised for tracking operationally vital items but the MOD was examining "improved arrangements for the future". The system for allocating priorities in the movement of freight was "overloaded by the volume of high priority items" and a review had been commissioned to learn the lessons from the operation.

23. A secure and effective battlefield electronic identification system, which later became known as Combat ID,[11] "did not exist" during Op GRANBY. While practical steps were taken to avoid engagements between Coalition Forces, a number of incidents occurred.

24. The MOD stated that the UK was working with the US "to identify technical and operational options" to minimise the risk of further incidents. The Defence Research Agency was "also undertaking a research programme aimed at assessing both short term solutions and options for the longer term".

25. Concerns about progress on asset tracking systems were raised in Public Accounts Committee reports in 1993, 1997 and 2000.

26. A Public Accounts Committee report in 1993 on the first Gulf Conflict stated that it was "concerned the Department did not have a sound system for tracking freight".[12]

[11] Combat ID enables military forces to distinguish friend from foe during operations, minimising the risk of accidental destruction of friendly or allied forces, otherwise known as fratricide or Blue-on-Blue incidents. The systems and procedures in place must be interoperable with those used by allied forces.
[12] Twenty-sixth Report from the Committee of Public Accounts, Session 1993-94, Ministry of Defence: Movements of Personnel, Equipment and Stores to and from the Gulf, HC 393, paras 18-19.

27. The Public Accounts Committee stated:

> "We consider it unacceptable that the lack of elementary tracking led to some operationally critical items being 'lost to view', and note that 228 aircraft pallets worth £680,000 went missing completely during GRANBY. The failure to be able to locate some equipment also led to some duplicate requisitioning.
> "We stress the importance of the Department taking urgent action to improve their management information systems relating to movements … we recommend that the Department have regard to the best systems in operation in the commercial sector, in particular those used for keeping track of assets."

28. In 1997, the Public Accounts Committee report on the UK's operations in the former Yugoslavia found that it was "unsatisfactory" that asset tracking had "again proved to be a problem", despite assurances given by the MOD following the first Gulf Conflict.[13]

29. The Committee added:

> "We suggest that some of the problems with the Department's asset tracking systems, particularly the strain on communications systems and the large volumes of data, could be regarded as foreseeable consequences of an operational environment. We note that the Department are considering what systems might be appropriate for the future. We recommend that, in doing this, they give particular attention to ensuring that they have systems robust enough to deal with operational conditions; it is at such times that large quantities of equipment and stores tend to be moving around, and it becomes easy to lose sight of them."

30. The Public Accounts Committee reported on operations in the former Yugoslavia again in 2000 and found that:

> "The Department has little capacity to monitor the supply chain's performance in theatre, nor the condition and reliability of equipments in theatre. The Department do not expect to have IT systems fully operating to provide such information until 2003 …"[14]

31. A military exercise in 2001 found that British equipment did not work well in hot and dusty conditions and needed to be improved, given the UK's focus on expeditionary operations.

32. The exercise also identified difficulties with clothing, boots and asset tracking.

33. In October 2001, the MOD conducted Exercise Saif Sareea II in Oman.[15] The exercise, which involved around 22,500 British Armed Forces personnel from all three services, aimed to test the Armed Forces' ability to conduct a medium scale operation over long distances, in the post-SDR expeditionary force structure. It tested the principle that the Joint Rapid Reaction Forces should be ready to conduct expeditionary operations in any area of the world at short notice.

34. In August 2002, the National Audit Office (NAO) published a report into the exercise, which included a number of recommendations and identified a number of problems to be addressed.[16]

35. Much equipment performed well, including Warrior Armoured Fighting Vehicles (AFVs) and the C17 strategic lift aircraft.

36. As a result of pre-exercise reconnaissance, 4 Armoured Brigade had made a number of recommendations for the modification of equipment, including 'desertisation'[17] of Challenger 2 tanks. Despite the recommendation, the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) directed that the modifications would not be required given the predicted climatic conditions in Oman.

37. During the exercise, a number of Challenger 2 tanks experienced difficulties relating to the hot and dusty conditions. As a result, a much larger quantity of spare parts was required and equipment availability was lower than expected.

38. Sand filters were fitted to the engines of Lynx and Chinook helicopters, as a result of lessons learned from the 1991 Gulf Conflict. Overall helicopter availability, however, was 55 percent.

39. The MOD had insufficient desert combat suits and desert boots for all personnel. As a result, desert-specific clothing was issued only to personnel who would be in theatre for an extended period. Standard issue boots were unsuitable for the task; 4 Armoured Brigade's post-exercise report cited melting boots and foot rot as "a major issue".

40. The NAO reported that asset tracking systems remained weak. The Visibility In Transit Asset Logging (VITAL) system, introduced as a result of NAO recommendations following the first Gulf Conflict, had been operating "at 500 percent of its originally planned capacity" by 2001. It was slow during the exercise, taking 15 minutes to find the contents of a single ISO container. As VITAL was not available at the point of exiting the UK, there was no visibility of an item until it arrived in theatre.

[17] Modifications to equipment that enable it to operate in desert conditions.

41. On learning lessons, the NAO report stated:

> "Some lessons identified during previous operations were re-learned, which illustrated the tendency that skills learned on medium size operations such as the Gulf War dissipate over time as people move on. There is a strong argument that exercises of the size of Saif Sareea need to be conducted regularly in order to keep skills and experience up to date and to check that lessons previously identified have been implemented."

42. In March 2002, the NAO considered the MOD's progress in implementing a Combat ID strategy following the 1998 SDR.

43. A report by the NAO on 7 March 2002 acknowledged the complexities surrounding Combat ID and recognised that the MOD had developed a clear strategy for finding a solution.[18]

44. The NAO did find, however, that there was more that could be done to move the issue forward. Amongst the projects it identified as a way of enhancing Combat ID work was Battlefield Target Identification (BTID). The NAO wrote that the MOD had spent £7m over the last 10 years on researching land solutions to Combat ID and there had been a successful trial of a BTID prototype in September 2001. Despite that, a proposal to fit an armoured brigade with BTID had not passed an Initial Gate Business Case.[19]

45. The MOD was confident that it would have integrated BTID equipment ready to participate in a US-led NATO demonstration in September 2005. That would provide an opportunity to show if its solution was compliant with the relevant NATO Standardisation Agreement. The MOD was confident that its solution was "already compliant".

46. A meeting in May 2002 highlighted concerns about whether the readiness levels specified in the SDR could be met.

47. On 21 May, Mr Blair attended a meeting with the Chiefs of Staff, Mr Geoff Hoon, Defence Secretary, and Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Secretary, to discuss current operations and resources.[20]

48. The note of the meeting recorded that Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, the Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), said that the Armed Forces had "been under-resourced since the SDR" and they "could not continue to make do". From "each operation there was a lengthening list of inadequacies". In August the MOD "would reach a cliff edge, having to collapse operational capability to stay in budget".

[19] The procurement process, including the phases for business cases, is explained in Section 14.1.
[20] Note Rycroft, 21 May 2002, 'Prime Minister's Meeting with Chiefs of Staff'.

49. Adm Boyce also said that SDR readiness levels were not being met:

> "For instance, a division should be capable of being produced in 90 days[21] but it would now be difficult to produce two thirds of a division in 6 months, with consequences on Iraq (US lead time by contrast would be 3 months)."

50. In addition, "resources were needed for new investment to secure information-dominance for the war on terrorism/asymmetric threats".

51. Mr Hoon described the three levels of funding that were required:

> "(1) to deliver the SDR assumptions;
>
> (2) to modernise equipment/training to deliver a modern Armed Forces; and
> (3) to get the capabilities right post-11 September."

52. Sir Kevin "said the priority was filling gaps in capabilities".

53. In July 2002, the MOD published a follow-up to the 1998 SDR which confirmed that the shift towards expeditionary operations was likely to become more pronounced.

54. In July 2002, the MOD published The Strategic Defence Review: A New Chapter; an update on the SDR's progress and a consideration of the "UK's defence posture and plans" in light of the 9/11 attacks.[22]

55. The MOD stated it was likely that the trend towards expeditionary operations would "become even more pronounced". While the core regions identified in the SDR – Europe, the Gulf and the Mediterranean – were likely to remain "the primary focus" of UK interests, it was "increasingly clear that a coherent and effective campaign against international terrorism – and indeed other contingencies – may require engagement further afield more often than perhaps we had previously assumed".

56. On the Armed Forces' ability to conduct multiple, simultaneous operations, the MOD wrote:

> "The capability of our forces is strained not just by the scale of operations, but by the number of simultaneous or near-simultaneous operations. Since the SDR we have assumed that we should plan to be able to undertake either a single major operation (of a similar scale and duration to our contribution to the Gulf War in 1990-91), or undertake a more extended overseas deployment on a lesser scale (as in the mid-1990s in Bosnia), while retaining the ability to mount a second substantial deployment – which might involve a combat brigade and appropriate naval and air forces – if this were made necessary by a second crisis. We would not, however, expect both deployments to involve war-fighting or to maintain them simultaneously for longer than 6 months."

57. The MOD had "analysed a set of plausible and realistic scenarios" to assess the demands potentially faced by the UK overseas. That work had taken account of lessons learned from operations, including in Afghanistan. The MOD recognised that the particular scenarios it had envisaged might not be "replicated precisely in real life", but they did allow the MOD to "draw general conclusions about the capabilities that may be particularly important".

The UK's expeditionary capability by 2002

58. By 2002, UK forces had not yet acquired the equipment envisaged by the SDR.

59. Mr Hoon's evidence to the Inquiry suggested that the time needed to deliver the changes envisaged by the SDR and the New Chapter was appreciated:

> "[We] were moving the emphasis of the Ministry of Defence away from the kind of static territorial defence of the Cold War period to a much more flexible … expeditionary capability. But that sounds quite straightforward to describe. It actually … requires massive adjustments in capabilities."[23]

60. Asked if the SDR had "worked itself through satisfactorily" by the time of the invasion, Lord Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff from May 2003 to April 2006 said "No."[24] Asked to expand on that, Lord Walker stated that continuously operating outside the DPAs, and a shortfall in funding, were key reasons.

61. Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Equipment Capability) (DCDS(EC)) from April 2002 to May 2003, told the Inquiry that some progress towards delivering the capabilities to support this expeditionary capability had been made by 2002 but the process was not complete: "We had moved some way, but we still had a fair distance to go."[25]

62. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that the SDR contained "big challenges for the Armed Forces and there were such a large number of actions for implementation for the SDR that it was inevitably going to take time to work through".[26]

63. Lieutenant General Sir Robert Fulton, who succeeded ACM Stirrup as DCDS(EC), told the Inquiry:

> "My take on it would be that we went to Iraq with our Cold War capability, that there simply was not time between 1998 and 2002 to re-orientate a Capital Equipment Programme that stretched for 20 years."[27]

64. Lt Gen Fulton added:

> "… it was not possible in the time that I saw it from the time I was first engaged in the equipment area to be able to turn a Cold War-equipped military into a flexible, deployable, sustainable military within the life of the equipment plan."[28]

Equipment preparations for the invasion (2002 to 2003)

Planning begins

65. The MOD's initial thinking on options for military operations in Iraq focused on the deployment of an Army division. That would require a minimum of six months' lead time and ideally longer.

66. Consideration of the UK's options in the event of a US-led military invasion of Iraq began at the end of February 2002. That is addressed in detail in Section 6.1.

67. This Section considers the arrangements made for providing equipment to forces as part of the planning process for potential operations in Iraq.

68. On 6 March 2002, the Chiefs of Staff were informed that Iraq was "sliding rapidly up the scale of interest and a degree of strategic planning was essential at some point in the near future, given the lead times necessary to shape pol/mil thinking effectively".[29]

69. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that Air Chief Marshal Sir Anthony Bagnall, Vice Chief of the Defence Staff, who was chairing the meeting in CDS' absence, should "refresh" work on Urgent Operational Requirements (UORs)[30] to ensure that it was not left "too late".

70. On 3 April, Sir Kevin Tebbit asked Mr Trevor Woolley, MOD Director General Resources and Plans (DGRP), "just by way of prudent contingency planning you understand … what a deployment to Iraq of a Division minus (25-30,000 with enablers) would do to our SDR force structure and concurrency assumptions, assuming all other operations remained more or less as they are".[31] Sir Kevin asked Mr Woolley not to share the work with the Commitments area of the MOD.

71. On 8 April, following Mr Blair's talks with President Bush at Crawford, Texas (see Section 3.2), Mr Hoon instructed the MOD to undertake work on "the specific equipment requirements (UORs)" necessary to deliver the military options being considered as part of the initial discussions about possible UK participation in military action against Iraq.[32] This was because "equipment – rather than personnel – was likely to be on the critical path in terms of deployment timelines".

72. Following consultation with Sir Kevin Tebbit and Adm Boyce, Mr Simon Webb, MOD Policy Director, sent Mr Hoon a think piece entitled 'Bush and the War on Terrorism' on 12 April.[33] Mr Webb's minute provided formal advice on the possible scale of any UK military contribution and included a draft letter to Mr Blair.

73. Setting out the MOD's thinking on military issues, Mr Webb wrote:

- "The fundamental building block for a major US ground force operation is a division. Only on that scale (requiring 3 brigades as our planning base) would UK have significant influence over how the operation was developed and conducted: an independent brigade does not fit into the US structure and would in any case need substantial divisional scale enablers in order to be safe for high intensity operations …
- "Such a deployment would be at the extreme end of the UK's capacity after the SDR: it was the scenario against which the 'large' option was scaled."
- The UK "should seek only to make a respectable large contribution that we can sustain properly …"

74. On 9 May, Sir Kevin Tebbit was sent the first assessment of equipment lead times for potential operations in Iraq in response to his 3 April request.[34] The assessment noted that a minimum of six months lead time was "necessary to fill essential capability gaps before we could launch a Gulf War scale operation against Iraq". It also noted that the six months lead time was measured from "the point at which an unambiguous authorisation to spend the necessary money is given".

75. The MOD's assessment identified several "showstopping" equipment capability deficiencies with "the timelines for rectifying them", including:

- The desert environment modifications to the Challenger 2 tank would take six months, with a further three if air filtration was added.
- Chemical protection measures would require six months and biological protection measures would require between nine and 12 months.
- Aircraft secure communications.

- Support helicopters were identified as “a clear pinch point”. The eight Chinook Mk3 ordered in 1995 but not available for use would not be ready for another two years (see Box, ‘The eight modified Chinooks’, in Section 14.1).
- The UK had only enough tented accommodation for “some 2,500 personnel”. The remainder of the stock was in use on other operations in Afghanistan, the Balkans and Oman. Acquiring more was identified as a high priority.

76. The assessment was sent to Adm Boyce and a limited number of senior MOD officials and military officers.

77. Adm Boyce instructed that the advice should be circulated to the Single Service Chiefs, who were not on the original distribution.[35]

78. In response to a suggestion from his Private Office that the work be shared with the Chief of Defence Logistics, Adm Boyce wrote: “No, not yet.”[36]

79. Shortly afterwards, Sir Kevin Tebbit’s Private Secretary sent a minute to Mr Webb and Lieutenant General Sir Anthony Pigott, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments) (DCDS(C)), proposing a limited core distribution list for Iraq contingency planning.[37] He wrote: “There may be occasions when you (or indeed the Spending Review team) feel that an even more limited distribution should apply but I would hope this would not be frequent.”

80. The list did not include the Defence Logistics Organisation (DLO) or the Defence Procurement Agency (DPA). Neither organisation had been consulted on the 9 May advice.

81. The MOD established an informal inter-departmental group of senior officials for planning purposes, which became known as the “Pigott Group”. The Pigott Group was supported by a Strategic Planning Group (SPG) and both are described in Section 6.1.

82. Lt Gen Pigott sent Mr Hoon an update on the SPG’s work on 10 May.[38] Lt Gen Pigott stated:

> “Any thinking we do about joining the US in military operations against the Iraqi regime needs to be informed by our thinking in two key areas: the impact of potential courses of action open to a coalition and the capability the UK might contribute to such a coalition.”

83. Work had been commissioned on the capabilities the UK might aim to provide within periods of three to four and six to eight months, setting out the key decision and deployment points. Lt Gen Pigott suggested that this could lead to "a note to the Prime Minister setting out these and the financial implications of taking contingency action now".

84. General Sir Michael Walker was Chief of the General Staff (CGS) from 2000 to February 2003. His Private Office wrote to the Chiefs of Staff Secretariat on 13 June, referring to the 9 May advice on equipment lead times.[39] He stated that the advice highlighted "just a few of several areas where key deficiencies exist" if a medium or large scale operation were to be undertaken. Other areas included battlefield helicopters, the issue of stocks and the supply of items such as ammunition. Gen Walker would elaborate on these other areas at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 18 June.[40]

85. The minutes from the weekly Chiefs of Staff meeting do not record any reference to a discussion on equipment planning for Iraq.[41]

86. As work on military options in the MOD progressed, it was recognised that, if a large scale option was pursued, not all of the essential UOR equipment required for operations in the Gulf could be procured and fitted within six months.

87. A paper produced by the SPG on 24 May, 'Contingency Thinking: Force Generation and Deployment for the Gulf', was sent to the Chiefs of Staff and a limited number of named MOD addressees.[42]

88. The SPG identified a number of key assumptions that included:

- Operations would not commence before autumn 2002.
- Decisions would not be taken incrementally because that would "add to timelines by making force generation increasingly complex and costly".
- Enhancements would be needed to enable units to operate in the Gulf. That would expose preparations from an early stage given the significant number of contracts that would be required with industry.

89. Three broad levels of effort in line with the MOD's planning assumptions were examined:

- the maximum the UK could provide (a large scale contribution);
- a "credible" medium scale package; and
- a small scale package.

90. Reflecting the UK's existing military commitments and the most recent MOD budgetary planning round, the SPG advised that the UK could realistically produce a "maximum contribution … at the lower end of large scale … medium scale (minus) for maritime (about 10 major warships), and medium scale for air (about 60 fast jets)".

91. The force mix might not be evenly balanced (in terms of scale of effort) across the sea, land and air environments; but the UK would "always seek to achieve strategic influence across the three environments such that UK influence is in place throughout the joint environment".

92. Lt Gen Pigott presented the findings from the SPG analysis to Mr Hoon on 24 May.[43] He advised that "until there is greater visibility and clarity of US intent our work on potential approaches to an Iraq campaign remains speculative; this work is advancing but will lack definition until we engage with the US".

93. Three broad options ("force packages") had been identified, which were "illustrative of the maximum potential … contribution" that the UK might be able to make available for any offensive operations within given time periods:

a. Three months' warning: Deployment of medium scale joint force – 10 warships including a carrier, an armoured brigade, about 60 fast jets and associated support. That was described as at risk of being a "token contribution". The cost, including "essential" UORs for equipping the force was estimated at £500m to £800m.
b. Six months' warning: Deployment of a large scale, war-fighting force in addition to the medium scale maritime and air components, which would be "comparable to the 1990/1991 conflict" and "confer significant influence on the control of the campaign". Though the land element would be "capable of limited independent war-fighting", there would be sustainability issues. Large numbers of vehicles could become "unserviceable" and there would be reliance on others to supply ammunition and other stock. There would not be enough time for "the procurement and fitting of all UOR equipment considered to be essential for operations in the Gulf (such as the desertisation of all armoured vehicles)", which would generate further operational risks and result in the degradation of the "credibility of the UK's contribution as [the] campaign unfolded". That option would require the call out of 5,000-10,000 Reservists and cost £800m to £1.1bn. A decision would need to be taken immediately for operations to begin in December 2002.
c. Nine months' warning: The force package would be the same as (b) but would be better prepared and carry fewer risks, as a result of additional training and equipment. The package would have "enough capability and sustainability to be a credible contribution to any coalition". The cost would be £100m higher because of a greater volume of UORs.

94. The deployment and campaign costs would be additional to the costs identified for each option.

[43] Minute DCDS(C) to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 24 May 2002, 'Iraq'.

95. Lt Gen Pigott explained that current commitments in Afghanistan[44] and subsequent recovery and deployment times would "limit the UK's ability to contribute significantly to any offensive operations in the region until November at the earliest".

96. If it was "likely that the UK would wish to contribute" to US action "when the call came", there was a "need to consider what action" was needed "now to reduce risks and as far as possible readiness times".

97. Mr Hoon was asked to agree further work to refine contingency planning, to be submitted in mid-June; and informed that "proper preparations" would require wider involvement in the MOD and discreet approaches to industry.

98. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 31 May, explaining that UK contingency planning had concluded that, for the UK to have influence on US planning, a significant military contribution would be needed. That was defined as at "division level" for land forces.[45]

99. Mr Hoon suggested raising "in general terms, that our contingency planning has shown we need plenty of warning in order to be able to contribute to military action".

100. The SPG produced a paper in preparation for a "Strategic Think Tank on Iraq", to be held by the Chiefs of Staff on 18 June.[46]

101. While the paper was not designed to consider equipment in detail, a section on "UK enablers" briefly considered force capability requirements. It reiterated the analysis of 24 May about what would be possible with either three, six or nine months warning. The paper also identified additional requirements for force protection, including "NBC" [Nuclear, Biological and Chemical] protection.

102. The MOD has been unable to locate any record of the think tank discussion.

103. Subsequent revisions of the paper before the end of 2002 are addressed later in this Section and in Section 6.1.

104. Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), wrote to Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of OD Sec, about the think tank discussion the same day.[47] He recognised that there was "a huge amount of work to be done if the UK is to be in a position to participate in any operation against Iraq".

105. Mr McKane recommended that Sir David should reply to Mr Hoon's letter of 31 May seeking "further and better particulars on the timelines and precisely what decisions incurring significant expenditure would be required now in order to keep open the possibility of a large scale deployment in six months time".

106. Sir David commented to Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff: "We certainly need much greater precision from MOD."[48]

107. Mr Powell replied that he believed there was "a danger of getting ahead of ourselves here unless this is absolutely necessary to get us into detailed military planning with the US".[49] He recommended discussing the issue with Mr Blair.

108. Sir David Manning asked Mr McKane to "confirm that it is now absolutely necessary to get into the detailed planning with the US".[50] He added: "I suspect it is if we are to have a voice."

109. On 25 June, Sir David wrote to Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, referring to Mr Hoon's letter of 31 May.[51] He stated:

> "… the Prime Minister has asked for further advice on precisely what steps would have to be taken now, including financial commitments, in order to keep open the possibility of deploying a large scale force by the end of this year – bearing in mind we may not get six months warning …"

110. Mr Watkins replied on 26 June with an update on the MOD's understanding of US plans.[52] He wrote that a small MOD team would be going to Washington and Tampa "immediately" and that would inform whether the UK could "secure adequate influence for a large scale contribution". That would determine the need to commit resources, on which Mr Hoon would provide "specific advice" shortly.

111. Lt Gen Pigott, Air Marshal Joe French, Chief of Defence Intelligence, and Mr Desmond Bowen, MOD Director General Operational Policy, visited Washington and CENTCOM from 27 to 29 June 2002.[53]

112. Before they left, Major General Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations (Operations) (DCJO(Ops)) from May 2002 to July 2003, provided a paper commenting on US planning, which at that stage offered two basic approaches:

- A “running start”, with extra forces being deployed as the initial attacks were under way, which would have the advantage of surprise and allow for operations as early as October 2002.
- A “generated start”, allowing full deployment before the beginning of operations, which was expected to require three months longer.[54]

113. Maj Gen Fry wrote that the “running start” option carried considerably more risk and would be “much more manoeuvrist” than the type of operations which had been conducted in 1991. A number of issues for the UK were identified including: the role and timing for a UK contribution; the need for very early decision making; how to integrate into a complex US plan; levels of risk; UK participation in US exercises; and the likely US expectations that would result from UK involvement in the planning process.

114. On 2 July, Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning with the outcome of the US visit.[55] While a “de facto invitation to the UK and Australia to participate” was “now on the table”, the extent of the desired UK contribution was “unclear”.

115. In July, the Chiefs of Staff were informed that some stocks were sufficient to protect only a medium scale UK deployment from biological attack.

116. A revised version of the SPG paper ‘UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq’ was produced on 11 July for a “Strategic Think Tank” on Iraq the following week.[56]

117. The section on NBC force protection had been expanded to explain that the UK possessed “sufficient stocks” of Individual Protective Equipment for a large scale deployment. Taking UOR action (“in 3 months or less”) could address “a number of shortfalls” but the “main shortfall” was in protection against a Biological Warfare (BW) attack, for which manufacturing time was needed for additional equipment. There were limited medical countermeasures to respond to a BW attack and the UK had “adequate stocks” only to support medium scale UK deployments.

118. The sustainment of operations beyond the level set out in the DPAs had “not been factored into calculations to date”.

119. The key risks for UK capabilities included:

- preparation times for the desertisation of vehicles;
- not knowing whether there was sufficient industrial capacity available to satisfy the “likely UOR/preparation requirements” (and this could not be resolved until clearance had been given to engage industry); and
- BW medical countermeasures being restricted to a medium scale force package.

[55] Letter Watkins to Manning, 2 July 2002, ‘Iraq’.
[56] Paper [SPG], 11 July 2002, ‘UK Military Strategic Thinking on Iraq’.

120. Lt Gen Pigott briefed Adm Boyce on 17 July that his view was that the UK should encourage thinking to move towards action in 2003 to 2004 rather than in 2002 to 2003, which "had a better chance of success" given the challenges "including political red cards".[57] That was: "Not a recipe for delay, indeed quite the reverse." It would be difficult for the UK to send land forces to participate in a "running start" but the UK thinking was "taking us towards a 'distinctive' (Package 3) role". For any significant contribution, force preparation would need to start "now".

121. The advice from Lt Gen Pigott and the SPG was discussed in a restricted Chiefs of Staff meeting on 17 July.[58]

122. In preparation for a meeting to be held on 18 July, Mr Bowen outlined the MOD's thinking in a minute to Mr Hoon on 17 July.[59] He drew attention to the US concepts of "running" and "generated" starts. He advised that the indications were that the US favoured the "running start" option (which could see US operations beginning during 2002).

123. Mr Bowen suggested that:

> "In the meantime, as we begin to explore possible UK contributions we need to identify what preparation – such as procurement for urgent operational requirements – could usefully begin now … "

124. In mid-July, a Cabinet Office paper invited Ministers to "note" the potentially long lead times for equipping UK forces to undertake operations in Iraq and sought agreement that the MOD could bring forward proposals for procurement of equipment.

125. Although it was agreed that the UK should proceed on the assumption that the UK would participate in any military action, there was no decision on whether funds could be spent on preparations.

126. The Cabinet Office paper 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action' was issued on 19 July to those attending a meeting to be chaired by Mr Blair on 23 July.[60] That meeting is addressed in Section 3.3.

127. Ministers were invited to "note the potentially long lead times involved in equipping UK Armed Forces to undertake operations in the Iraqi theatre"; and to "agree that MOD should bring forward proposals for the procurement of Urgent Operational Requirements under cover of the lessons learned from Afghanistan" and the "outcome" of the 2002 Spending Review.

128. In preparation for Mr Blair's meeting, Mr Bowen advised Mr Hoon that Adm Boyce had directed that UK planning should concentrate on two packages:

- a supporting/enabling package, including basing, maritime and air assets, in which the "the only land contribution would be Special Forces"; and
- a discrete land contribution of a division (minus) for operations in northern Iraq.[61]

129. Mr Bowen wrote that:

> "Other options, such as providing land forces to integrate with the US main effort in the south have been discounted because [sic] the severe difficulties we would face due to interoperability, deployment time and geographic constraints affecting logistics in particular."

130. Mr Bowen provided "schematic timelines" showing decision dates and readiness which could be achieved.

131. Commenting on Mr Bowen's advice, Mr Watkins wrote that a division (minus) option "would require immediate action on UORs etc and early decisions (October) on reserves".[62] The latter would "definitely be visible".

132. Separate advice from Lt Gen Pigott to Adm Boyce stated that one of the issues to be covered in the "way forward" was that it should be agreed to implement "invisible" UORs now, and to be prepared to advise Ministers later on visible UORs.[63]

133. A record of the meeting on 23 July stated that Mr Hoon advised Mr Blair that, if he wanted UK military involvement, Mr Blair "would need to decide this early".[64]

134. The meeting concluded that work should proceed on the assumption that the UK would participate in any military action. Adm Boyce was to tell the US military that "we were considering a range of options".

135. Mr Blair stated that he would "revert on the question of whether funds could be spent on preparation for this operation".

136. The MOD identified three possible options for a UK contribution on 26 July but no recommendation was made about which option should be selected. The largest option comprised the deployment of a division but the MOD was also examining the possibility of deploying an additional light brigade and providing the framework for a UK-led Corps headquarters.

137. Mr Hoon expressed caution about both the timescales required for a UK deployment and the impact of potential industrial action by the Fire Brigades Union in the autumn.

138. Mr Blair was advised that no decision was needed at that stage.

139. Following the 23 July meeting, No.10 asked the MOD to provide details of the proposed military campaign, and options for a UK contribution.[65]

140. Mr Bowen sent Mr Hoon a fuller analysis of the options for a UK contribution on 25 July.[66] He advised:

- It would take another couple of months to increase forces to medium scale.
- "To meet probable US timescales" it would "not be possible to deploy a fully prepared, fully sustainable armoured division for war-fighting". A fully prepared and sustained armoured division (one which could fight a significant Iraqi force) would take 10 months.
- Deployment of an armoured division (minus) would only be possible "within six months of a decision to deploy", and would have "limited sustainment and reach".

141. On 26 July, further MOD advice on options for a UK contribution to US-led military operations in Iraq was provided in a letter from Mr Watkins to Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs.[67]

142. Adm Boyce had recommended three options:

- Package 1 – an "in-place support package" using forces already in the region.
- Package 2 – an "enhanced support package" comprising Package 1 with additional air and maritime forces. While no conventional land forces could meet the timescales for the deployment of maritime and air forces: "Special Forces could be deployed very rapidly to match US timescales and priorities. This is likely to be very attractive to US planners, and their contribution to success would be significant …"
- Package 3 – a "discrete UK package" based on deployment of an armoured division which the MOD envisaged would be used in northern Iraq, in addition to the forces in Package 2. The UK might consider providing an armoured division either as part of a US-led Corps or as part of a larger coalition force possibly led by the UK using the framework of the NATO Allied Rapid Reaction Corps [ARRC]."

143. Mr Watkins stated "it would take six months for the whole division to be in place and then with limited sustainment and reach".

144. Mr Watkins cautioned that:

> "… the timescales indicated are the best planning estimates we can make at this stage … they assume that, as soon as a decision in principle is reached to participate, funding will be available to improve sustainability … and implement urgent operational requirements … The ability of industry to respond to our demands can only be estimated at this stage."

145. Mr Hoon had:

> "… commissioned more work in respect of sustainability and UORs with a view to expediting what would need to be done once a decision in principle was taken, with what visibility to the public eye and with what cost … It will involve widening the net of knowledge about this contingency planning within the MOD, although we will not yet contact industry who will have to be involved at some stage to determine actual lead times for procurement of UORs."

146. The advice was sent to Mr Blair on 31 July, as one of several "background papers" he had commissioned at his meeting on 23 July "for summer reading".[68]

147. Mr Rycroft commented to Mr Blair:

> "The military are not yet ready to make a recommendation on which if any of the three options to go for. Nor can they yet judge whether the US have a winning concept. They are continuing to work with the US military. You do not need to take decisions yet."

148. The MOD advised Mr Hoon on 30 July that there was a shortfall in "essential" equipment enhancements for all three packages in respect of protection against an Iraqi biological attack. It had "low confidence" that those shortfalls could be addressed within six months.

149. The MOD sought approval to engage more widely to refine its work on lead times but Mr Hoon decided that would be premature.

150. On 30 July, an MOD official provided Mr Hoon with a "best estimate" of the equipment enhancements that might be necessary in order to deliver the potential UK force packages.[69]

151. In an attached annex, the enhancements had been categorised as either "essential now", "full operational capability enhancers", or "follow-on enhancements".

[69] Minute Sec(O)1a to PS/SofS [MOD], 30 July 2002, 'Iraq – Enhancements Required For Potential UK Contribution'.

152. The shortfall of essential items for Packages 1 and 2 was for NBC equipment that would be required to treat casualties in the event of an Iraqi biological attack. The MOD had "low confidence" that it could be obtained within six months. It could take "up to nine months" to procure certain stocks from industry but further work was needed to identify other possible sources.

153. For enhancements required to achieve full operational capability, the MOD had "a high degree of confidence" that work could be completed "within six months" for Packages 1 and 2. For those packages, "none of the enhancement items appear to be a showstopper".

154. For Package 3, the MOD had "lower confidence" in the ability to deliver desertisation for tanks "for the fully sustained war-fighting role", which it judged "would take around ten months". There would also be a shortfall in NBC protection and biological detectors if Package 3 were to be adopted. Further work was being done to see how quickly this could be acquired.

155. The purchase of ammunition and spares for land forces and support helicopters was listed in the annex of equipment which was "essential now" to sustain operations if Package 3 were to be adopted.

156. The official wrote that "the earlier decisions are taken to start Urgent Operational Requirements (UOR) and sustainability acquisition, the greater the UK's preparedness and choice".

157. The MOD official requested approval to engage the Front Line Commands, the DPA and the DLO to "refine" the MOD's work on lead times. This was "most pressing" where the MOD had "low confidence that activity or procurement deemed essential to the UK force packages" could be achieved within six months.

158. The official would seek further approval before the MOD made "any contact with industry to determine the actual lead-times" for procuring equipment.

159. On funding, Mr Hoon was advised that, as any UORs for a campaign in Iraq would fall outside the MOD's budget, it would need agreement from the Treasury to call on the Reserve and to secure funding for the UOR equipment and enhancement measures.

160. The Reserve is a fund held by the Treasury intended for genuinely unforeseen contingencies which departments cannot manage from their own resources and was used to pay for the net additional costs of military operations (NACMO). The NACMO included both UOR and non-UOR expenditure associated with operations in Iraq. The process behind this is explained in Section 13.1, where MOD's negotiations with the Treasury are also examined.

161. Mr Watkins replied on 31 July, explaining that Mr Hoon had decided "it would be premature to widen the net of knowledge"; and that:

> "… no costs should be incurred on UORs and sustainability enhancements for the purposes of a campaign in Iraq … No estimates should be submitted to Treasury Officials."[70]

162. Mr Bowen wrote to Mr Watkins on 1 August, acknowledging Mr Hoon's clear directions but pressing "urgently" to take forward work on antitoxin[71] by widening the MOD planning circle.[72] Antitoxin was identified as an "essential" element in all three packages under consideration, "about whose potential availability we do not know nearly enough at present". Mr Bowen wrote:

> "In the event of any deployment, the proper preparations to enable British Forces to deal with the possible biological and chemical release would be essential … It seems likely that decisions on the acquisition of antitoxin, when they come to be made, will be on the critical path for the deployment of a war fighting capability."

163. Mr Bowen recommended "strongly" that Mr Hoon should agree that "on a very limited, need-to-know basis further staffing should be conducted with the inclusion of nominated NBC and Porton Down[73] staff".

164. Mr Adam Ingram, Minister for the Armed Forces, responded on 7 August that, "exceptionally", staffing could be widened "on a strict need to know basis", including NBC and Porton Down staff as requested.[74]

DETAILED PLANNING FOR UORS BEGINS

165. The MOD had defined essential equipment needed "now" for potential operations in Iraq as "showstoppers". That became the benchmark for determining whether the unavailability of an item should halt the deployment of UK forces.

166. On 9 August, Lt Gen Pigott published lists of individuals within the MOD (the "Centurion" group) and PJHQ (the "Warrior" group) who were authorised to receive "the most sensitive material relating to US planning and UK scoping on Iraq" during the summer.[75] That is described in Section 6.1.

167. Air Vice Marshal Clive Loader, Assistant Chief of the Defence Staff (Operations), told Mr Bowen on 16 August that he had been directed to "drill down" on equipment issues in the planning phase and was setting up an Equipment and Sustainability Working Group.[76] Draft Terms of Reference for the Group were attached.

168. AVM Loader wrote that, in accordance with directions from Mr Hoon's Private Office, consultation would "be strictly limited to those on the Centurion and Warrior lists".

169. The Terms of Reference described the Working Group's purpose as "taking forward the analysis of equipment and sustainability issues" with a "particular emphasis" on equipment availability and support. Work would be based on all three possible packages. The Working Group would gather "all internal data" to place itself "in the best position to take these issues forward" when clearance was granted.

170. The Working Group's scope would be "medical equipment and sustainability issues", including the issue of antitoxins. Consultation would be limited to the Centurion Group, "though outsiders may be approached for specific detail in response to specific questions where no connection to specific planning for operations against Iraq within a defined timescale is inferred".

171. The Working Group would consider which force elements could be delivered in either two or four months, aligning to "potential key dates on the US timescale", from September 2002. Where it was not possible to deliver the force element, the Working Group would consider the implications upon force packages. That would "allow those firming up the package" to identify what the UK could provide and where any shortfalls lay.

172. "Single Service sustainability work" would be checked by the DLO to ensure that centrally provided commodities, such as fuel and rations, were included for the entire force package.

173. The Terms of Reference categorised equipment under the same headings provided in the MOD advice to Mr Hoon on 30 July. Those were defined as:

- "Essential now": items "without which the force cannot deploy – they are showstoppers".
- "Full operational capability enhancers": required to give the force "a fully generated operational capability for up to 30 days of combat".
- "Follow-on enhancements": items beyond the minimum required for up to 30 days of combat and those that would "achieve a substantial measure of risk reduction".

[76] Minute ACDS (Ops) to DG Op Pol, 16 August 2002, 'Equipment and Sustainability Working Group' attaching Paper, 16 August 2002, 'Equipment and Sustainability Working Group Terms of Reference'.

174. The questions for the Group to consider included:

- the equipment requirement – such as the effects required from each package, quantities, enhancements for particular geographical locations and an understanding of priorities;
- the justification for it – such as what would "the operational penalties" be for not providing the item and were there any "operational lessons" that reinforced the case, for example from the 1990/91 Gulf Conflict;
- alternative solutions;
- the management and timing of the requirement;
- potential risks and wider implications; and
- visibility and presentation – how to "cover" preparing or acquiring the requirement.

175. Detailed planning for UORs for potential operations against Iraq began on 22 August with the first weekly Equipment and Sustainability Working Group meeting.[77]

176. On 5 September, Mr Hoon requested detailed advice from Mr Ian Lee, who had replaced Mr Bowen as MOD Director General Operational Policy, on the UORs assumed within the "preparation cost figures" for the three packages, "covering the 'what', 'why' and 'when' for each UOR".[78]

177. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon agreed on 8 September that the UK should plan on the basis of a medium scale land contribution but there should be no visible preparations.

178. Mr Blair met President Bush at Camp David on 7 September. That meeting is described in Section 3.4. Before the meeting, Mr Watkins wrote to Sir David Manning on 6 September with an update on US military planning and "the factors informing decisions on any UK military contribution".[79] For Package 2, he wrote that "some" UORs would need to be raised at additional cost to the Reserve.

179. For Package 3, Mr Watkins stated that "even were [Operation] FRESCO[80] to end soon, we could not provide a self-standing division within US timescales". He continued:

> "There would simply not be enough time to carry out the preparations we would need to make. We would not have enough time to engage industry in order to improve sustainability (ammunition, etc) and implement UORs to optimise forces for the theatre and interoperability with the US."

180. The Chiefs of Staff were considering what the "maximum effort" UK contribution could be for a UK ground force operating as part of a larger US force in northern Iraq. The "illustrative" force package consisted of a divisional HQ, an armoured brigade, an air assault brigade and a logistics brigade. A decision to commit all those elements would comprise some 40,000 personnel (including up to 10,000 Reservists).[81]

181. Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Mr Lee on 9 September, reporting that Mr Hoon had spoken to Mr Blair on the evening of 8 September following Mr Blair's return from Camp David:

> "It was agreed that a full UK Divisional contribution was impracticable and the UK should play down our ability to take on an overall leadership role in the North. The UK should, however, remain involved, developing the enhanced support package with the addition of a land medium scale contribution."[82]

182. Mr Hoon requested that planning should continue. His Private Office added: "For now actions must remain invisible … and this situation is likely to last for about a month."

183. MOD officials continued to push for agreement to discuss UORs with a wider set of colleagues and the Treasury.

184. The MOD sought approval from Mr Hoon to progress 16 "showstoppers" but highlighted that there was also a number of urgent UORs that were necessary to bring a UK force up to full operational capacity.

185. On 4 September, in advance of a planned meeting with Mr Hoon, Mr William Nye, Head of the Treasury Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team, briefed Mr Gordon Brown, Chancellor of the Exchequer, that MOD officials had done little work to refine the cost estimates for preparing a medium and large scale force, as they were under no pressure from Ministers to do so.[83] Neither had the MOD done any work to assess the cost of the campaign itself. Mr Nye said that it would be useful for Mr Brown to emphasise that the Treasury needed to be involved in some of the discussions on military planning, to enable it "to be kept informed of the context of financial and strategic decisions".

186. The Treasury informed the Inquiry that the meeting between Mr Brown and Mr Hoon was one-to-one and no record was taken.[84]

187. A minute from Mr Watkins to Mr Lee on 5 September summarised a series of discussions that Mr Hoon had had earlier that day.[85] In a meeting with Mr Brown, [84] Email Treasury to Iraq Inquiry Secretariat, 26 February 2010, [untitled].

[85] Minute Watkins to DG Op Pol, 5 September 2002, 'Iraq'.

Mr Hoon had "again" run through the three options and "alerted Mr Brown to the likely broad order costs of Package 2".

188. Mr Hoon and Mr Brown had also agreed to "meet periodically thereafter so that Mr Hoon could keep Mr Brown in touch with our emerging thinking on the options for UK involvement in any military action and the implications for UORs".[86]

189. On 13 September, Dr Simon Cholerton, a junior official in Secretariat (Overseas) (Sec(O)), advised Mr Hoon on "the need to take forward essential UOR work" for potential operations in Iraq.[87] Mr Hoon was asked to:

- Note "that we have got as far as we can in defining urgent equipment and sustainability measures without consulting more widely" and the "very limited nature of our consultation and the broad scope of the packages on the table" meant that "we cannot have high confidence in the judgements we have made".
- Agree that the MOD should take forward "a limited package of 'ambiguous' tasks on 16 essential UORs" aimed at remaining "invisible" but with enough information to approach the Treasury.
- Note that "these tasks do not cover the full range of capability shortfalls which have been identified" and work was needed on a wider set of UORs "as soon as the 'invisibility' constraint was lifted" to inform the Treasury. It would require "a limited expansion" of the Centurion Group.

190. The 16 essential UOR "showstoppers" covered all three packages. That included NBC protection where there was a requirement to "improve" Individual Protective Equipment, Collective Protection (COLPRO) and NBC detection. Dr Cholerton explained that, for all three Services, the issue was "not so much that we do not hold equipment (capability exists), but whether we hold sufficient in the face of the risk".

191. Dr Cholerton wrote that six measures were essential for the land component, notwithstanding the uncertainty over which package would be adopted. That included desertisation of armoured vehicles and the procurement of additional Enhanced Combat Body Armour (ECBA), of which only 13,345 sets were available against a potential deployment of 47,000 personnel. Existing ECBA stocks would be sufficient to equip only the front line fighting troops. That would "leave support staff – who will nevertheless potentially face a high risk environment – less well protected".

192. On 16 September, Mr Hoon received advice on preparatory work to take forward "a small number of time-critical" UORs for Special Forces.[88]

193. The MOD suggested it could use the cover of operations in Afghanistan "to handle these UORs in a discreet fashion", with costs being attributed to the same "ticket". Alternatively, there could be "some reprioritisation" of in-year resources: "Costs would then be claimed back retrospectively once a more general agreement has been reached with the Treasury on how to deal with the additional costs of any Iraq operations."

194. On 18 September, Mr McKane, now MOD DGRP, wrote he was "distinctly uneasy" about both options.[89] He proposed to either:

- urgently press for agreement to open up a dialogue with Treasury officials so that the funding of Iraq-related UORs was put "on to a sound footing"; or
- if AM Stirrup deemed the Special Forces' UORs "to be of such a high priority that he can re-prioritise the Equipment Plan, then he should do so". The Defence budget would have to absorb the costs.

195. On 19 September, Sir Kevin Tebbit's Private Office replied, agreeing with Mr McKane's advice that it would be "improper" to use the Afghanistan budget for Iraq and that it would, "in any case, be evident to Treasury in view of the 'item by item' requirement for scrutiny".[90]

196. Sir Kevin did not, however, agree Mr McKane's suggestion that the UORs could be met from the equipment budget through re-prioritisation "in view of the precedent this could set". Sir Kevin advised Mr Hoon to discuss the issue with Mr Brown "as soon as possible", which would be at their meeting scheduled for 23 September. Once that agreement was in place, the MOD could proceed, "either invisibly or otherwise".

197. Mr Hoon's Private Office decided not to show him the note from 16 September as a result of the comments from Mr McKane and Sir Kevin.[91] It requested further advice, "when appropriate".

198. Having seen Dr Cholerton's minute of 13 September, Air Chief Marshal Sir Peter Squire, Chief of the Air Staff, wrote to Adm Boyce on 16 September.[92] He believed that the situation had changed "considerably" since the Chiefs of Staff last discussed UORs. He wrote:

> "Political statements from both London and Washington have confirmed that a UN resolution will, in the first instance be pursued but that, if this fails military action will follow. Under these circumstances, contingency action to prepare for the eventuality that the UN resolution is not effective would seem entirely appropriate."

199. ACM Squire wished to proceed with "not only those UORs classified as 'showstoppers' but also those that will secure within an appropriate timescale a significant enhancement to operational capability".

200. In response to ACM Squire's minute, Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Adm Boyce that he fully understood "the difficulty of possible timelines for military action, as long as the ban on overt preparations, including for UORs, has to remain in place".[93]

201. Sir Kevin added:

> "I do not think the political situation has yet evolved sufficiently to be able to recommend to the Secretary of State that visible steps for contingency work or procurement action can go forward."

202. Sir Kevin concluded:

> "I fear for the time being that we are still in a position of preparing and developing our UOR cases in readiness for detailed engagement with the Treasury, but stopping short of visible measures, or indeed, implementation, pending the political decision from the Secretary of State."

203. Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Dr Cholerton on 17 September.[94] Mr Hoon was content for work to "proceed on some of the UORs" identified in Dr Cholerton's minute, but "the potential profile of the remainder would be problematic at the present time". Mr Hoon would, "however, be willing to accept further advice in due course". In the meantime, "no funds should be committed to Iraq-related UORs" until the Treasury's agreement was secured.

204. An annex stated that Mr Hoon was content for MOD officials to proceed with 12 of Dr Cholerton's UORs, but the remaining four required further advice, including the desertisation of armoured vehicles and ECBA.

205. Mr Hoon was content for the Centurion Group to be expanded as requested, which he understood would be "an approximately 10 percent increase in the community aware of contingency planning work".

206. On 18 September, Lt Gen Pigott circulated draft advice for Mr Hoon on the UK's potential contribution for discussion at an operational Chiefs of Staff meeting the following day.[95] He stated:

> "As Secretary of State is aware six essential equipment measures (Challenger II desertisation, fuel and water bowsers, enhanced combat body armour, SA80 and logistic vehicles) need to be taken forward. If we are to keep open our options on engaging, at or about the same time as the earliest potential US deployment in the North, work on all of these UORs plus others would need to be taken forward with the commitment of additional resources, and publicly visible placing of orders in early October."

207. The record of the Chiefs of Staff discussion on 19 September shows that Adm Boyce stated "there was still an embargo on discussing UORs with industry, and the issues could still not be discussed with a wider audience".[96]

208. The minutes from the meeting also recorded that Lt Gen Pigott's draft advice to Ministers was to be rewritten to include an explanation of the impact on future operations.

209. A note from Mr Watkins on 19 September stated that the draft advice was shown to Mr Hoon and Lord Bach, Parliamentary Under Secretary and Minister of State for Defence Procurement, that day.[97]

210. Lt Gen Pigott produced further advice on 26 September that did not contain the same level of detail on UORs.[98] The only reference to them stated:

"In MOD and PJHQ there is detailed work in hand on a range of force preparation issues. Those relating to the call-out of Reservists, training and Urgent Operational Requirements are the most pressing. The implications of this work will bear on our force options so we need to retain the necessary flexibility, until all this is clearer."

211. On 20 September, No.10 was informed that Package 2 comprised 13,000 personnel (Special Forces, Air and Maritime).[99] Consideration was also being given to including a Commando group of 1,700 Royal Marines personnel. Package 3 (comprising a Divisional HQ and an armoured brigade plus supporting elements), would comprise a further 28,000 personnel.

212. Mr Brown agreed proposals, in principle, for funding UORs on 23 September. The arrangements were confirmed on 4 October.

213. On 23 September, Mr Blair agreed with Mr Hoon that Package 2 could be offered as a potential UK contribution but there was a misunderstanding over whether the US should be informed that the UK was still considering a land option (Package 3). That issue is detailed in Section 6.1.

[99] Minute Watkins to Manning, 20 September 2002, 'Iraq: Potential UK Contribution to any Military Action'.

214. Mr Brown and Mr Hoon met separately on 23 September to agree the process for funding UORs.[100] Mr Brown agreed the MOD's proposal to adopt a similar approach for managing Iraq UORs to that already in place for Afghanistan UORs, with an initial ceiling of £150m.

215. Mr Hoon undertook to provide "a broad breakdown of this sum", which he set out in a letter to Mr Brown on 25 September.[101] While he highlighted that "requirements and priorities may of course change" as US planning developed, Mr Hoon wrote that the first tranche of measures might include:

- strategic and theatre communications (approximately £25m to £35m);
- Special Forces, including communications and air support (approximately £40m to £60m);
- force protection measures, including items such as defensive aids for aircraft and NBC equipment (approximately £20m to £40m); and
- initial logistic support, campaign infrastructure and spares (£50m to £100m).

216. MOD and Treasury officials were tasked to work out the detailed arrangements. Mr Brown would write to Mr Hoon with proposals for handling UORs above the £150m ceiling.

217. On 26 September, Mr McKane met Mr Jonathan Stephens, Treasury Director Public Services, "to follow up" the meeting between Mr Hoon and Mr Brown.[102]

218. Mr McKane explained that the total volume of UORs was likely to cost more than £150m but the MOD was not yet in a position to say by how much.

219. Mr McKane also explained that the MOD might wish to use the £150m for "items that were not strictly speaking UORs" such as force generation costs.

220. The Treasury "did not demur" on either point.

221. Mr McKane reported that the Treasury asked when Mr Hoon:

> " … was likely to come forward with a firm recommendation on the overall scale of the British contribution. I said that this was likely to be within the next few weeks and that obviously the financial cost of the options would be one of the factors to be weighed in the balance."

222. Mr David Williams, MOD Director, Directorate Capabilities, Resources and Scrutiny (DCRS), wrote to the Treasury on 2 October, proposing a set of criteria for agreeing UORs against the Reserve.[103]

[103] Letter Williams to Treasury [junior official], 2 October 2002, 'UOR Criteria'.

223. On 4 October, Mr Williams advised Mr Hoon that the MOD had reached agreement with the Treasury on the UOR arrangements.[104] Work was "in hand" to prioritise the list of UORs, and to produce business cases for a range of "showstopper" UORs. He sought Mr Hoon's agreement for work to "now begin" on a wider range of UORs, "including discreet consultation with industry", and for resources to be committed as business cases were approved.

224. Mr Williams explained that Ministers were "not normally invited to approve individual UORs" unless project costs exceeded £400m; all UORs in this instance would cost less than £100m and fall "well within" the approval authority delegated to one-star officials.[105] Officials would, however, consult Mr Hoon separately where UORs could not be covered by the ambiguity of operations in Afghanistan, and on the four items where Mr Hoon had requested further advice in his 17 September note.

225. Mr Hoon's Assistant Private Secretary wrote a summary of the points on the minute, stating: "I believe this is now practical and appropriate. OK?"[106]

226. Mr Hoon replied: "I would like to see all of them first."[107]

227. Mr Hoon's Private Office replied to Mr Williams on 7 October:

> "Before agreeing to the implementation process described in your minute … Mr Hoon wishes to see the UOR priority lists following consideration by the Chiefs of Staff."[108]

228. As work on UORs progressed, the capability shortfalls identified by Dr Cholerton on 13 September proved problematic.

229. On 8 October, Lt Gen Pigott prepared an update on the progress of UORs for the Chiefs of Staff to consider the following day.[109] It separated UORs into two tranches:

- Tranche 1 to "be implemented forthwith", funded from the first £150m agreed by the Treasury; and
- Tranche 2, which would "continue to be updated".

230. Lt Gen Pigott explained that the prioritisation had been governed by:

- "the need to provide individual and force protection";

- "the requirement to achieve maximum military effect at the strategic, operational and tactical levels";
- costs – including a consideration of whether the relative capability of a small number of more expensive enhancements was more valuable than a larger number of cheaper ones; and
- equipment lead times – those with long lead times had been given priority.

231. The difficulties of planning covertly and without wider consultation were reiterated. Lt Gen Pigott said that meant that there were "a number of particularly problematic capabilities" which were being addressed urgently by the MOD but "need to be drawn to the attention of COS and in some cases would benefit from higher level direction". Those included:

- NBC COLPRO – the majority of in-service equipment had been purchased for the 1991 Gulf Conflict but had not been fully taken into service, nor had its support been fully funded "so its effectiveness for future operations" was still to be determined.
- Antitoxin – work to address the current shortfall was "unlikely to meet the requirement in less than 6 to 8 months".
- ECBA – there were "about 20,000 complete sets of ECBA in-service which would be "sufficient to equip the Fighting Echelon of the Land Component, but not the whole Joint Force". The time taken to produce the shortfall could not be determined until industry was consulted but their current judgement was that "it may be very difficult to manufacture the amount of Kevlar armour plates in the amount required in time".

232. On visibility, Lt Gen Pigott wrote:

> "… there will come a point where the presentational challenge will be not so much to ensure that UOR work remains veiled, but rather to demonstrate that we are taking action to address perceived capability shortfalls."

233. Lt Gen Pigott wrote that would include issues highlighted in recent NAO reports[110] on desertisation of armoured vehicles, Combat ID and Saif Sareea II.

234. When the Chiefs of Staff discussed the list of UORs on 9 October, it was advised that the Directorates of Equipment Capability (DECs) and Front Line Commands "were now engaged in the staffing of UORs".[111]

235. The minutes do not record any reference to specific UORs or equipment capabilities raised by Lt Gen Pigott.

---

[110] Looking at the NAO publications around this period, it appears that Lt Gen Pigott was referring to one report: the Saif Sareea report published on 1 August 2002 that dealt with all of the points to which he refers and that is detailed earlier in this Section.
[111] Minutes, 9 October 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

236. Mr Williams wrote to Mr Hoon on the same day, informing him that the Chiefs of Staff had now endorsed the prioritised list of UORs for Iraq as requested.[112] He attached the list and asked Mr Hoon to agree that work should now be taken forward as recommended in his minute of 4 October.

237. Mr Williams added that Treasury officials had confirmed that the MOD's interpretation of access to the Reserve was shared by Mr Brown and they were ready to agree the commitment of resources.

238. The list of UORs covered all three Packages and included:

- communications equipment;
- force protection measures, including NBC equipment and defensive aid suites; and
- desertisation measures including clothing, hydration systems and sand filters.

239. Mr Hoon's Private Office commented:

> "I suggest we have a system whereby we see the papers in parallel and draw any dodgy looking ones to your attention."[113]

240. Before agreeing Mr Williams' advice, Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Sir David Manning on 11 October with an update on the UOR process, explaining the approvals process and that wider consultation was necessary to ensure that cost information was "soundly based":

> "This consultation will be carefully controlled but will inevitably increase the risk of wider disclosure. In the majority of cases, this is unlikely to excite public interest. But the nature of the work involved with some of the essential requirements … will inevitably lead to comment and speculation that they are linked to preparation for Iraq. The Defence Secretary judges nevertheless that it is necessary to initiate this work now to meet likely timescales and has therefore authorised it to proceed".[114]

241. On 15 October, Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Mr Williams, agreeing that the necessary work should now be undertaken to progress the full range of the prioritised (Tranche 1) UORs.[115] Mr Hoon had asked for a copy of all approvals paperwork so that he could "maintain an awareness of progress, and be forewarned of any particularly contentious items". It would also be useful for Mr Williams to provide "the weekly summary of progress" he was understood to be producing.

242. Lt Gen Pigott produced an update on UORs for the Chiefs of Staff on 21 October.[116] Tranche 1 UORs were being implemented: two UORs had been approved so far and a further 64 USURs[117] had been formally endorsed by PJHQ and the Director of Special Forces (DSF).

243. Lt Gen Pigott wrote that a working group had been established to inform the Chiefs on the risks associated of operating in a CBRN environment. The provision of COLPRO was being reviewed but detailed checks on armoured vehicle NBC filter packs was not possible under the current visibility guidelines. Routine appraisals were being carried out and checks were being incorporated into those.

244. Where there was no ambiguity about the purpose of the requirement, Mr Hoon was to be consulted before industry was approached. The measures that fell into this category included:

- weapons stocks;
- satellite communications technology;
- fuel distribution and water carriage systems;
- ECBA;
- COLPRO for NBC attacks, including antibiotics for all personnel which was considered essential; and
- desert clothing.

245. The Chiefs of Staff approved Lt Gen Pigott's paper at their meeting on 28 October and ACM Bagnall was directed to "take the work forward".[118]

246. The minutes do not record any reference to specific UORs or equipment capabilities raised in Lt Gen Pigott's minute.

247. On 29 October, Major General David Richards, Assistant Chief of the General Staff (ACGS), wrote to Lt Gen Pigott about his paper of 21 October, stating that he was:

> "… content to endorse the recommendations within the paper subject to the requirement to increase the pace at which we address the UORs concerning NBC COLPRO and decontamination. There is a significant delta between current UORs and our anticipated requirement which needs urgent work."[119]

248. Between 31 October and the middle of December 2002, Ministerial decisions and military planning and preparations were based on advice that the deployment of a divisional headquarters and a single combat brigade, with four battalions, in a northern option, and the possible deployment of a Royal Marines Commando Group to southern Iraq, were the maximum which could be deployed given the requirements of Op FRESCO and the timescale for military operations envisaged by the US.

249. The process for approving UORs continued against a deadline of the end of February for Packages 1 and 2, and the end of March for Package 3.

250. The difficulties surrounding desertisation measures, clothing, ECBA and NBC protection continued.

251. On 30 October, Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to a DCRS official with a query raised by Mr Hoon while reading the UOR for Challenger 2 modifications:

> "He noted that the business case used a latest acceptable in-service date of April 2003. He wonders what in-service dates are currently being considered appropriate, given what we know of US planning."[120]

252. The DCRS official replied on 12 November.[121] He stated that the Challenger 2 In Service Date (ISD) was "used with 90% confidence" and would "almost certainly be brought forward". His understanding was that modifications would "be complete by early March" and did not require the vehicles to be returned to the factory; the modifications could be carried out in theatre "if necessary".

253. The official added that it was "not easy to align equipment ISDs with an operation, when the timing of the latter is moving constantly" but "rough timeframes" were necessary to negotiate delivery times and costs with industry, with the caveat that they were liable to change.

254. Adm Boyce's office added:

> "While this could add further flexibility to the time required for modifications, we should not lose sight of the implications for tank crewmen … Our experience in 1991 was that such modifications … were time-consuming and manpower-intensive. Planning should take account of this."[122]

255. Section 6.1 addresses Mr Blair's decision on 31 October that the MOD could offer Package 3 to the US for planning purposes.

256. Mr Hoon was advised on 1 November by a DCRS official that 88 USURs had been sent to DCRS, having been endorsed by PJHQ and DSF.[123] He wrote that 10 UOR business cases had been approved internally and that Treasury officials were "actively considering" the AS90[124] and Challenger 2 desertisation cases. The approved business cases amounted to £20m, £800,000 of which was in the form of running costs that would be claimed against the Reserve.

257. The official added:

> "Most addressees will have seen the article that appeared in the Telegraph earlier this week alleging that contingency planning was being held up by HM Treasury. This assertion is entirely without foundation and serves only to complicate unnecessarily our excellent relationship with them."

258. On 6 November, the Chiefs of Staff considered a paper from Lieutenant General John Reith, Chief of Joint Operations (CJO), about the impact of "very hot weather" on the UK's war-fighting ability.[125] The points raised included:

- It was "well recognised" that weapon systems could be "degraded in hot weather".
- Ammunition storage was difficult and high risk.
- "Most" land vehicles required UOR action "to enable them to operate effectively in hot weather", some of which were "in hand". The lead time for modifications varied from one to 12 months.

259. The Chiefs of Staff noted the paper, which was to be revised and re-submitted "within one month".

260. On 12 November, a DCRS official sought Mr Hoon's approval to initiate discussions with industry for five equipment measures that would raise the visibility of planning for an invasion of Iraq:

- desert combat boots – an estimated 20,000 were required in particular sizes with a critical lead time of three to six months;
- ECBA – there was currently only sufficient stock for 15,000 personnel;
- water and fuel distribution; and
- medical equipment, including battlefield ambulance upgrades, COLPRO and field hospital infrastructure.[126]

261. Mr Hoon approved the request on the following day.[127]

262. The Chiefs of Staff had also considered a "CBRN Risk Paper" on 6 November and the key equipment issues arising were covered in Lt Gen Pigott's UOR update on 18 November.[128] The time needed to procure additional COLPRO under UOR action was "directly related to the amount of equipment required" and it was possible that the quantity which could be procured and fielded against "the most demanding timeframe may be insufficient to meet the full requirement". That could have an impact upon the UK's concept of operations (CONOPS). Options would be presented to the Chiefs of Staff "once the extent of the likely shortfall" was confirmed.

263. Lt Gen Pigott reported that 20 UORs had been approved to date, and a further 137 USURs endorsed. The latest ISD being used to gauge the delivery of UORs was the end of February for Packages 1 and 2 and the end of March for Package 3.

264. There were some key equipment gaps "that may not be fully addressed by the UOR process and for which Chiefs of Staff's direction on prioritisation and risk may be required", including:

- ECBA – " … it is possible we may not be able to procure sufficient numbers within the timeframe; this may necessitate differential levels of force protection".
- Desert clothing and boots – "It is likely that the numbers required will exceed the UK's manufacturing capability. There are operational, force health and presentational implications in not providing troops with appropriate clothing."

265. Options would be presented to the Chiefs of Staff once procurement timelines had been confirmed with industry.

266. Maj Gen Fry advised Adm Boyce on 22 November that it would take some four months from the order to deploy for the northern option (whether Package 2 or 3), and more than five months for the southern option.[129]

267. A DCRS official informed Mr Hoon on 22 November that contracts were shortly to be let for clothing, combat boots and body armour, and the procurement of these items would be highly visible.[130] The official wrote that the "continuing uncertainty over the size of the operation" meant that, initially, the procurement figures would be:

- clothing for 15,000 personnel;
- 20,000 pairs of desert boots; and
- 50,000 body armour plates.

[130] Report DCRS 1 to APS/SofS [MOD], 22 November 2002, 'Potential Operations in Iraq: Letting of Contracts for Combat Clothing/Body Armour'.

268. On 29 November, a DCRS official provided a UOR update for Ministers, the Chiefs of Staff and various other senior personnel, recording that 35 UORs and 162 USURs had been approved.[131] Those included desert clothing, AS90 environmental enhancements, Challenger 2 dust mitigation and enhanced armour protection, battlefield ambulance upgrades and field hospital upgrades.

269. The combined cost of the 35 UORs was £115m, against the initial £150m allocated by the Treasury.

270. The same day, the DCRS official sought permission from Mr Hoon for the MOD to commence discussions with industry on the procurement of desert clothing, ECBA, water and fuel distribution and medical equipment.[132] The official explained that, although Mr Hoon had already given that permission on 13 November:

> "… there is a perception in other areas (including the DLO) that restrictions on consulting industry remain in place and the uncertainty needs to be removed."

271. The areas where "some concern had been expressed" included the build-up of sustainability commodities related to land forces and COLPRO.

272. Mr Hoon's Private Office replied on 2 December, agreeing that the MOD could discuss "any items of equipment relating to operations in Iraq" with industry "at the appropriate stage in the UOR process".[133] That was "on the understanding that appropriate confidentiality will be observed".

273. In December 2002, the MOD and the Treasury agreed how the MOD would claim the cost of military operations against Iraq from the Reserve.

274. On 28 November, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Brown to request an increase in the UOR ceiling from £150m to £300m and to secure agreement that the MOD should begin to capture all non-UOR additional costs, with a view to repayment from the Reserve in due course.[134] He stated that the current UOR process was "working well".

275. Mr Blair agreed on 9 December that the MOD should plan on the basis that a political decision to commit land forces could be taken as early as 15 February 2003 (see Section 6.1).

276. A copy of the letter recording Mr Blair's decision was sent to Mr Mark Bowman, Mr Brown's Private Secretary.

[134] Letter Hoon to Brown, 28 November 2002, 'Iraq: Urgent Operational Requirements'.

277. Mr Brown agreed on the same day to increase the ceiling for UORs and that the MOD should begin to capture NACMO, but said that all such costs should be contained within the UOR ceiling "until any operation is initiated".[135]

278. On 11 December, Mr Rycroft confirmed that Mr Blair was "content that military preparations from January would become increasingly visible".[136]

279. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Brown on 13 December, warning him that Mr Blair's decision on 9 December would increase the rate at which the MOD incurred additional costs.[137]

280. The recently agreed £150m tranche was "likely to be exhausted by 20 December". Mr Hoon requested an additional £200m for UORs, bringing the UOR total to £500m.

281. Mr Paul Boateng, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, agreed the request on 23 December.[138]

282. The discussions leading up to that decision are set out in greater detail in Section 13.1 which shows that the arrangement for reclaiming the NACMO worked as intended and did not constrain the military's ability to conduct operations against Iraq.

283. There was no delay or obstruction on the part of the Treasury that stifled the progress of UORs.

284. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that there had been no major obstacles to the preparations with the Treasury, although the need to return to the Treasury to increase the tranches of money available had been frustrating to some:

> "Inevitably in these kind of circumstances there is an anxiety and a concern on the part of the Ministry of Defence to get on with things and the – and it did take a month or so after my first engagement in this for the agreements to be reached to start to commit money to these Urgent Operational Requirements. But thereafter, the process operated smoothly. There were some, I think, who were probably frustrated at the fact that … we were given tranches of money … and I can remember that we would get quite quickly to the point where we had exhausted the first tranche and were then involved in the preparation of ministerial correspondence to secure the release of the next tranche, but I think … that was understandable in the circumstances."[139]

285. Lt Gen Pigott's UOR update for the Chiefs of Staff on 20 December stated that 79 UORs had been approved at a cost of £283m, 48 from Tranche 1 and 31 from Tranche 2.[140] There were nine Tranche 1 UORs outstanding. Additional sustainability measures of £44.75m had been approved.

286. The key issues included:

- Fuel and water distribution.
- COLPRO – the DLO was finalising its assessment of the consolidated requirement against serviceable holdings and was initiating UOR action for the balance. Early indications suggested "an initial delivery date of late Feb/Mar 03" although there may be a longer lead time for some components. As its delivery could affect the UK's ability to "field the required capability in the anticipated timescale", options for the prioritisation of the available equipment would continue to be refined.
- ECBA – contracts for an additional 37,400 ECBA plates were to be let the following week, to augment the 30,000 in stock. It was expected that the requirement would be "met in full by the end of March".
- Desert clothing – 10,000 sets of desert clothing were in stock and contracts had been placed for an additional 15,000 sets and 20,000 pairs of boots. Those would be available by the end of March. The MOD intended to procure a further 15,000 sets of clothing and 10,000 sets of boots but it would not be possible to confirm whether those would be available by the end of March until the contracts had been placed.

287. The difficulties in providing Combat ID were also highlighted. That is addressed later in this Section.

288. By 3 January 2003, a total of 242 USURs had been endorsed and 118 UOR business cases approved, totalling £340m.[141]

The decision to deploy ground forces to the South and its implications

289. Between mid-December 2002 and mid-January 2003, the force to be deployed recommended by the MOD increased from an armoured brigade and a Commando Group to an armoured brigade and two light brigades.

290. The military recommendation to offer ground forces at large scale and to deploy for potential operations in southern Iraq was formally endorsed on 17 January, only two months before the possible start of military operations.

291. The only reference in the papers put to Mr Hoon and Mr Blair of the risks associated with deploying three combat brigades and committing them to earlier operations was that some risk would have to be taken on fitting UOR equipment, but that risk was "considered acceptable".

292. The risk that some equipment might not be delivered in time for the start of operations does not appear to have been drawn to Ministers' attention or discussed.

293. The development of the military options between mid-December 2002 and mid-January 2003, the decision to offer 3 Commando Brigade for the amphibious assault, and the decision on 17 January to deploy two brigades for operations in southern Iraq rather than one brigade for the northern option, are addressed in detail in Sections 6.1 and 6.2.

294. Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Blair on 16 January seeking agreement to the "key role in southern Iraq" proposed by the US for the UK.[142]

295. Mr Hoon stated that the timescales for possible action would mean that some risk would have to be taken on the fitting of UOR equipment, but that risk was "considered acceptable".

296. Following a telephone conversation, Sir David Manning replied to Mr Watkins on 17 January that Mr Blair was "content to proceed on the basis of the Defence Secretary's recommendations".[143] The UK would proceed with Package 3.

297. Mr Hoon made a statement in Parliament on 20 January announcing that the Government had "reached a view" of the composition and deployment of a land force package for potential military action in Iraq.[144] That would include the Headquarters of 1st (UK) Armoured Division, comprising 7 Armoured Brigade, 16 Air Assault Brigade and 102 Logistics Brigade.

298. The total number of personnel would be "approximately 26,000 personnel" which was in addition to the "around 4,000 personnel" already being deployed with 3 Commando Brigade Royal Marines.

299. As Section 6.2 shows, it was envisaged that 3 Commando Brigade Royal Marines would have a combat role at the start of the land campaign in mid-March. The roles to be played by 16 Air Assault Brigade and 7 Armoured Brigade were less defined. It was envisaged that 16 Air Assault Brigade would relieve US forces in an area south of Basra approximately 10 days after the start of operations. 7 Armoured Brigade would protect the US flank.

300. To conduct those operations, 16 Air Assault Brigade would need to be deployed and ready in Kuwait by the beginning of March and 7 Armoured Brigade by mid-March. For the northern option, the UK had been planning for ground combat operations beginning in mid-April.

301. The implications for equipping three combat brigades and the plans for earlier operations were not explicitly acknowledged until late January.

302. Ministers were advised that there were "no showstoppers", but there is no record of formal advice on how the military had defined that term or the level of risk it entailed.

303. Following his statement on 20 January, Mr Hoon was asked by Mr Bernard Jenkin for an assurance that troops were "fully trained and fully equipped for whatever they may be asked to do".

304. Mr Hoon replied:

> "As for preparations, I do not doubt that our forces are fully and thoroughly prepared to face this kind of operation. Indeed, the training exercise conducted in similar conditions in Oman just over a year ago was obvious preparation for this kind of deployment."

305. Lord Bach announced the composition and deployment of the UK's land force package in the House of Lords on 20 January.[145]

306. Asked whether the Challenger 2 tanks had now been desertised, if the lessons from Saif Sareea had been rectified, and if there was sufficient desert clothing for troops to be deployed, Lord Bach replied:

> "As regards Challenger 2 and AS90 … work is being carried out now to ensure that they are desertised sufficiently. That work is ongoing and will continue when forces are in transit and in theatre as required. I give the noble Lord the assurance he seeks as regards clothing … We continue to work to ensure that our personnel are properly equipped to cope with the environmental conditions in which they may operate."

307. Pressed by Lord Elton for reassurance that "the work now being done will be completed before there is any question of any armoured vehicle moving in the desert – that they will be desertised before they are deployed", Lord Bach replied: "Of course the vehicles will be desertised by the time they are deployed."[146]

308. On 21 January, Gen Walker was advised that the delivery times for UORs had been refined to reflect the compressed timeframes and there were risks associated with the inability to deliver some key UORs within those.[147] Allowance had now been made to integrate UORs but no allowance had been made for any additional training required, or any delays in loading or transit to theatre. The tactical implications of the delivery shortfalls were "not yet well understood".

309. Gen Walker was advised that:

- The US commitment to loan Combat ID capability had so far proved inconclusive and there would be "no guarantee of US support".
- The DEC was "increasingly optimistic" they would have "full Target ID capability", but the necessary measures would have to be fitted in theatre.
- Confidence in the delivery of NBC protection was decreasing.
- The full capability of the Challenger 2 tank's dust mitigation and AS90's environmental enhancement were unlikely to be available until after 31 March and would have to be fitted in theatre.
- The fitting of ballistic protection enhancements for Combat Vehicle Reconnaissance (Tracked) vehicles[148] "may have to take place in theatre".
- There was "little visibility" of the amount of desert clothing "in the hands of soldiers" and the allocation of clothing had already been reduced from three sets per man to two sets per man to "try and prevent a shortfall at the start of operations". It was necessary to airlift clothing into theatre to meet operational timelines and "to have a favourable delivery of sizes". If both of these were achieved, it was "possible that all troops will have desert clothing and boots in time for the start of operations".
- 75 percent of the required unhardened COLPRO would be ready by the start of March, with the full requirement being met in theatre by 31 March.
- There was "insufficient stock" of COLPRO seals for Armoured Fighting Vehicles (AFVs) and more could not be procured in time. The lead time to procure seals was 12 to 36 months.
- The situation had improved "markedly" on ECBA, and Gen Walker could "be confident" that it would be delivered "to all troops in time for the committal of any ground troops".
- The full requirement for battlefield ambulances, however, would not be upgraded in time for the anticipated start of operations.
- The availability of sand filters for Lynx helicopters was driving the number of helicopters to be deployed.

310. On 21 January, Lord Bach's Private Office wrote to AM Stirrup's Private Office, explaining that Lord Bach would be reviewing the progress of UORs, "with a view to highlighting potential risks and focusing on means of addressing them".[149] That was because, while Ministers were aware which UORs had been approved, they had less visibility of:

- how confident officials remained that equipment could be procured in the required timeframe; and
- the extent to which outstanding areas of concern about equipment capabilities were assessed as being "incapable of resolution" in the required timeframe.

311. Lord Bach agreed that the first step was to hold a meeting with key stakeholders to take stock of the position across all packages but he listed areas that were likely to be of particular concern, including desertisation of armoured vehicles, Combat ID, NBC capabilities and clothing and personal equipment. A short paper setting out the "key areas of shortfall or predicted risk" to assist discussions was requested.

312. The minutes from the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 22 January recorded that "unhelpful media coverage had exposed a UOR problem and it was clear that shortfalls would mean that FOC [Full Operating Capability] by some UK troops might not be achieved until 31 March".[150]

313. Adm Boyce directed that "immediate action" should be taken and for commands to be informed that "urgent action was underway". That included addressing "bad press" equipment stories and that UORs were to become a standing item on the agenda for operational Chiefs of Staff meetings.

314. On the same day, and in light of the brief provided to Gen Walker about equipment shortfalls, ACM Bagnall wrote to Lt Gen Pigott and AM Stirrup about Lord Bach's request.[151] He wrote:

> "I have confirmed that DCDS(EC) [AM Stirrup] already has work in hand to respond. Clearly, this needs to include an operational assessment of the likely impact of any delays to particular UORs. It may be helpful to categorise UORs as low, medium, high and 'show stopper' under this heading, and I have asked DCDS(C) [Lt Gen Pigott] to provide the advice. There will also be a need to highlight any measures (for example a lack of camouflage paint) which may have a low operational impact but which would carry a very significant presentational and morale cost.
> "As you are aware, CDS has asked me to retain oversight of the UOR process, and I would be grateful if your combined response to Min(DP) [Lord Bach] could be copied to me. I would also intend, diaries permitting, to join any meeting which Min(DP) intends to hold on this topic."

315. In his witness statement ACM Bagnall told the Inquiry that Mr Hoon had asked Lord Bach:

" … to be his lead Minister for UORs and for DCDS(EC) to act as Senior Responsible Owner (SRO) for UORs. This led to regular and increasingly frequent meetings between the then Minister and his staffs and the then DCDS(EC) and his experts. For my part I monitored the UOR process on CDS' behalf and intervened if and when required."[152]

316. Lord Bach told the Inquiry:

"I was asked by the Secretary of State, in the second half of January 2003, to take temporary responsibility for UORs. This involved being briefed by DCDS(EC) [AM Stirrup] in writing, before chairing (for the most part) weekly meetings with senior officials in order to look at progress of UORs that had already been agreed between MOD and HMT. I played no part in determining what UORs should or should not be proceeded with. Those decisions were taken at a stage well before their progress was looked at by the Committee I chaired. I had played no role before the request in Jan 2003, nor should I have. UORs were not the responsibility of Min DP: they and the Defence Logistics Organisation were in the portfolio of Min AF [Mr Ingram]."[153]

317. Following his statement to the House of Lords on 20 January, Lord Bach was advised on 22 January by Mr Williams that there was "not only no need for him to clarify the statement made earlier this week about 'desertisation' but actual disadvantage in seeking to do so".[154]

318. Mr Williams confirmed that only one, "relatively minor", modification would be completed before the vehicles deployed. He stated:

"On that basis, if by 'deployed' the Minister meant the formal point at which units begin to leave their main bases and embark for the Gulf, then his statement on Monday would be misleading. I suspect, however, that Lord Bach meant the point at which UK forces were likely to become engaged on offensive operations. Given the context of the question and the fact that many Lords/MPs would not pick up on the formal military interpretation of the term 'deployed', that is probably a reasonable position to take. If that is the case, I do not judge that a public clarification of the use of the word 'deployed' is either necessary or would add much value."

[154] Minute Williams to PS/Minister(DP), 22 January 2003, 'Op TELIC – Challenge 2 'Desertisation' UOR Activity'.

319. In describing the modifications that the Challenger 2 was undergoing for Iraq, Mr Williams wrote that Lord Bach's comments were "reasonable: although the full planned upgrade may not be completed in time, Challenger 2s' desert performance should have been enhanced to a useful degree in the right timeframe".

320. Mr Williams added that, more generally, it was also "important to try and dampen down speculation" on when equipment modifications were likely to be completed because:

- the MOD's "general line" was that decisions about military action had "not yet been taken", and providing indications that it was "working to a hard and fast deadline" would "undermine that overall public position on the timing of possible action";
- the timeframes for delivery from industry were subject to change; and
- the MOD's own assumptions about the timeframe "may again change".

321. Mr Williams suggested that should be considered in light of the broader advice Lord Bach was expecting later that week.

322. Lord Bach received the advice, submitted on behalf of AM Stirrup, on 24 January.[155] He was invited to note that:

- 137 equipment UORs and 108 sustainability UORs had been approved, the "vast majority" of which remained "on track to deliver to the Front Line Commands in accordance with planned ISDs".
- "The compression of timescales for the Land Component, coupled with the late addition of 16 AA Bde [16 Air Assault Brigade] and the increase in the Amphibious Task Group to a Brigade(-) has meant that a number of UORs will not be delivered in full prior to the potential start date of operations."
- "None of the shortfalls is deemed to be a 'showstopper' and solutions for mitigating the potential operational risks involved are being developed by PJHQ and Front Line Commands."
- "Heavy pressure" would be placed on the supply and equipment support chains and advanced deployment dates had "added to the weight of UOR items which were always intended to be fitted in theatre".

323. The advice explained that the majority of UOR shortfalls affected ground forces. The key areas of concerns were the Challenger 2 desertisation, Combat ID and in-service stock items that could not be procured through UOR action, such as COLPRO filters for AFVs.

---

[155] Minute DCDS(EC) to PS/Minister(DP), 24 January 2003, 'Iraq: Op TELIC UORs'.

324. Lord Bach was advised:

> "Whilst there are no showstoppers it should be understood that lack of some UOR capabilities … could require Commanders to make choices they might not otherwise have to make and could reduce operational effectiveness. Equally, delivery of the UOR capability cannot remove risks completely. The overall operational impact may be to constrain commanders' options, reduce the tempo of operations and risk the ability to operate in close conjunction with US forces."

325. In response to the high level of media and Parliamentary interest in the availability of equipment, as a general guideline, one of the points to emphasise was that:

> "Our forces will have the equipment they need to undertake any tasks assigned to them as part of possible operations. The safety and well-being of our Service personnel are of paramount importance. Where appropriate, we should look to compare capabilities to those available in the 1991 Gulf War."

326. Details of the key shortfalls were provided in an annex, which largely reflected the advice to Gen Walker of 21 January. Additional information included:

- As 3 Commando Brigade and deploying RAF personnel had been fully equipped with desert clothing, there were "no remaining stocks". An additional 32,500 sets would be delivered on 7 March and the full requirement would be available on 28 March. It would need to be airlifted into theatre.
- Sufficient ECBA plates would be available "to equip the entire force" by 7 March and there was confidence that "the full ECBA capability" could be delivered "before the committal of any ground troops".
- The unavailability of COLPRO for AFVs remained the same, although the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory (DSTL) had provided advice that reduced the number of filter changes required "while maintaining sufficient protection for the crew". Even the reduced number could not be resourced and "the limited in-service stocks" would "therefore require prioritisation".

327. On the same day, as instructed at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 22 January, Air Chief Marshal Sir Malcolm Pledger, Chief of Defence Logistics (CDL), wrote to Adm Boyce about which capability and sustainability UORs were unavailable within current timelines.[156] Those were listed in an annex which was consistent with other briefings on the shortfalls.

328. Referring to the inability to approach industry earlier and the constraint placed upon funds while arrangements were agreed with the Treasury, ACM Pledger stated that Adm Boyce should be aware of "the relative success" that had been achieved by the DLO.

---

[156] Minute CDL to PSO/CDS, 24 January 2003, 'UOR/Operational Sustainability Issues'.

329. ACM Pledger wrote:

> "No strategic issues, that would deny UK the option to conduct a military campaign, arose within the UOR/Operational Sustainability staffing, hence it has not been raised at COS(O) by CDL or DCDS(EC). However, regular briefing has occurred through the established DCMO [Defence Crisis Management Organisation] process (Iraq Stocktakes and through SPG); PJHQ briefings (both at CJO's Jt Comd's Seminars and through the range of staff level planning meetings, which includes FLC representation). These briefings repeatedly flagged the consequences of defining force packages without the full knowledge of the impact of the associated logistic and capability enhancements on the basic plan."

330. ACM Pledger added that Adm Boyce "should feel assured" that the DLO was "wholly focused" on its delivery of UORs and would "continue to make every effort to synchronise the delivery of these equipments to theatre in a timely manner".

331. Lord Bach chaired his first meeting about UORs on 27 January.[157] The points recorded from the introductory discussion included:

- Given that "authority fully to engage industry had only been received on 2nd December, the time scales were challenging."
- The high priority requirements for Packages 0-2 were "capable of being met by 28th February". The "key risks" were now the UK's ability to "deliver, fit and train on UOR equipment whilst the force was deploying to or in theatre". In respect to Packages 0-2, these risks were considered "manageable".
- The compression of timescales and expansion of Package 3 meant an "increased risk that package 3 UORs would not be delivered before operations commenced". None of the resultant shortfalls were assessed as being a "showstopper" but "we would only be clear of the operational implications once detailed plans had been worked up".
- "[W]hatever the operational significance of delays in delivering UORs", it was expected that media would focus on "equipment shortcomings"; being well prepared to win the "presentational argument was vital". That was not just to preserve the MOD's reputation, but was "a key aspect of securing and preserving public support for the whole enterprise".
- A "key question for the future" was why the forces "were not better prepared for the kind of operations now in prospect", given the conclusions of the SDR about the likelihood of operations in the Middle East. The UK "needed to be more intelligent" about its holdings of certain long-term lead items such as desert clothing, NBC filters and COLPRO, and about "the extent to which equipment was capable of operating at a range of environmental conditions".

---

[157] Minute PS/Minister(DP) to MA/DCDS(EC), 27 January 2003, 'Iraq: Op TELIC UORs'.

332. The meeting discussed particular shortfalls, including:

- There was a need to "find a better way of explaining the improvements" being made to Challenger 2 tanks.
- There was still no assurance that the US would loan Combat ID assets – Lt Gen Reith was being briefed "to raise this personally" with General Tommy Franks, Commander US Central Command (CENTCOM).
- " …[I]nnovative measures were in place to acquire sufficient stocks of desert clothing and boots for at least two sets to be provided to all personnel in theatre by mid-March" and Lord Bach asked officials to review with industry the practicality of extending the number of personnel issued with three sets to cover all those deploying.
- There remained concerns about NBC capabilities – Lord Bach requested further advice on the operational risk within three days.

333. On 28 January, Mr Hoon asked Adm Boyce for "a clear recommendation from the Chiefs of Staff" as to whether UK forces could "participate in the operational plan as currently understood, particularly the potential start of major ground operations on 3 March".[158]

334. If this was not possible, Adm Boyce was asked on what date land forces could participate and what date would be the "implied start of initial combat operations". The advice was requested by 3pm the following day.

335. ACM Bagnall's Private Office replied on 29 January, stating:

> "There are, in absolute terms, no showstoppers. In the case of maritime forces, all UORs should be in place by 28 February. Some contractual risk remains, but the systems involved carry a low operational risk. In the air environment, the force will be ready for operation by 28 February …
> "The land environment carries the greatest risk in two areas: Challenger 2 and Combat Identification."[159]

336. The work in hand for Challenger 2 vehicles suggested that their availability and serviceability would "improve significantly" by 18 March when certain modifications were due to be completed. The situation would improve again after 7 April when new filters were fitted.

337. For Combat ID, systems to improve situational awareness within the UK and US forces were currently being evaluated in Germany. It was "not yet clear" whether they could "be integrated into a UK vehicle in the time available" but early indications were that the work was "proceeding well".

[159] Minute MA/VCDS to PS/SofS [MOD], 29 January 2003, 'Iraq – UORs'.

338. ACM Bagnall's Private Office concluded:

> "In sum, if the start date for land operations is delayed, there will be greater time to embody the required land UORs. However, as I have noted earlier, there are no showstoppers."

339. The minutes of the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 29 January recorded that the "focus had shifted to what equipment was being delivered rather than what was being procured".[160] It was important that "all measures were taken" to ensure that equipment was fitted and not just made available. A "coherent plan was required with clear guidance on the division of responsibilities for ensuring equipment was available to units in theatre".

340. There was "a concern over the availability of desertised Challenger 2s" and, although the Land Component Commander was content with the current position, Adm Boyce "noted that it would clearly be better if availability was improved as a result of any slip in campaign timelines that allowed extra UOR work to be completed".

CONCERNS ABOUT COMBAT ID

341. Concerns about the provision of Combat ID and whether previous lessons had been learned were raised in both Houses of Parliament.

342. On 18 December 2002, Mr Hoon made a statement in the House of Commons on contingency preparations for possible military action in Iraq.[161]

343. Mr Hoon was asked by Mr Mark Prisk for an assurance that, "given the recent tragic incidents of friendly fire in different theatres of war", all deployed UK service personnel would have the equipment "they need to communicate speedily and effectively with friendly units".[162]

344. Mr Hoon replied:

> "I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising a serious and important point. I assure him that efforts are being made to ensure that that is the case."

345. Combat ID was raised as an issue on 20 December in Lt Gen Pigott's UOR update.[163] He stated that it was:

> " … a vulnerable issue in presentational terms, particularly following the NAO report, but it is an issue that has not moved forward recently. Resolution has been thwarted while the UK awaits the formulation of US policy by CENTCOM."

346. Gen Walker responded to Lt Gen Pigott the same day, stating that he remained "uneasy over Combat ID".[164] He continued:

> "I understand that we are currently awaiting the formulation of coherent US policy … I am conscious that significant effort has been made at various levels to press this issue with CENTCOM but that, in the main, the bottom up approach has been adopted. Given the operational implication of not developing a coherent coalition policy and the presentational aspects of Combat ID, I believe that we can no longer afford to prevaricate. The issue now needs to be aired at the highest levels within CENTCOM."

347. Mr Watkins wrote on Mr Hoon's copy of the note: "He is right to focus on the presentational risks: this issue was raised in the House on Wednesday."[165]

348. On 7 January 2003, Mr Hoon was asked in the House of Commons what lessons had been learned from the past to ensure that British forces were equipped against the risk of friendly fire.[166] He replied:

> "… we are engaged in a process of ensuring that combat identification is dealt with satisfactorily. There is no single technical solution to that difficult problem, but we will acquire new equipment that will be available in time for any potential conflict in the Gulf … I can assure the House that British troops will be able to work alongside American forces entirely safely and satisfactorily."

349. A junior MOD officer provided a DCRS official with a Combat ID update on the same day.[167] He first gave an overview of the work being done in NATO's development of a BTID which set "a basic technical requirement to be able to identify 'friend' or 'unknown' on the battlefield" and which had been endorsed by eight countries.

350. On Iraq, the officer stated that the Combat ID UOR was "still being scoped" and summarised what the requirement was likely to encompass.

351. A UOR was being developed to mirror "ad-hoc" US measures being considered for forthcoming operations:

> "The UK has been anything but dilatory in developing a technological Combat ID capability. We have actually been a leading light in this area. That no solution is yet available anywhere in the world reflects merely the complexity of achieving a satisfactory technical solution to an extremely challenging requirement. The complexity is exacerbated by the need for international consensus on any solution.

> "To meet the requirement in the short term, current UOR action will give the UK an identical Combat ID solution to that deployed by the US. In the circumstances, this is as close to the ideal as we could have hoped to achieve."

352. AVM Loader provided a summary note of work in progress on Combat ID for ACM Bagnall, recording that, "contrary to press speculation, progress continues to be made since the conflict in the Gulf", but that "notwithstanding any measures taken or currently under consideration, fratricide will always remain a real risk in the heat of conflict".[168]

353. AVM Loader explained that work continued but progress had been slow because measures could not be developed in isolation. The alignment of UK measures with those in the US had "been hampered by the lack of a coherent policy" but, to ensure that some capability could be delivered in time, UORs had been based upon assumptions agreed with key stakeholders and US Department of Defense and Army staff.

354. At the request of ACM Bagnall, the update was circulated to MOD Ministers and the Chiefs of Staff.

355. In the House of Lords on 9 January, Lord Bach was asked about the availability of satisfactory Combat ID equipment for British troops in any potential Gulf conflict.[169] He replied:

> "… we take combat identification and the risk of friendly fire extremely seriously … Lives depend on it. We believe that our combat identification procedures are effective. We have deployed successfully as a country on many operations since the tragedies in this field during the Gulf conflict. There have been no reported incidents of fratricide, or blue on blue, involving UK forces. I say that with caution because whatever technology one puts in, and however sophisticated it may be, these things sometimes happen.
> "In the event of military action, British troops will be fully interoperable with United States troops for combat identification. That capability, including new equipment options, are [sic] currently being procured."

356. One of the questions put to Mr Hoon by Mr Jenkin in the House of Commons on 20 January (referred to earlier in this Section) was whether British troops would have access to electronic identification equipment, already fitted to US tanks and armour, to prevent the risk of fratricide.[170] Mr Hoon replied:

> " … a question I dealt with when I made my last statement, action is in hand to procure the necessary equipment to ensure that the equipment used by our forces is in every way compatible with the equipment that the United States is using."

357. Combat ID was raised at the House of Commons Liaison Committee by Mr Michael Mates on 21 January.[171] When asked by Mr Mates whether he was "happy" that British soldiers were most likely to be killed by "our own people rather than the enemy", Mr Blair answered:

> "We are looking at everything we can do for combat identification. I think the procedures are far better now than those that were in place at the time of the Gulf War. I have asked for discussions on this very issue so we can make sure we are doing everything we possibly and conceivably can. From previous conflicts we know it is a risk and we have got to do everything we can to provide against it. I know there has been a lot of work done on this and there have been joint operations carried out in order to test the effectiveness of it. Obviously it is something we have to carry on looking at carefully."

358. When pushed for further details by Mr Mates, Mr Blair added that the capability was:

> "… in a significantly better shape than it was back at the Gulf War ten years ago. The very reason I have asked to be kept closely informed as to what is happening on it is because this is one of the things we need to make sure of."

359. PJHQ confirmed on 29 January that the US had agreed to the loan of 43 Combat ID systems for use by British forces.[172]

PROGRESS ON UORS

360. As concerns over equipment shortfalls persisted, Ministers asked for industry "to be pressed again" on whether they could work faster to meet requirements.

361. They were told that industry was working to capacity and "any significant improvement" in delivery profiles should not be anticipated.

362. The risk of CW attacks was assessed as low, but the UK's NBC protective capability would be "initially fragile".

363. The update on UORs on 31 January informed Lord Bach that:

- 143 equipment UORs, at a value of £437m, and 108 sustainability UORs had been approved. A further 18 USURs had been endorsed by PJHQ and business cases were being developed.
- All personnel would be issued with three sets of desert clothing by the end of March and follow-on orders were being investigated to procure sustainment stocks for the summer. It was forecast that desert boots would be available for the whole force by "mid-March".

- The risks associated with a 30 percent shortfall in COLPRO filters for AFVs were being assessed.[173]

364. Lord Bach chaired a second UOR meeting on 3 February.[174] In addition to the points in the 31 January update, the record of the meeting stated:

- Lord Bach asked for the pressure on industry "to be kept up" on the delivery of desert clothing and had "stressed the need to work hard to rebut the idea" that troops were "ill-equipped" for the environmental conditions.
- The risk assessment for the shortfall of COLPRO filters "against the worst case requirement" was ongoing and expected by the end of the week; Lord Bach "would be grateful for urgent sight of the headlines from this work, together with advice on the operational penalties".
- Based upon the current shipping plan of filters, a "two fold increase in the capability" of all deployed Challenger 2 tanks was expected by 18 March and a "four fold increase" by 7 April. Lord Bach sought confirmation that that remained the case.
- Concerns remained about "the ability of AS90 to operate in hot and dusty conditions". The necessary modifications were not expected to be delivered into theatre until the end of March and "would each take 63 man-hours to fit". Lord Bach asked for industry "to be pressed again on whether they cannot work faster to meet the requirement" and welcomed advice on the operational implications.
- The US was "being helpful" and the loan of Combat ID systems had been agreed with "the issue now being how they will be deployed".
- Aside from the timing of completing outstanding UORs ("which was tight"), the "key residual concerns related to Combat ID and NBC protection".

365. On 7 February, AM Stirrup advised Lord Bach that 156 business cases for equipment UORs and 108 sustainability UORs had been approved.[175]

366. AM Stirrup wrote that the operational risk associated with the lack of NBC filters for AFVs had been assessed as "minimal". The Directorate of Joint Warfare (DJW) had assessed the probability of a CW attack on all deployed AFVs as "low" and that filters could therefore "be managed on a theatre-wide basis". The UK's NBC capability would be "initially fragile" but would become "more robust by mid-March" as UORs were delivered, in-service equipment was refurbished and surge training completed.

367. There were "no major concerns" regarding the availability of desertisation filters for the Challenger 2 tanks but it was unlikely that industry would be able to advance the delivery of measures for the AS90. The level of operational risk would be determined by weather conditions but was "not deemed to be significant".

368. The Senior British Liaison Officer in theatre was examining when Combat ID systems would become available and was in discussions with the US. An initial operating capability for light forces was expected by late February, with a full operating capability "available not later than 18 March".

369. On the same day, Lt Gen Reith received a letter from Sir Robert Walmsley, the Chief of Defence Procurement, about the challenges created by an increase in the quantities of equipment to be delivered by air and sea as a result of the compressed timescales before military action.[176] He believed the DPA could deliver what was required and that those capabilities would reach the front line. He added:

> "We continue to press Industry whom I am confident are doing all that they can to achieve early delivery. Industry is, however, now working to capacity and I would not anticipate any significant improvement in the currently projected delivery profiles."

370. In discussing AM Stirrup's update, Lord Bach's meeting on 10 February noted that while the UK's NBC capability was judged to be fragile:

> " … all that could be done to improve NBC protection capabilities was being done … The bottom line was if the Iraqis launched repeated mass attacks, operational effectiveness would be impaired; but we did not believe that they could do so."[177]

371. The record of the meeting also stated:

> "… it was noteworthy that a number of deficiencies with which we were currently grappling (Combat ID, DAS [Defensive Aid Suites] for transport aircraft, equipment readiness, desertisation) had been identified in post-GRANBY lessons learned reports …"

Reporting equipment issues from theatre

On 11 February 2003, Lord Bach requested advice by the end of that week on whether a direct link from theatre for reporting equipment issues should be established, and how the reporting might work.[178]

The advice had not been received by 17 February.[179] The record of the meeting stated:

> "The Minister attached real importance to this and would like advice on what mechanism might be devised – presumably through the ECC [Equipment Capability Customer] organisation – for making it happen."

ACM Bagnall replied on 21 February:

> "… there is a need to avoid cutting across established and well understood command chains from theatre, through CJO, to CDS. Beyond that, given the large number of people who are at geographically remote locations in theatre – some of whom are still en route and many are in the process of acclimatisation and preparation for possible operations – it would be very difficult for an agent outside the command chain to keep an eye on the many equipment issues which may arise."[180]

ACM Bagnall acknowledged "fully" the need for "a rapid and timely information flow" that could quickly alert Ministers to potential equipment issues and facilitate a swift response. He wrote that Lt Gen Reith had "taken steps to alert DCDS(EC) as a matter of urgency to any matters which require his attention" and similar arrangements were in place in terms of the interface with the DLO.

A handwritten note on ACM Bagnall's minute from Lord Bach's Private Office stated:

> "Minister the predictable answer: VCDS agreed with Jock [Stirrup] but the COS wouldn't wear it. So I think we'll have to live with this."[181]

372. On 14 February, AM Stirrup reported that 161 equipment UORs, at a value of "some £472m", and 110 sustainability UORs at a value of £310m had been approved.[182] He stated:

- Combat ID equipment trials had been successful.
- There were "currently no major concerns regarding the availability of desert clothing".

373. At the meeting on 17 February, Lord Bach was advised that "the suite of Combat ID equipment had been delivered to contract" and would be fitted in theatre.[183]

374. It was also reported that there was "increased confidence in the DLO in the robustness of the timetable for the delivery of desert clothing to those that need it".

375. On NBC capabilities, the record stated:

> "… concerns remain about the availability of various NBC consumables, on which advice will be submitted next week. Aside from operational implications, the Minister believes that we need very carefully to handle presentational aspects of this. He was particularly concerned to hear that stocks of time expired ComboPens[184] have recently re-lifed (following testing at Porton Down) and are being issued with revised documentation making clear that they are now assessed as being useable up until 2004."

376. The Chiefs of Staff meeting on 19 February was advised that:

"… the US definition of FOC [Full Operating Capability] was when a unit achieved 80% readiness. 7 Armd Bde would therefore be declared at FOC without its full suite of UORs. CDS directed that Ministers be informed of this interpretation of FOC so that they were not caught out on UOR issues."[185]

377. In mid-February, the MOD told Mr Blair that British troops would be adequately protected in the event of a BW or CW attack.

378. A Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessment on 19 February judged that southern Iraq was "the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition Forces and the local population" in the event of coalition military action.[186] It did not address the likelihood of a CBW attack.

379. On 20 February, Mr Blair asked the MOD for advice on a number of detailed questions following the publication of a report on Iraq by the International Institute of Strategic Studies.[187] That paper is addressed in detail in Section 6.5.

380. One question asked by Mr Blair was: "What is the prospect of a pre-emptive BW or CW attack on our troops in Kuwait, and are we certain we are adequately prepared and our troops protected?"

381. The MOD replied that Iraq retained the capability "(through a variety of means) to pre-emptively deliver CBW against Coalition Forces in Kuwait".[188] The question was "one of intent". In the MOD's view it remained "highly unlikely whilst Saddam believes war can be averted". If he was convinced that war was "inevitable and imminent" that "might make a pre-emptive move more attractive" but it was "more likely that Saddam would deploy CBW after the onset of the campaign".

382. The planned levels of NBC defence equipment "should enable all troops to withstand initial BW or CW attack".

383. The UOR update on 21 February informed Lord Bach that 167 business cases had been approved, accounting for "some £478m" of the £500m allocated by the Treasury.[189] Sustainability UORs, at a total cost of £318m, had also been approved.

384. The update also stated:

- Further to ACM Bagnall's note earlier that day, PJHQ had set up a "comprehensive system to review, prioritise and then move UOR equipment into theatre" once delivery dates were known by industry.
- New respirator testing procedures had been introduced to ensure that deployed personnel would "be adequately protected" after trials found that a proportion of respirators did not fit properly.
- There was a shortfall of 15,000 ComboPens out of a total requirement for 135,000, but "every effort" was being made to procure more and "re-life existing stock".
- 1,000 additional Challenger 2 filters were being procured to support predicted operation activity.
- A plan had been produced for the installation of Combat ID equipment into selected vehicles.
- The 96 fully modified battlefield ambulances were expected to be available for shipping by "13/14 March". There were currently only 24 air conditioned ambulances in theatre.
- The delivery of desert clothing, including ECBA covers, was progressing well.

385. By the end of February, there were "significant" and "severe" shortfalls in parts of the UK's NBC protective capability.

386. The Chiefs of Staff were told that that reflected the compressed timescales for planning.

387. The Chiefs of Staff received an update on access to CBRN equipment and NBC protection on 28 February.[190] The paper reported "significant" and "severe" shortfalls in a number of NBC areas including the availability of Nerve Agent Immobilised Enzyme Alarm Detectors (NAIAD), Residual Vapour Detectors (RVD) and NBC water bottle tops. There was, however, a "marked improvement" in ComboPen availability.

388. The paper stated:

> "The compressed timescales available to procure UORs necessarily introduced risk in achieving earliest possible delivery of all equipments … some shortfalls are now being exposed."

389. Lord Bach received the latest equipment update on the same day, reporting that 173 equipment UORs (totalling "some £487m") and £320m of operational sustainability requirements had been approved.[191]

[191] Minute DCDS(EC) to PS/Minister(DP), 28 February 2003, 'Iraq: Op TELIC UORs'.

390. On "CBRN Risks":

- The "most significant issue" was that the majority of RVDs had been found to be unserviceable, but that a "workaround" solution had been found. It had been agreed with DJW and PJHQ that this was "not a showstopper" although it would "impose a degree of operational degradation" which would increase as temperatures in theatre rose.
- New respirators were being procured and it was expected that this delivery would "enable 99.5% of personnel" to have a respirator that would fit them.
- Further investigation had revealed there were sufficient stocks of ComboPens.
- Further briefing would be provided to the Chiefs of Staff the following week.

391. An attached annex on the overall sustainability assessment of equipment stated that helicopter support remained fragile, despite a reduction in flying hours. That was attributed to long lead times for spare parts, and "historic levels of STP [Short Term Plan] funding".

392. On 3 March, Adm Boyce was advised by Lt Gen Reith that equipment procured through UORs was being prioritised for fitting and being carefully monitored, but it was "probable" that some equipment would not be in service as the UK crossed "the line of departure".[192] The "some" was referenced with a footnote stating: "The original RDD [Required Delivery Date] for the UORs was 31 March 03."

393. Priorities had been set by PJHQ based on four categories:

- Priority 1: "UORs with the potential to delay the start of operations", including Combat ID, Challenger 2 desertisation measures, NBC equipment and battlefield ambulances.
- Priority 2: UORs that enhance combat operations.
- Priority 3: "enablers" for aftermath operations.
- Priority 4: "Others".

394. Lt Gen Reith wrote that the late delivery of some UORs meant that deployment and prioritisation issues would become "more acute" as the date for operations approached. He added: "Any decision not to fit a UOR will be based on operational advice by theatre and recorded."

395. The record of Lord Bach's meeting on 3 March stated:

> "… the major remaining area of concern was in NBC. Although things were not as bad as had been feared, with the respirator and ComboPen issues – for the time being – resolved, there were still outstanding concerns about some aspects of our CBRN 'layered defence.'"[193]

[193] Minute APS/Minister(DP) to MA/DCDS(EC), 3 March 2003, 'Iraq – Op TELIC – UORs'.

396. Those included NAIADS, RVDs and NBC water bottle tops. The replacement to NAIADs would not be available before April, RVDs should be delivered into theatre by 14 March and "industry was working flat out" to try and overcome the problem of water bottle tops. The Chiefs of Staff would discuss NBC at their next meeting.

397. The meeting also noted that the sustainability of helicopters was "a concern, including sand filters for Lynx" aircraft.

398. A 'CBRN Risk Overview' was circulated to the Chiefs of Staff on 3 March.[194] It stated:

> "For operations launched at 15th March 03 we believe that our overall CBRN defence remains fragile against a sustained CBRN attack … Against the more likely scenario of occasional limited short range attacks our defences are less fragile. The fragile assessment is based on a combination of the quality and quantity of some key equipment, the lack of priority to deploy equipment via AT [Air Transport] (PJHQ assessment is that these items are low priority assets) to front line personnel and on the estimated CBRN training state. Further equipment improvements will be limited even as at 15th April."

399. On 4 March, Lord Bach and Dr Lewis Moonie, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence and Minister for Veterans' Affairs, received a briefing about "a number of CBRN issues currently running" in the media.[195] It stated that, "given the WMD context of our case for confronting Saddam Hussein", it was important to "first emphasise our overall confidence in our NBC defence against any perceived threat".

400. If the UK's assessment that CBRN defences were fragile became more widely known, Ministers should adopt the line that they were not prepared to comment and that "the protection of our people is our top priority".

401. Internally, it was "imperative" that personnel had confidence in the CBRN protective measures in place and an "open and honest dialogue" about any shortfalls should be adopted, reassuring them about "the robustness of the overall system". The areas where progress had been made should be stressed.

402. A separate annex provided lines to take against each of the NBC equipment items that could raise concerns.

403. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 5 March, Rear Admiral Charles Style, Capability Manager (Strategic Development), said that CBRN risks were "attracting Ministerial attention".[196] Lord Bach had asked that "CBRN issues" be given priority for air transport, which was being done in conjunction with the Operational Command's priorities.

404. Adm Boyce stated that "the provision of correctly fitted respirators continued to cause him considerable concern".

405. Maj Gen Fry reported that "there would be as few as 200 personnel who could not satisfactorily be protected through existing arrangements". Relocating those individuals "could ameliorate the problem, but there was a presentational issue".

406. ACM Bagnall was directed to lead on the issues and to ensure that Mr Tony Pawson, MOD Director General Corporate Communications, was engaged.

407. RAdm Style wrote to ACM Bagnall later that day reporting:

> "Sufficient equipment (the Respirator Test System and additional Respirators) and necessary support are available … DCJO(Ops) has reported that he anticipates the majority of testing to be complete by about 10 March. I shall seek confirmation of their arrival and the expected testing timetable in time for Friday's Ministerial brief."[197]

408. ACM Bagnall wrote to the Directorate of Operational Capability (DOC), explaining that he was progressing the respirator issues as "a matter of urgency" but there was also a need to note the CBRN shortfalls in the wider Operation TELIC lesson process to "be clear about why we have got into this situation".[198] He raised several questions to illustrate his point including:

- "who is responsible for what aspects of the CBRN defence spectrum"; and
- "who is responsible for ensuring that individual units, ships etc are in date and properly equipped to operate in an NBC environment?"

409. A paper was circulated to the Chiefs of Staff on 7 March about respirator fit testing by the DJW, highlighting that it had raised issues "both in policy terms and dealing with the impact on the individual as the results are exposed".[199]

410. The DJW recommended the Chiefs of Staff agree that:

- Individuals who did not attain an optimum fit after testing were provided with the respirator that afforded "the best attainable level of protection, i.e. 'best fit'".
- Solutions for the residual 0.5 percent of individuals were being pursued: "At this stage it is impossible to predict whether a solution will be found in the time available."
- Advice to the Combined Joint Task Force should be "that individuals who cannot achieve an optimum fit should, where possible, only be deployed in areas where the NBC risk is assessed as lower".

411. The UOR update for Lord Bach on 7 March highlighted:

- 176 business cases for equipment capability UORs had been approved at a cost of "some £488m".
- The list of UORs for the post-conflict phase, Phase IV, continued to be "urgently developed in parallel with the ongoing work" to develop more detailed planning guidance and CONOPS. It was likely to focus on potential shortfalls relating to force protection, infrastructure requirements and Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR).
- Agreement was being sought from the Treasury to increase the total UOR funding for Phase III by a further £60m. The funding for Phase IV had been discussed at official level.[200]

412. The update stated that the Integrated Project Team (IPT)[201] was "actively assessing" another source to assist in the production of desert pattern NBC suits. There was a requirement for 94,000 suits, but the contracted supplier could only produce 1,000 a week from the beginning of April (when the cloth to make the suits became available), and 4,000 plus a week by mid-June.

413. The DLO had issued sufficient ComboPens for the number of personnel deployed but "the precise location in theatre of approximately 4,000 [wa]s unconfirmed". Stocks had been withdrawn from UK-based warships to mitigate the risk. There would be sufficient water bottle tops to satisfy all demands by 10 March "and leave a reserve".

414. Two UOR sets of sand filters for Lynx helicopters would be delivered by 21 March with a further three refurbished sets. Further spares would be available from 31 March and the supplier was producing an additional four sets "at risk" which would be available from mid-April at a rate of one every two weeks. The MOD was not yet committed to a contract for these sets but the requirement was likely to be a "high priority" for Phase IV.

415. At a Chiefs of Staff meeting on 10 March, Lt Gen Reith reported that:

> "A full check of in-theatre NBC equipment and redistribution had been completed, but respirator fitting had been slower than anticipated and was now expected to complete on 18 Mar."[202]

416. The record of Lord Bach's meeting on 10 March stated:

> "CBRN was in a better position than thought last week … by 17 March all personnel would have their optimum fit of respirator. The testing was the most advanced in the world – all personnel had successfully been through the CS gas chamber in their respirator – we were now providing better still protection. > would have to decide how best to employ the 0.5% who did not have a perfect fit … NBC clothing and canisters were also no longer problem areas, although desert camouflage NBC suits were not yet available (but this was only a matter of their colour, not the materials). COLPRO was not being raised in theatre as a significant problem. The only outstanding issue on ComboPens was providing 600 to the BBC …"[203]

417. An updated paper on NBC respirator policy was sent to the Chiefs of Staff on 11 March.[204] It stated that alternative solutions to the fitting problem and the expected 0.5 percent of individuals who failed to achieve an optimum fit had been, and continued to be, "vigorously pursued" with DSTL and industry. Three possible solutions had emerged but it was impossible to predict whether or when these could be fielded, "but certainly not before 17th March".

418. The DJW intended to provide "a field commander's risk guide" to Lt Gen Reith by 13 March on deploying individuals who could not achieve an optimum fit.

419. The guide was circulated on 12 March.[205]

420. In his report following a visit to see the forces preparing for operations in Kuwait, General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff from February 2003 to August 2006, wrote on 10 March:

> "The one area of the media feeding frenzy that has some justification lies in the readiness of stocks for expeditionary operations. The introduction of resource accounting has created an imperative to drive down stockholdings. As a result, in the name of accounting orthodoxy we lack basic items such as desert clothing. I am unsure whether the cost of storing such items would really have been more than the inflated price we have no doubt paid by procurement under UOR action, but I am certain of the negative impact on the moral component that failure to provide these items has had."[206]

421. Gen Jackson wrote that the root of the problem was "partly financial, but also systemic" and there was no mechanism "within the Central Staff to safeguard the operational logistic interest". This had led to "a consistent lack of visibility" of the state of UK holdings.

The situation in the week before the invasion

422. Adm Boyce assured Mr Blair that there were "no serious equipment problems" on 13 March.

423. Mr Blair held a meeting to discuss the military plan and timetable with Mr John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce on 13 March.[207] At the meeting, Adm Boyce "assured the Prime Minister that the Armed Forces faced no serious equipment problems".[208]

424. On 14 March, RAdm Style reported to Lord Bach that:

- 178 equipment UOR business cases had now been approved at a cost of "some £494m";
- 9 UORs had been accepted into service over the previous week;
- the manufacturer of desert NBC suits had revealed that production for the suits could not start "as early as we had hoped and will not deliver the first items until mid-April, a delay of 2 weeks";
- the delivery of RVD tickets to theatre had been delayed, and was expected to be complete by 19 March; and
- while the DLO was confident that sufficient ComboPens had been delivered to theatre, this could not be confirmed until the re-allocation exercise currently under way had been completed.[209]

425. On desert clothing, RAdm Style wrote:

> "Sufficient desert clothing for the entire force was ordered in Dec 02 with an ISD of 31 March 03, with a small in-service reserve being available as a result of 3 Cdo Bde and 16 Air Asslt Bde personnel retaining their clothing from Op JACANA. Although pressed to advance their production and delivery schedules, few contractors have been successful … Across the desert clothing range, at least 70% of all deliveries are complete and in theatre, broadly equivalent to 2 sets per man, not counting those personnel already equipped before deployment. Providing contractor delivery profiles are met, we expect all outstanding demands to reach depots by 19 March and to be with personnel by the end of the month. There are some exceptions; desert helmet covers … and floppy hats … will not be delivered to depots until nearer the end of the month."

426. Lt Gen Reith provided Adm Boyce with an update on the redistribution of NBC equipment in theatre on the same day.[210] He wrote that "sufficient" NBC Individual Protective Equipment had been deployed, but "some stocks required redistribution to ensure that all personnel had their initial allocation of 3 suits". The redistribution of the maritime component was 100 percent complete, the land contingent 97 percent, and the air contingent 70 percent complete.

427. As part of the final battle preparations, the contingent was completing NBC respirator testing but, because 1 (UK) Div needed to move forward to assembly areas, its General Officer Commanding (GOC), Major General Robin Brims, had decided to suspend that process. Lt Gen Reith "strongly" supported this decision from an operational perspective and said he could restart the process of testing "if time allows". He added:

> "In terms of risk, his manoeuvre units would prove difficult targets, once battle begins. However the more static units in the Divisional Support Group and Joint Force Logistic Component would be at greater risk and thus I have directed that testing should continue for them. The Maritime and Air contingents will also complete the process."

428. Lt Gen Reith added: "Clearly Ministers will need to be informed."

429. In the record of Lord Bach's meeting on 17 March, the key points included:

- other than "the ongoing work on Phase IV", there were "no major outstanding UOR issues";
- a flexible approach was needed on whether to continue with undelivered UORs "as circumstances develop";
- there was "a 100 tonne backlog of equipment" waiting to be delivered to theatre;
- there were now "no significant outstanding NBC issues except on delivery of RVD tickets into theatre"; and
- "notwithstanding helmet covers and floppy hats, which were taking slightly longer than hoped for, 80% of clothing and boots ordered had been delivered and prioritised in theatre. The overall figure of 'desertised personnel' was higher, as it included those who had already been issued with desert kit for Op JACANA."[211]

430. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 19 March, it was reported that only 3 percent of the land component's respirators had been checked, "the work having been overtaken by other events in-theatre".[212]

431. On 21 March, AM Stirrup reported to Lord Bach that 183 business cases for UORs had been approved at a cost of £497m.[213]

432. Desertisation measures for the Challenger 2 vehicles had been delivered to theatre in the past week (the fitting process of which was ongoing), along with Combat ID equipment for all vehicles and ECBA, meaning that all unit demands for the latter had been met.

433. AM Stirrup also reported that "a problem with packaging" had led to a "small delay" in the provision of new books of RVD tickets. The last 450 were received on 20 March and should arrive in theatre that day.

Issues that emerged post-invasion

434. After the invasion began, it became clear that some personnel had not been equipped with desert clothing and body armour, there were difficulties with NBC equipment, and there were shortages of ammunition.

435. Lord Bach complained that he did not have visibility of equipment issues at the front line.

436. The reasons for the problems were not identified until 9 May.

437. On 4 April, Lt Gen Reith wrote to ACM Bagnall:

> "I can assure DCDS(EC) that the chain of command is working well and that an embedded DPA LO [Liaison Officer] in theatre would have made no difference to the current situation. My staff monitor equipment availability on a daily basis and the DLO LO embedded in my Headquarters liaises regularly with relevant IPTs and other agencies concerning the flow of UORs from industry into theatre."[214]

438. On 8 April, Lord Bach's Private Office wrote to Brigadier Derek Jeffrey, MOD Director of Logistics Operations,[215] seeking clarity on the reliability of AFVs following a negative press article.[216]

439. The article had also suggested that there was a shortage of desert clothing and boots which sat "a little oddly with the assurances that the Minister has repeatedly been given about the availability of clothing and the arrangements for distributing it in theatre".

440. Lord Bach's Private Office wrote:

> "The fact that there are continued rumblings about such basic requirements as this begs a wider question: are there other items that have been delivered by industry to the department but have yet to be distributed to all those that need them in theatre? Lord Bach has been briefed over recent weeks on the acceptance into service of a range of UORs. But he has very little visibility of the extent to which such items have actually reached the front line."

441. Brig Jeffrey replied on 10 April.[217]

442. Lord Bach was informed that there were "some unsatisfied demands due to sizing issues but new stock from contractors should clear these in the very near future". The full requirement for boots was "the greatest concern and may not be fully met until the end of April".

443. Brig Jeffrey added:

> "Notwithstanding that sufficient clothing is now in theatre to meet demands … some individuals have not received any clothing. There are a number of reasons for this ranging from unit ordering errors to consignments being mis-located or being pushed down the priority list in theatre. The DLO in the UK and the JFLogC [Joint Force Logistic Component] in theatre are urgently carrying out an audit and progressively the problem is being ameliorated."

444. Brig Jeffrey wrote that the DLO, DPA, PJHQ, and National Contingent Headquarters (NCHQ) did "not have good visibility of the fast moving situation in the Division with regards to UOR fitting". That had meant "information on exactly what UORs had been fully fitted was not always available, nor was it prudent to press the Divisional staffs for this information at the height of battle".

445. Lord Bach's Private Office replied on 11 April, acknowledging the points raised and adding:

> "But I think he [Lord Bach] will be interested to understand exactly which of the UORs on which he has been briefed over recent months were not in the event fitted despite having been available in theatre."[218]

446. The record of Lord Bach's meeting on 14 April highlighted his concern that he did not have "the visibility of equipment issues at the front line that he expected (and which he was reassured would be provided through the chain of command)".[219] His Private Office wrote:

> "An example of the ad hoc nature of this reporting is on Combat ID: the first time Minister(DP) was made aware that CR2s [Challenger 2s] without it were being used operationally was following the blue on blue incident on 25 March. The presentational and moral repercussions had the CR2s in question not been fitted with Combat ID cannot be overstated."

447. Lord Bach sought advice on:

> "(i) the extent to which shortfalls of key items (such as desert clothing) remain in theatre and what action is planned to ameliorate them; (ii) which UORs have been delivered to theatre but not – for whatever reason – passed on to the front line – either in part or in total; and (iii) how the flow of information can be improved so that in future Ministers receive timely and accurate advice on these issues."

448. On 17 April, Maj Gen Fry replied to Lord Bach's request, on behalf of Lt Gen Reith, reporting that "other than the continuing saga of desert combat clothing, there [we]re no other key equipment shortfalls" in theatre.[220] As of 13 April, the "shortfall amounted to 18,300 suits and 12,500 boots". Additional clothing would arrive in theatre by 18 April, meeting the requirement for boots, and reducing the shortfall of suits to 3,275.

449. Maj Gen Fry confirmed that all UORs delivered to theatre were "forwarded to the front line". On Combat ID, he wrote that whilst its delivery into theatre was aligned with Challenger 2, "not all of it could be fitted within the compressed timeline before D-Day" because eight Challenger sets in a container "were temporarily misplaced within Kuwait". Maj Gen Fry stated that the decision to proceed without the full range of Combat ID fitted in some Challengers was the GOC's and implied that was necessary because of US timings.

450. Addressing the issues raised about the flow of information, Maj Gen Fry wrote that the weekly updates on UORs were "a significant staff burden" and that producing them "at any greater frequency would prove counter productive".

451. Commenting on the note to Lord Bach, his Private Office wrote:

> "This is, frankly, pretty dismissive of your concerns … [It] offers no explanation of why the 'desert clothing saga' arose and no guidance on how and when the shortfalls will be addressed … [It] contradicts the earlier advice from the DLO that some UORs had been delivered to theatre but not on to the front line."[221]

452. At his meeting on 28 April, Lord Bach noted that no more UORs for the invasion phase had been raised in the last fortnight, no more were expected, and all were expected to be delivered by 1 May.[222] He therefore agreed that the monitoring of Phase III UOR implementation should cease but perceived a continuing requirement, "for the time being at least", to keep track of the Phase IV UORs.

453. The "bulk of the discussion" focused on "the continuing difficulty experienced by the DLO, DPA and ECC in securing reliable information from theatre about equipment matters" and how best to present publicly what was understood to be "the generally positive news on this front". Lord Bach remained concerned about the flow of information on equipment matters.

454. The record of the meeting stated that Lord Bach believed work should be set in hand urgently "to develop a better handle on the facts of equipment performance (including the extent to which UORs reached users). Identifying and being able to account for potential vulnerabilities would be "vital" to address Parliamentary Questions (PQs) and reports of shortages in desert clothing, boots, ECBA and Combat ID equipment:

> "Ministers will need chapter and verse on these issues, and on any others yet to come to their attention; and they will need it whatever the conclusions of the lessons learned process."

455. Specific questions on desert clothing, boots and UOR delivery were set out in an Annex, including why the desert clothing "saga" came to light "so late in the day", given the attention it received in the run up to operations, and asking for clarification on whether all UORs delivered to theatre were fitted. Lord Bach also sought confirmation that all UORs had been received by the end user for whom they were intended. If not, he requested a list of those that had not been received, with an explanation in each case.

456. The record stated:

> "As I have tried to articulate previously, Minister(DP) is not seeking here to second guess decisions made by commanders in theatre, which he accepts will have been made for very good operational reasons. He simply wants to understand, and be able to defend as required, the facts and the arguments pertaining to these judgements."

457. Lord Bach also wanted to proactively "get the message across" publicly that, in general, equipment performance had "been impressive". He accepted that the MOD should be prepared to acknowledge that "not everything went exactly according to plan and that lessons are, of course, being learnt" but that this should not deter the MOD from highlighting positive news.

458. Mr Paul Flaherty, Head of Civilian Secretariat, PJHQ, replied on 9 May that Op TELIC had been "a great success both in terms of performance of equipment and the successful delivery of an enormous amount of equipment in a very short space of time".[223] He added:

> "… it is also becoming clear that there were problems in theatre, of which we were not aware, in relation to the fitting of UORs and the delivery of kit. At this stage contributory factors appear to include the sheer speed and scale of the deployment, the large number of UOR equipment, the significant advance of G day,[224] and the absence of an in theatre asset-tracking system with the consequent mismatch of people and equipment."

---

[223] Minute PJHQ Civ Sec to PS/Minister(DP), 9 May 2003, 'Iraq: Op TELIC UORs'.

459. On the delivery of UORs to theatre Mr Flaherty wrote:

> "The processes currently in place for tracking UORs only tracks them until they arrive to the original consignee in Theatre. There is therefore no means of tracking whether UORs reached the end user for whom they were intended. Work has been set in train to establish this and separate advice is being submitted by CJO to VCDS."

460. Mr Flaherty also covered the issues of desert clothing and Combat ID in separate annexes which are detailed later in this Section.

461. On Lord Bach's copy of the minute, his Private Secretary wrote:

> "This is – at last – a serious attempt to respond to your concerns about equipment delivery/supply … and acknowledges the importance of providing Ministers with proper advice. The story it tells … about the flow of information from theatre which has obviously been lamentable – is pretty depressing."[225]

462. Mr Flaherty's note was discussed at Lord Bach's meeting on 12 May.[226] Lord Bach believed the note went "a long way to addressing some of the issues he raised about the availability of equipment at the front line". He accepted "the proffered explanation for this" but was "disappointed that a variety of factors" appeared to have undermined the efforts to equip troops as well as possible.

463. The note of the meeting recorded that Lord Bach:

> "… regrets that – aside from the very practical consequence for our people, a number of whom might be expected to complain about having been sent into battle without relatively basic articles of key equipment – an unfortunate side effect has been that the advice provided to Ministers, albeit on the basis of advice from theatre, has turned out in retrospect to be less than wholly accurate. He agrees that these issues, particularly the lack of an effective asset tracking system, will need carefully to be examined during the lessons learned process."

464. In addition to ECBA, desert clothing and Combat ID kit, Lord Bach had heard at a meeting that morning that concerns had been expressed by commanders in theatre about shortages of morphine and NBC equipment. He sought advice on those points by the end of the week.

465. Lt Gen Reith provided a spreadsheet detailing when UORs had been delivered to theatre and an assessment on their effectiveness for ACM Bagnall on 15 May.[227] He explained that there had been "some inaccuracies in earlier reporting from theatre" but those had now been corrected.

466. Lt Gen Reith provided specific briefing that:

- Combat availability of both Challenger 2 and AS90 tanks was "very high" and the desertisation and protection measures for Challenger 2 were fitted before war-fighting. The AS90 desertisation measure was not completed until 4 May "but was not required for war-fighting, although it would have been if hostilities had continued as had been expected".
- The supply of Combat ID was "over-taut" but 1 (UK) Div reported that "there was just enough for equipment in the direct fire zone". The late arrival was due to distribution problems but, where it was supplied, it had been effective.
- There had been a shortfall of ComboPens that was addressed by the issue of "out-of-date pens" as a "last resort". The shortfall was "traceable to enduring manufacturing difficulties, acknowledged in early 02". Alternative provision was being considered but was proving problematic.
- The respirator testing kits had arrived in theatre between 24 February and 7 March "but were subject to a delay in distribution because of the large amounts of higher priority stores, such as CR2 [Challenger 2] and Combat ID UOR equipment".

467. Lt Gen Reith wrote:

> "I draw two valuable lessons from this work:
>
> "(a) In future, we should try to be less reliant on UORs for operations; fitting these in the time available and in austere conditions further stretches an already over-loaded logistic organisation. Thus, there is a strong case for better resourcing and I hope this point now will be accepted where it perhaps has not been in the past.
> "(b) 'Just enough just in time' is probably a flawed policy for military operations. SDR directed that the DLO should only hold that which could not be procured within readiness and preparation time. However, the stock levels held speak for themselves."

468. Lt Gen Reith added that both points had been "exacerbated by the understandable reluctance of Ministers to go early to industry … before formal committal to the operation". He also wrote that the military's commitment was, "as often happens, at a scale beyond that envisaged in the DPAs and thus not fully resourced".

469. Lt Gen Reith reiterated those points on 16 May when he produced a "Top 10 Lessons Identified" document for the DOC.[228]

---

[228] Minute CJO to DOC, 16 May 03, 'Operation TELIC –"Top 10" Lessons Identified – Pre-Deployment and Deployment Phases'.

470. On deployment processes, Lt Gen Reith wrote that it "went well" but "we should caution against too much reliance on chartered air and shipping assets". He stated:

> "There were considerable challenges in tracking equipment, UORs, and stores particularly in theatre, because of inadequacies in the management of the deployed inventory systems, especially an 'end to end' tracking capability. This is an old chestnut which requires addressing urgently."

471. Lt Gen Reith continued:

> "Stockholdings were inadequate for this scale of operation. Understandably Ministers will be reluctant to commit to operations until very late in the day, which means we cannot approach industry early and we will also often be required to do more than envisaged in defence planning assumptions. Thus, the policy of 'just enough just in time' needs urgent review."

472. Brigadier Shaun Cowlam, Commander of 102 Logistics Brigade, wrote in his post operational report in May 2003 that:

> "Despite the success in getting the force into theatre in half the time taken for Op GRANBY, it was clear that poor personnel and equipment readiness across the force added significantly to both logistic and, subsequently, operational risk. Many personnel (particularly augmentees and Reservists) were poorly equipped and briefed for deployment, some arriving in theatre with no combat clothing, respirators, weapons or sleeping systems, and others not knowing which unit or location they were destined for … The lesson is that units should be equipped on deployment to the necessary scales. The argument that in many cases, broken readiness and preparation times explain the shortcomings, ignores the reality that readiness is simply an assumption. Op TELIC has shown that our current assumptions do not reflect operational reality and we are taking unseen risks that we are not managing."[229]

473. On 27 May, ACM Bagnall advised Lord Bach that he was "keen to establish the facts (rather than early anecdotal views) relating to UORs and equipment issues".[230] He wrote:

> "Work on the lessons is well underway and I have taken steps to ensure that specific issues relating to UORs and equipment matters are properly captured. For now it is clear that the tight timeline from the decision to activate the UOR process; the need to properly balance the logistic push from the UK versus the Commander's pull requirement in theatre; asset tracking … will all feature prominently …"

474. On 30 May, a list of all the equipment capability UORs approved for the pre-deployment and invasion phases was produced with an analysis of how they did or did not address equipment capability gaps.[231] It sought to determine where UOR activity was focused, "both in terms of the capability delivered and also in terms of the relationship between UORs and the Equipment Programme".

475. The capability shortfalls addressed by UORs were:

- network-enabled capability 31%;
- force protection 19%;
- force projection 12%;
- counter-terrorism/Special Forces 7%;
- precision strike 3%; and
- other 27%.

476. A breakdown of the UORs in terms of the relationship with capabilities being delivered in the Equipment Programme (EP) showed:

Table 1: The relationship between UORs for the start of Op TELIC and the Equipment Programme

Category of UOR	Number	UOR cost	% by number	% by cost
UORs to meet TELIC-specific requirements	21	£28.6m	11.5%	6%
UORs to fill a gap not previously identified	22	£28.8m	12%	6%
UORs to bring forward capability already in the EP	22	£138.5m	12%	27%
UORs providing a "patch" solution to bridge a gap until the introduction of an EP-funded solution	55	£154.9m	30%	31%
UORs to fill a previously identified capability gap not funded in the EP	63	£149.3m	34.5%	30%

477. A footnote set out that not all UORs "fell neatly into one of the categories and a degree of judgement was therefore required". The example provided was of desertisation measures for the Challenger 2 vehicles: "it was categorised as an EP bring-forward but could equally have been classed as a TELIC-specific requirement".

[231] Minute DEP and DCRS to DNO, 30 May 2003, 'Op TELIC UORs from DEP and DCRS'.

478. A report by the House of Commons Defence Committee produced a different categorisation of UORs:

Category of UOR	% by value[232]
UORs that hastened existing programme	33
UORs that introduced new capabilities not previously programmed	20

Desert uniforms

480. Stocks for desert clothing were insufficient to support a large scale deployment in the time available.

481. In response to concerns raised with Adm Boyce during his visit to theatre, the DLO provided advice on desert combat clothing on 14 April.[236] It stated there was "an acknowledged maximum shortfall in theatre of 18,300 suits and 12,500 boots amongst the Land component, as of 13 Apr 03".

482. The DLO advised that the shortfall would reduce to 3,275 suits for 1 (UK) Div units within the next 72 hours as clothing and boots were pushed forward within theatre and further deliveries were received. The remaining items for the Division would be delivered by 22 April, and the Joint Force Logistic Component units by 28 April.

[236] Minute D Ops DLO to PSO/CDS, 14 April 2003, 'Op TELIC – Desert Combat Clothing'.

483. Clothing issued to 3 Commando and 16 Air Assault Brigades was deteriorating, so they would require an additional 10,000 replacement suits. Those would be dispatched to theatre at the beginning of May. Other formations would also require maintenance stocks.

484. Adm Boyce was advised that 12 months was "a realistic minimum lead time to allow for normal contracting processes" for desert clothing. Advice had been provided in September 2002 that the decision point for ordering clothing was 1 October with the "risk of shortages increasing thereafter". That risk had been "deemed to be acceptable" and permission was not given to approach industry until 4 December.

485. In Mr Flaherty's note to Lord Bach on 9 May addressing equipment performance, he summarised the position on desert clothing and boots as:

> "The shortage of desert clothing was caused primarily by the fact that the stocks held were insufficient for the speed and size of this deployment. The inability to equip even all fighting formations prior to the start of combat operations was caused by in theatre supply priorities. The weakness of the asset tracking system meant there was limited visibility outside theatre of these problems. During decisive combat operation the shortage of desert combats was not flagged up since it was not seen to have a serious operational impact. Sufficient desert combats have now been dispatched to theatre to meet previously declared shortfalls."[237]

486. Mr Flaherty added that after combat operations ended, the shortage of clothing was having "a negative impact on morale" and had therefore been flagged as a concern. He wrote that "excess stocks" were "now held centrally in theatre" and units could call on these stocks "as required to top up holdings".

487. Following the invasion, Brig Cowlam wrote:

> "… the saga of desert combat clothing where the UOR failed to meet the requirement indicates that risks that had been taken could not be recovered."[238]

488. On 31 August 2010, an analysis of the land operation in Iraq was published on behalf of the Chief of the General Staff by Brigadier Ben Barry. It was known as "the Barry Report".[239]

489. The report stated: "Desert boots, desert uniforms and body armour were all in short supply."

490. The NAO's report on 11 December 2003 stated that the procurement of desert clothing and boots was regarded as "of limited effectiveness because few troops received their full complement, and mismatches in sizing remained into the post-conflict phase of the Operation".[240]

491. The House of Commons Defence Committee report on Op TELIC found that:

> "The issue of the availability of desert clothing and boots during Operation TELIC has been both a confusing and worrying story … MOD clearly underestimated the impact on morale of failing to provide service personnel with the clothing and boots which they required and expected. We find it unacceptable that some two weeks after the start of the combat phase 60 percent of the additional clothing requirement that had been ordered was not available in theatre."[241]

492. In July 2003, the MOD published a First Reflections report on operations in Iraq.[242] It stated that the quantities of boots, clothing "and other personal equipment" routinely held was an area that it needed "to look at". While there was, "under SDR planning assumptions … sufficient personal equipment" to equip a total of 9,000 personnel for desert operations, the MOD wrote:

> "In the case of this operation, the numbers deployed were significantly higher, and whilst most materials were sent out in time, difficulties with in-theatre tracking meant that there were some problems with distribution."

493. The Inquiry asked the MOD for a statement on planned stockholdings of desert clothing and the actual stockholdings between July and September 2002. The MOD confirmed the planned stockholdings of desert clothing was 9,000 sets.[243] "Some stock" was being consumed by operations in Afghanistan over that period "but levels were being maintained by resupply from industry".

494. The MOD stated that between this period it was asked to examine the possibility of equipping a force of 30,000 personnel at three sets of clothing per person:

> "Identification of lead times showed that contracts would need to be placed in November-December 2002 in order to receive delivery in time. Authority was given … and agreement was reached with suppliers to provide 96,000 sets of clothing (3 sets per person) and 40,000 pairs of desert boots. This was to be delivered in tranches between January and April 2003. Deliveries started in January 2003 and were complete by the end of February 2003 (earlier than planned), with all deliveries to units designated to receive Desert Clothing complete by March 2003."

495. In his evidence to the Inquiry Mr Hoon stated:

> "Desert combats were part of the UORs and I know some of the soldiers resented having to wear their green combats rather than their desert combats."[244]

496. Mr Hoon later added: "Some soldiers, I'm sure, did not have the right boots."[245]

497. ACM Stirrup told the Inquiry that extra time "would certainly have made a difference" to the provision of desert clothing and boots.[246] Although pressure on the manufacturers had delivered "just about sufficient sets", that was not enough in an operational environment where "a critical issue" was to get it to the right place on time.

498. Major General Graham Binns, Commander of 7 Armoured Brigade during the invasion, told the Inquiry:

> "There were soldiers who didn't have desert combats, you know, we were asking them to go to war incorrectly dressed."[247]

499. Mr Ingram told the Inquiry that part of the reason behind Ministerial visits to Iraq during the operations was to investigate what he called the "urban myths" that were being reported in the media about equipment shortages.[248] He gave an example:

> " … I had one of my own constituents, a mother, on behalf of her son, complaining about the fact that her boy didn't have size 11 boots, and this went on for weeks and weeks, until the point I said, 'Well, is he running around barefoot?' to her. Of course he wasn't. He had bought his own boots, but she was annoyed that he – she was saying that he had not been issued with the size 11, and he had been."

Enhanced Combat Body Armour

500. Enough body armour was procured to equip only British fighting formations; that was insufficient to equip all British troops deployed.

501. Poor asset tracking meant that even fighting formations were not fully equipped, resulting in an urgent redistribution programme to the front line.

502. On 24 March 2003, Sergeant Steven Roberts was killed in Iraq as a result of a gunshot wound.[249] Sgt Roberts had been asked to relinquish his armour because of the shortfall in theatre.

503. On 2 April, Lt Gen Fry advised Adm Boyce on the availability of ECBA:

> "Despite the allocation of an increased baggage allowance, some units that had already been issued ECBA in the UK decided to load the plates in unit freight for surface shipping. Due to poor marking some of these containers were slow in being delivered to units, resulting [in] personnel crossing the LD [line of departure] without plates."[250]

504. Lt Gen Fry wrote that that was "mitigated by an urgent redistribution programme that ensured that forward troops were equipped at the expense of those in the rear". Following that programme, and subsequent deliveries, the NCHQ estimated that 60 percent of 1(UK) Div had been fitted with ECBA.

505. Following his requests, Mr Flaherty provided Lord Bach with further advice on the supply and distribution of ECBA on 16 May.[251] He wrote that "the majority of troops in the fighting formations had full combat body armour at the start of combat operations" but there were "some shortages of ceramic plates which meant that some elements of 7 Armoured Brigade and up to 50% of the Joint Force Logistics did not have ceramic plates at the outset of hostilities".

506. Mr Flaherty wrote that shortages were "exacerbated" by the fact that only ECBA sufficient to "equip the wartime establishment of units" had been procured. He estimated that "approximately 3,500 personnel, the majority of which were not in fighting formations, were affected by the shortage. About 500 sets of ECBA were withdrawn from rear units and redistributed to the front line".

507. The DOC's 17 October 2003 report stated that, before the invasion, the DLO "were not mandated to hold stocks of ECBA sufficient to meet the requirements of this operation".[252] It stated that 36,000 sets of ECBA were deployed to theatre which were "sufficient" to meet the total requirement but "late delivery, coupled with difficulties in consignment tracking and poor unit level control, led to localised shortfalls".

508. The Inquiry asked the MOD for a statement on planned stockholdings for ECBA and the actual levels of stockholdings between July and September 2002. The MOD advised that, on 1 July 2002, it had 25,754 plates in stock and by 30 September this figure was 30,482.[253]

509. The MOD's Lessons for the Future report in December 2003 stated:

> "The decision (a change in policy) to equip all Service personnel whose role it required with Enhanced Combat Body Armour … posed a challenge because there were insufficient stocks to meet the needs of a large scale force. Through additional purchases, over 38,000 complete sets of body armour were deployed to theatre. This should have met the total requirement, but late delivery against an advancing timescale, coupled with difficulties in equipment tracking and control of issue, led to localised shortfalls."[254]

510. The NAO's December 2003 report on Op TELIC stated:

" … 21,759 [desert pattern] covers and 32,581 pairs of plates were issued into the supply chain by 24 March 2003. However, the Department's Defence Clothing Integrated Project Team estimated that approximately 200,000 sets had been issued since the Kosovo campaign in 1999, greatly exceeding the theoretical requirement, but these seem to have disappeared. The Team questioned whether items should, therefore, be issued as part of an individual's personal entitlement for which they would be held accountable."[255]

511. The NAO also reported that "insufficient numbers [of body armour] were distributed in theatre, largely as a result of difficulties with asset tracking and distribution."

512. The House of Commons Defence Committee concluded that:

"Body armour is another example of where MOD's in-theatre distribution and tracking led to shortages in critical equipment … MOD should identify and implement solutions to address these shortcomings and ensure that service personnel receive the equipment they are entitled to."[256]

513. On 7 September, Mr Martin Howard, MOD Director General Operational Policy, wrote to Mr Ingram, asking him to note that, following scrutiny in recent House of Commons Defence Committee, Public Accounts Committee and NAO reports, a new policy had been endorsed by the Chiefs of Staff in June whereby "all entitled personnel" would deploy on operations with a full set of ECBA.[257] This policy had already been implemented and was being monitored.

514. The Board of Inquiry into Sgt Roberts' death concluded that he would not have been fatally injured if he had been wearing ECBA at the time.[258]

515. On 18 December 2006, Mr Andrew Walker, Oxfordshire Assistant Deputy Coroner, delivered a narrative verdict:

> "Sgt Roberts' death was as a result of delay and serious failures in the acquisition and support chain that resulted in a significant shortage within his fighting unit of enhanced combat body armour, none being available for him to wear."[259]

516. Lieutenant General Robin Brims told the Inquiry:

> "I was fully aware that there was a problem with the body armour and I ordered a redistribution of body armour to those people most in need, and similarly some other forms of equipment."[260]

517. ACM Stirrup told the Inquiry:

> "… just before the start of operation, the clear message that we were receiving in the Ministry of Defence was that all unit demands for enhanced combat body armour had been met, but quite clearly not everybody who needed it in theatre got it when they needed it, and had it been – had that been two months earlier, then those sorts of issues I think could have been untangled."[261]

518. ACM Stirrup added:

> "I think the area where we could have done better is in terms of enhanced combat body armour. We didn't have enough of that in theatre at the time, and I think, in part … the issue was it was all being done so rapidly at the last minute no one was quite sure who had what."

519. The process behind the prioritisation of the redistribution of body armour was described by Maj Gen Binns:

> "We had insufficient body armour to equip all those who were likely to be coming into immediate contact with the fighting companies and squadrons and I took a decision to reallocate based on mitigating the risks to those who were most vulnerable to the dismounted troops and those who sat behind 70 tonnes of armour I was prepared to take a risk with …"[262]

520. ACM Bagnall told the Inquiry:

> "I was not aware that, in some cases, all personnel did not have access to Enhanced Body Armour at the start of operations. That said, I heard anecdotal evidence of personnel being deployed on one ship whilst their body armour plates were on another vessel which went to a different port of disembarkation. Any shortfalls identified would have gone from theatre to CJO and, if required, onwards to DCDS(C) or DCDS(EC) and their staffs. I do not recall any shortfalls being identified to me at the start of the campaign although issues emerged later as the operation progressed."[263]

521. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that he had not been told about the commanders' decisions to redistribute body armour:

"My understanding was everybody had body armour. Whether there was a sufficient number of enhanced body armour kits was something which didn't percolate out – and the need to redistribute such that appeared in theatre wasn't something which percolated up to the Chiefs of Staff."[264]

Biological and chemical warfare protection

522. Risks were taken with the levels of protection against the use of chemical or biological weapons.

523. In its Lessons for the Future report in December 2003, the MOD stated there had been "localised shortages" of NBC equipment, such as suits, "again caused by sizing difficulties or equipment distribution and tracking problems".[265] The MOD added:

"Other shortfalls were due to poor stock maintenance – for example the inspection regime for Residual Vapour Detectors had not been followed, leading to uncertainty over serviceability. Nevertheless, through a combination of purchasing spare parts and rigorous re-testing of the equipment, the operational requirement was met."

524. Rear Admiral Michael Wood, MOD DLO Director General Operations, visited Iraq between 10 and16 May to ascertain the logistic support issues that had emerged in theatre.[266] In his report to ACM Pledger on 20 May, he highlighted the shortage of NBC equipment:

"The one significant area of weakness and concern emphasised by all the senior Land Component commanders I met was NBC equipment and preparedness. Whilst … the threat did not manifest itself, the lack of crucial items of detection and protection equipment and consumables undermined the confidence of those preparing to go to war."

525. On 6 June, Mr Flaherty provided advice on the supply and delivery of NBC equipment to Lord Bach.[267] He stated:

> "Although the UOR system did produce some NBC equipment, the issues in this case relate more to the proper maintenance of existing stocks and the ability of our systems to cope with the delivery of very large surge requirements to personnel who are unfamiliar with the equipment in question, and may not easily be able to track its onward movement.
> "Although commanders will – rightly – place their priority on the out-load and delivery of battle-winning capability, and although the perceived NBC threat diminished with the collapse of the regime, there were occasions when our personnel perceived they were at high risk, due to the lack of NBC equipment."

526. On NBC suits, Mr Flaherty wrote that:

> "There were initially insufficient NBC suits in theatre to supply all personnel with three each at the outset of hostilities. In order to ensure all personnel had two suits each … suits were re-distributed … An additional 96,000 suits arrived from the UK on 19 March meaning there were sufficient suits in theatre to supply all personnel with four each. However due to a mismatch between the sizes of the suits and individuals a small number of troops crossed the Line of Departure with only one properly fitting suit …
> "Commanders assessed that the risk posed to the Force by these shortages was low … The effect on morale was judged to be more serious than the practical impact."

527. Mr Flaherty wrote that in order to alleviate shortages in NBC detectors, equipment held by 3 Commando Brigade and 16 Air Assault Brigade was redistributed, leaving them with "less than 50% of the required capability". All available NBC detection equipment, ancillaries and consumables were then flown out, "giving theatre a 50% capability by 13 March".

528. Mr Flaherty stated: "The shortage of NBC detection was assessed to pose a high risk to UK troops." This was "not fundamentally a 'UOR' issue but one of maintenance and supply of in-service equipment" exacerbated by the delayed in-service introduction of a new form of equipment.

529. There had also been a shortage of batteries for the NBC detection sets and for their remote alarms, "aggravated by the fact that some NAIAD arrived from stores without batteries or batteries for the remote". Commanders had assessed that this shortage "posed a high risk to UK Forces"; 1 (UK) Div had been ordered to turn off NBC detectors while in dispersal areas to preserve the batteries and to "only turn them back on if there were signs of an attack".

[267] Minute PJHQ J9 to PS/Minister(DP), 6 June 2003, 'Iraq: Op TELIC UORs'.

530. Lord Bach's Private Office wrote alongside this point: "This is very serious. It will be impossible to defend this adequately."[268]

531. On the front page of Mr Flaherty's advice, Lord Bach's Private Office wrote:

> "This was not flagged up through the chain of command, despite (numerous) assurances that it would be, and it runs counter to the public lines Ministers were given. These were effectively – although there are some shortfalls (because NAIAD is no longer manufactured) – we have confidence in our NBC defence against any threat posed by Saddam. In fact, the point contradicts this and has, rather fittingly in my view, been described as 'playing Russian roulette with people's lives.'"

532. On 3 July, Lord Bach's Private Office replied to Mr Flaherty expressing alarm that there were occasions when personnel were assessed to be at high risk due to a lack of NBC equipment:

> "[Lord Bach] recalls the assessments provided before the campaign that our NBC defence was 'fragile' but that nevertheless there was complete confidence in the NBC posture of UK forces – as reflected in Lord Bach's weekly UOR meetings and the Department's public line. In particular, whilst Lord Bach fully appreciates the right of Commanders to make decisions on the ground, he is concerned that Ministers were not made aware of this fact until it came to light through media questions."[269]

533. On 3 October, an MOD report to ACM Bagnall explained that, while the 'Defence Strategic Audit and Guidance for the 2004 Equipment Programme' had suggested that NBC capabilities constituted "vital ground" to be protected in the programme, its "high impact/low probability nature" had remained "an inhibiting factor regarding resource allocation".[270] However, a "quick estimate on what might have happened", on operations such as in Iraq, had been carried out and the issues raised had been addressed in its report.

534. The report stated:

> "A recurrent theme emerging from our work is the need for culture change and an improved understanding of CBRN defence from Front Line to grand strategic; attitudes remain that CBRN is unlikely, too difficult, a Cold War issue, or only a problem for specialists."

535. The team recommended a number of "quick wins", including policy updates, more training, and preserving CBRN capabilities and research. In the longer term, the report advocated ensuring that CBRN stock holdings met Defence Planning Assumptions, addressing CBRN defence capabilities for large scale deployments and ensuring wider force structure work took account of CBRN issues.

536. General Sir Michael Walker became Chief of the Defence Staff in May 2003. On 22 March 2004, his Private Office replied to questions from Mr Ingram about the availability of NBC filters for armoured vehicles prior to the invasion.[271] The advice confirmed that the distribution of NBC filter stocks was authorised on 27 January 2003, but that the filters were not dispatched until 13 March and arrived in theatre on 17 March. The operation commenced two days later and, as 1 (UK) Div was conducting its final battle preparation, the plans to move the stocks forward to units were not feasible: "NBC filters were a casualty of compressed planning and deployment timelines."

537. Mr Ingram's Private Office replied on 26 March that Mr Ingram's view was:

> "… given the prominence of the NBC threat in the run up to Op TELIC and the understandable public attention and criticism [sic] the shortage of AFV NBC filters subsequently, his view is that a worrying picture is beginning to emerge. His perception that the shortages cannot be attributed solely to poor asset tracking appears to be well founded."[272]

538. A number of post-operation tour reports and lessons learned exercises found fault with the provision of NBC equipment.

539. The DOC Operation TELIC report on 17 October 2003 stated:

> "Despite the lessons from Op GRANBY (the first Gulf War), much last minute work was required to achieve acceptable levels of preparedness for operations in a possible CBRN environment."[273]

540. In the 7 Armoured Brigade post-operation tour report, Brig Binns highlighted that NBC filters for the Challenger 2 tanks "simply never arrived".[274]

541. In an Army interview about lessons learned in Iraq on 8 January 2004, Maj Gen Brims said:

> "…having to redistribute body armour and NBC kit amongst the troops… left a pretty sour taste."[275]

> "No NBC filters for Challenger MBTs were received, leaving tanks with only six hours of NBC protection … Insufficient NBC warning and monitoring equipment was available."[276]

543. In his post-operation tour report, Brigadier James Dutton, Commander 3 Commando Brigade, wrote:

> "If the brigade had been subjected to a CBW attack we would at best have been 'fighting to survive' rather than 'surviving to fight' … Inadequate stocks of the NBC consumables caused concern and uncertainty."[277]

544. In his post-operation tour report, Brig Cowlam wrote that the lack of NBC kit was "a major concern" and "unacceptable".[278]

545. The NAO's December 2003 Op TELIC report stated:

> "Although overall protection against chemical agents was good, there was a 'significant shortfall' (some 40 percent) of Nerve Agent Immobilised Alarm and Detector units … and a severe shortfall in Residual Vapour Detector kit availability … While these shortfalls could be partially mitigated … it made detection and therefore response to an attack inefficient.

546. The House of Commons Defence Committee concluded:

> "Given the potential threat posed by Iraqi armed forces, sufficient chemical warfare detection and protection were particularly important for this operation. However, there were serious shortcomings in the supply and distribution system and the required levels of detection and protection were not always available to everyone. Indeed, while MOD ideally would have liked each serviceman and woman to have had four suits available, only one suit per person was available, which MOD judged to be sufficient for this operation. Furthermore it is essential that personnel have confidence in the effectiveness of the equipment with which they are provided. It was fortuitous that service personnel did not suffer as a consequence, but had the Iraqis used chemical weapons systematically, as employed in the Iran-Iraq war, the operational consequences would have been severe. The lack of armoured vehicle filters seems to us to be a matter of the utmost seriousness. The lessons identified need to be implemented as a matter of urgency to ensure that servicemen and women serving on operations have complete and justified confidence that chemical warfare attacks will be detected in time, that their individual protection equipment will save their lives and that operational success will not be imperilled. This is particularly important given that UK service personnel are more likely to be operating in such environments in the future."[280]

547. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry: "I have to say I have not come across anything specific to suggest that NBC protection was not available to every soldier who needed it."[281]

548. When questioned about concerns that out-of-date kit had been issued, Mr Hoon replied:

> "… I don't recall any suggestion that any of this kit was ineffective … I don't know whether there was a sell-by date on the kit. There may well have been but as far as I am aware, whenever this was tested, this equipment was fit for its purpose."

549. Lord Bach told the Inquiry in his witness statement that he was not aware of the level of respirator testing that was reported to the Chiefs of Staff on 19 March 2003:

> "… we did not receive information that the Chiefs of Staff Committee apparently received on the eve of the invasion."[282]

550. When asked about the report provided to the Chiefs of Staff on 19 March 2003, which said that only 3 percent of the land component's respirators had been checked, ACM Bagnall told the Inquiry:

most advanced testing facility in the world. Only 0.5 percent of all the personnel tested did not have a perfect fit …"[283]

551. Asked about respirator testing, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that he believed only 0.5 percent of personnel had not been tested.[284]

552. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

"The one area of equipment which did give me concern was our ability to cope with any biological or chemical threat and therefore the right kit for that, which is basically the suit you wear, the protection equipment you wear, and also a gas mask. That's something which did trouble me. That was our sort of worst case scenario – once we went over the line, of having chemical or biological weapons thrown at us; and a lot of effort was put into making sure those who would be going in the leading echelons did have the right IPE [Individual Protective Equipment], the right sort of protective equipment, and everybody had their gas mask checked which at the time I went out was a shortfall."

553. Lord Boyce added that, by 19-20 March, he thought "we had a satisfactory level of kitting out of gas masks and IPE".[285]

554. The Inquiry asked the MOD for further information regarding the level of stock holdings and provision of NBC clothing and equipment before the invasion and the lead times for providing additional provisions. The MOD responded:

"Sufficient stock of NBC suits and respirators were sent to theatre before the start of combat operations to provide two per person. Further deliveries to theatre increased this to four per person from 19 March 2003."[286]

Ammunition

555. Supplies of ammunition were insufficient for the size and speed of the British deployment.

556. The problem was exacerbated by poor asset tracking.

557. In analysing the options for a possible UK contribution, Mr Hoon had been advised on 25 July 2002 that an armoured division could be deployed within six months "but only with limited sustainment (eg 10 days ammunition)".[287]

558. The Barry Report stated:

> "Small arms ammunition was in such short supply that 1 DWR [Duke of Wellington's Regiment] had only 10% of its requirement until after G-day, and some Royal Engineers started the operation with only 10 rounds per man."[288]

559. In his post-operation report Brig Binns wrote: "Ammunition was a constant cause of concern throughout the deployment."[289]

560. The NAO's December 2003 Op TELIC report stated:

> "Lack of consignment tracking led to inefficiencies … There were difficulties in scheduling the delivery of some supplies due to mis-prioritisation of loading of stocks for transport. For example, the majority of the force's flat racks (required for the movement of ammunition by specialist vehicles) were on the penultimate deployment ship, arriving in Kuwait in 17 March. This significantly limited the ability of logistic units to move ammunition to the frontline and exacerbated a perception among troops that there were ammunition shortages."[290]

561. Brig Cowlam told the House of Commons Defence Select Committee that all units had been issued ammunition during the initial deployment to Iraq when stocks were very limited.[291]

562. The House of Commons Defence Committee concluded:

> "Our examination suggests that there were problems with the supply of ammunition when the fighting echelon began operations. MOD accepts that in the very early stages there were some problems and not all service personnel had the right amount. We expect MOD to establish the scale of the problem, to investigate any specific cases identified, in particular the tragic incident involving the six Royal Military Policemen [See Section 9.2], and to implement the necessary action to avoid any re-occurrence in the future."[292]

563. Gen Reith told the Inquiry there was "a scrabble at the end to find certain items, particularly the ceramic plates for the flak jackets, and some natures of ammunition."[293]

564. Maj Gen Binns told the Inquiry that "there were some serious shortfalls" which were eventually "helped by a redistribution of ammunition across the division".[294] He described a particular problem with ammunition for Warrior vehicles:

> "We couldn't find the operational ammunition for the Warrior. We knew that it had left Bicester and there was evidence that it had arrived in Kuwait, and there was a risk, a real risk, that ammunition was in such short supply that we may have fired it in training. And because the ammunition had just been taken to the range, they naturally assumed that that was the ammunition, and I thought we had fired it. So there was a risk over ammunition."

565. With only four months' preparation, equipment had, in a number of cases, arrived a month or two after the operation started.

Combat ID

566. Despite the public assurances given prior to the invasion that previously identified problems had been resolved, Combat ID equipment was not fitted to all vehicles before the start of operations.

567. Nine blue-on-blue incidents, four of which resulted in the death[295] or injury of UK personnel, were reported during the combat phase of Op TELIC.[296]

568. At Lord Bach's UOR meeting on 1 April 2003, it was reported that "the story overall on equipment was positive" but despite having the same equipment as the US, "we were going to 'come in for a schlocking' on Combat ID".[297] The record of the meeting did not explain why.

569. A note from Maj Gen Fry to Adm Boyce on 2 April stated that only 1,861 sets of Combat ID had been provided for 1 (UK) Div vehicles, 30 percent of the total required.[298] By the date of the invasion, all vehicles had been fitted for the equipment, but "due to the mal-location of two containers two Squadrons were not fitted with the equipment". The containers "were subsequently found and sent forward so that units could be fitted with Combat ID when an appropriate moment occurred".

570. The minute from Mr Flaherty on 9 May detailed the extent of the problem:

> "Three ISO containers of Combat ID were temporarily misplaced in theatre meaning 32 Challenger 2s were not fitted with combat identification prior to the start of combat operations. All tanks in the two lead battle groups, were, however, fitted with Combat ID. GOC 1 Division assessed that proceeding with the advance without > Combat ID was preferable to delaying the advance. In both the UK blue-on-blue CR2 [Challenger 2] incident and the incident involving a US A-10 firing on 2 CVR(T)s, all UK vehicles were fitted with the appropriate Combat ID."[299]

571. The MOD's First Reflections report in July 2003 stated:

> "By the start of operations, MOD had deployed 1,861 vehicle-mounted and 5,000 dismounted Combat ID sets. This was sufficient to meet the full requirement, although the scale of equipment modifications required in theatre meant that some formations were still being fitted as the first units crossed the line of departure."[300]

572. The 17 October 2003 DOC report stated that training packages, which were created to aid recognition of Coalition vehicles, arrived "too late and in too small a quantity to be made widely available" and that the packages were "inadequate for aircrew training".[301]

573. The DOC found that there were not enough Thermal ID and Combat ID panels, which formed part of the UK's Combat ID capability for all vehicles, and that they were not robust and proved to be inadequate aids for Coalition aircrew.

574. The House of Commons Defence Committee concluded that:

> "We expect MOD to implement the lessons from Operation TELIC on Combat ID. MOD should push forward with the work with its allies to agree on a single system … We note MOD's view that the opportunities for fratricide in an increasingly complex battle space are likely to increase, but look to MOD to identify the required action and make the necessary investment to ensure that such incidents are reduced to a minimum."[302]

Asset tracking

575. The failures in asset tracking identified in the 1991 Gulf Conflict had not been rectified in 2003.

576. Until January 2003, the UK military plan was to enter Iraq through Turkey. The US, which was to manage the entry route, stipulated that UK forces should have an asset tracking system that was compatible with that in use by US forces.[303] As a result, the MOD approved a UOR for the purchase of a US asset tracking system, known as Total Asset Visibility (TAV). The new system was not in place until the end of February 2003; too late to be used in the early stages of the deployment.

577. On 31 January, Lt Gen Reith wrote to Adm Boyce that one of the areas that "may cause difficulty" as Op TELIC developed was asset tracking.[304] He wrote:

> "All that can be achieved in the time available is being progressed. The integration of the current system (VITAL …) and UOR provision of TAV (Total Asset Visibility, a US System) offers considerable improvement, but is nonetheless a 'quick fix' which does not fully address the capability gap. Medium term work by DLO is in hand."

578. In his post-operation report, Brig Binns stated:

> "An inability to track items … all contributed to a serious impact upon the morale of soldiers about to conduct operations."[305]

579. When Maj Gen Fry was interviewed by the NAO on 7 August, the report of the interview sent to Mr Lee stated he had cited poor asset tracking as a "negative aspect" of Op TELIC.[306] It "compounded the lack of availability of certain scarce resources" and was quoted as saying "we had it but couldn't find it!"

580. The MOD DOC report on 17 October 2003 stated:

> "During Operation TELIC, the flow of logistic information up and down the supply chain and between all stakeholders was poor. For example it was difficult to track UORs through to the end user in order to match the equipment with relevant training packages …"[307]

581. On asset tracking it stated:

> "Large amounts of equipment, stores and supplies were reportedly 'lost' in theatre, including ammunition, ECBA & NBC Defence equipment … It was not possible to track down high priority equipment that was arriving simultaneously with the sustainment flow. As a result UORs and other priority equipment could not be targeted for rapid processing. This inability to identify the exact location of equipment resulted in the degradation of operational capability."

582. In its Lessons for the Future report in December 2003, the MOD stated:

> "… the flow of logistics information between theatre and the UK was poor, particularly affecting the tracking of UORs into theatre. It was difficult to monitor the rates at which supplies were consumed, making it hard to determine when re-supply would be required. The lack of available information also reduced commanders' confidence in the logistics system, causing units to over-prioritise their requests and re-order equipment already en route. This added to the burden on the already over-stretched system."[308]

583. The MOD stated that "these problems were caused by the continuing lack of a robust tri-Service inventory system, the ability to track equipment into and through theatre, and an information system capable of supporting this technology."

584. The NAO recommended in December 2003 that:

"The Department should, as a matter of urgency, continue to work to develop appropriate logistics systems to track materiel to theatre and ensure its timely delivery to frontline units."[309]

585. On 30 January 2004, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary wrote to No.10 with a summary of lessons learned from Op TELIC, drawing "heavily" on the lines Mr Hoon intended to use before the House of Commons Defence Committee the following week.[310] He wrote:

"We have consistently acknowledged that some things did not go as well as we would have wished. In evidence to HCDC last May Mr Hoon acknowledged that there were bound to be some problems in a logistics operation of this size, and that some of our personnel may have experienced shortages of equipment. Our subsequent work and that of the NAO has shown that these shortages were more widespread and in some respects more serious than we believed to be the case at that time.

"In general this was not the result of a failure to obtain and deploy the equipment required. There is room for debate about the balance between routinely holding items in our inventory and relying on our ability to generate operation-specific equipment in short timescales. But a major problem, in our analysis, was that there were serious shortcomings in our ability to track consignments and assets through theatre, and to distribute them in a timely fashion to the front line."

586. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary wrote that the MOD had "identified numerous other areas for further work" and had, for example, increased its stockholdings of desert clothing and boots and NBC Individual Protective Equipment sets by an additional 32,000.

587. The House of Commons Defence Committee concluded that:

"We are in no doubt that one of the key lessons to emerge from Operation TELIC concerns operational logistic support and specifically, the requirement for a robust system to track stock and equipment both into and within theatre – a requirement which was identified in the 1991 Gulf War."[311]

588. In May 2009, the NAO recognised that the MOD had "made a number of important changes" to its logistic support process since the end of combat operations in Iraq.[312]

589. The MOD's existing systems only provided "a limited tracking capability: a consignment is only visible once it passes through a specific point in the logistics chain, but cannot be tracked at all points along the course of its journey". The NAO stated that was "nonetheless" an improvement compared to the systems in place in 2003.

590. The NAO recommended that the MOD should:

" … further improve and integrate its logistics information systems, including consignment and asset tracking, so users on operations have visibility over the stock already available at different locations in theatre, can track the progress of deliveries throughout the supply pipeline and see stock availability back in the United Kingdom."

591. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

"… I think the biggest problem we had was with the tracking systems to actually ensure we knew exactly what was where, when; and that consignments that were sent actually arrived in time to be fielded properly. That system was not fully effective."[313]

592. Gen Reith told the Inquiry:

"There wasn't a shortage of equipment in the end. What there was, was an inability to track it. We knew it was in theatre, but some of it we couldn't find."[314]

593. ACM Stirrup told the Inquiry:

" … I think it was clear that lack of visibility on what was actually happening in theatre was hampering us, but, of course, even if you have that visibility, you have got to identify what are the real substantive problems, and the real substantive problems were very much to do with asset tracking with knowing where things were, so you could get them to the right place at the right time. In a number of instances, the necessary equipment was in theatre, it just wasn't in the right place, and in some instances, people didn't know where it was in theatre."[315]

594. ACM Stirrup also described the impact of the difficulties with asset tracking on the delivery of UORs:

> "I was clear in my own mind that the Urgent Operational Requirement process was only complete when the particular item of equipment was in the hands of those in theatre who needed it and they were satisfied with it. I actually tried to get some of my senior staff deployed into theatre to check those specific issues, but it was decided that we shouldn't do that and that we should rely on the chain of command. That, I think, turned out to be the wrong decision and now we routinely have people deployed for those purposes."

595. Maj Gen Binns told the Inquiry that, in 2003, he had "one of those moments with my commanding officers in early March when they were saying, 'I don't think we can be ready'".[316] One of the examples he gave as to why they were saying that alluded to asset tracking:

> "We lost a company of Warriors at one stage. We knew that it had been offloaded from the boats, but I didn't know where it was. There were a quarter of a million men in the desert and we couldn't find this company of Warriors – empty vehicles that had been taken off lowloaders."

596. In his statement, ACM Bagnall told the Inquiry that:

> "The information which I saw indicated that equipments had arrived in theatre. I did not see (or at least I do not recall seeing) what became known as 'the final mile' once a particular bit of kit had been unloaded in theatre and moved to where it was needed. Indeed, this is arguably not information which is required in MOD unless problems were identified which could not be resolved in theatre by CJO and his staffs or by the staffs in MOD."[317]

597. When asked what steps he had taken to assure himself that the forces deployed had access to sufficient kit and equipment including whether he ever discussed the matter with Lt Gen Reith or Air Chief Marshal Sir Brian Burridge, Deputy Commander in Chief Strike Command and UK National Contingent Commander during the invasion of Iraq, or any other commander in the field, ACM Bagnall told the Inquiry:

> "… it was CDS who would routinely contact CJO, the national component commanders, Tampa and others, and I was aware that he was doing so. I did not have any discussions with them other than on the occasions when I filled the role of Acting CDS."

---

[316] Private hearing, 2 June 2010, page 5.
[317] Statement, 6 January 2011, pages 4-5.

598. ACM Bagnall told the Inquiry:

> "I was not aware of any concerns which were raised before the invasion about the quality and the accuracy of information available in MOD about equipment delivery to Iraq. I was subsequently told (I think by DCDS(EC)) about concerns relating to the availability of equipment delivered under the UOR process, and I recall that he asked for agreement to send some of his people into theatre to monitor progress. I also recall that I supported this request, but for reasons I cannot remember, the request was denied. What I was aware of were concerns relating to asset tracking. This was not a new issue, and it was a topic which we had been working on for some time."[318]

599. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lord Boyce stated that he could not recall whether Ministers had ever been advised of the known weaknesses in asset tracking or the risks this entailed.[319]

600. Lord Boyce stated:

> "It was absolutely correct that a lot of our stores problems in theatre come 2003 were as a result of poor asset tracking – and I wonder what the situation is today if we were to go and ask."

601. Problems with logistic support were identified soon after the campaign.

602. RAdm Wood's findings in his report to ACM Pledger on 20 May included:

> "A combination of OP SEC and late definition of force elements and operational plans all exposed Defence's growing dependence on industry as a materiel provider as well as the fragility of some key planning assumptions. This was exacerbated by some less than adequate personnel and equipment readiness. In the event, this inevitably manifested itself as significant logistic risk which imposed operational risk."[320]

603. RAdm Wood also specified that he considered:

- "Inadequate asset tracking and visibility hindered material preparation for war."
- An "urgent review" of the provisioning policy, processes and requirements for land units was required because the supply chain was "under extreme strain and, at times, unable to cope" trying to meet equipment requirements.

604. In his post-operation report on 6 October 2003, Major General Peter Wall, GOC 1 (UK) Div May 2003 to January 2005, wrote that one of the "key areas" to note was "the breaking of LAND mandated and resourced readiness states and training in readiness assumptions".[321] He added:

> "OP TELIC demonstrated clearly that current readiness states are not in line with strategic reality … The time given for deployment was significantly shorter than that defined in the Defence Planning Assumptions. This had many impacts in the manning, equipping and building the … sustainability of the force."

MOD reflections on equipping the forces deployed for the conflict

605. Reports published in 2003 after the conflict suggested that land equipment performed well during the combat phase of operations.

606. In the MOD's First Reflections report on operations in Iraq in July 2003, it stated that the "success of operations in Iraq demonstrated the effectiveness and extensive capability of the modern equipment and logistics support available to our Armed Forces".[322]

607. The MOD's second report, Lessons for the Future, assessed that:

> "Overall, land equipment performed well and reliability levels were often exceptionally high despite the challenges of a very demanding environment."[323]

608. The DOC stated that during the deployment and invasion phases of Op TELIC, "UK equipment and maintenance regimes coped well with the environment and manoeuvre demands placed upon them".[324]

609. The NAO concluded in its report on 11 December 2003 that:

> "Throughout the war-fighting phase of Operation TELIC a number of both new and in service equipments operated effectively in the austere environment of Iraq."[325]

610. The late delivery of some UORs, however, meant that soldiers were not always able to be trained on equipment before its use.

611. The DOC report on 17 October 2003 stated:

> "A consequence of the compressed timescales for UOR delivery was that personnel did not always have time to train or become properly familiar with equipment, either before deployment or in theatre … This undermined the rationale for delivering UOR equipment to improve operational effectiveness. Users did not have complete confidence in their ability to use equipment, and commanders were not always able to gain full appreciation of the additional capabilities available and how they might be used in combination to deliver an effect."[326]

612. The Barry Report published in August 2010 stated:

"The UOR process did not produce enough equipment to meet the training requirements. So some troops first encountered new equipments in theatre and commanders assessed that casualties resulted, particularly in the period immediately after a brigade relief in place."[327]

613. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

"There is no point being told 'Here is a UOR for a nice gizmo, a nice new piece of kit which you can only have, by the way, in theatre', if the person operating that kit doesn't see it for the first time until he actually gets to theatre, because he will die trying to learn how to use it."[328]

Training on equipment post-conflict

Before 2006, it was not possible to purchase equipment with a training margin with a UOR. One of the results of this was consistent reports from the field about the difficulties presented by the lack of training on equipment that personnel would use once deployed.

A DOC report in September 2007 stated:

> "Combat Body Armour (CBA), protected vehicles, comms and ECM(FP) (Electronic Counter Measure Force Protection) equipment, particularly UOR procured equipment, were regularly unavailable for training/familiarisation at PDT [Pre-Deployment Training]."[329]

Major General William Rollo, GOC MND(SE) from July 2004 to December 2004, wrote in his post-operation tour report:

> "More training on Snatch and other UOR equipments … must be factored into pre-deployment preparation."[330]

That point was reiterated in post-operation tour reports from the following two successors to his role, Major General Jonathon Riley and Major General James Dutton.[331]

The UOR rules were changed to include a training margin in 2006.[332] The September 2007 DOC report stated:

> "The recent Treasury decision to permit UOR procured equipment to include an allocation for training is already having an effect…"

Lieutenant General Andrew Figgures, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Equipment Capability) from June 2006, told the Inquiry that decision was "an important step forward".[333]

614. The restrictions until 15 October 2002 on discussions with industry about potential operations in Iraq did prevent early conversations with industry about the provision of equipment.

615. But it is clear that the most senior military officers and officials understood the reasons for that decision.

616. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

> "… some very contingent UOR work was authorised by Mr Hoon at the time under CDS' pressure … but those were very much ones which could be done invisibly."[334]

617. Asked if he had sensed some reluctance in the Government to agree preparatory steps, Maj Gen Fry replied that he thought there was, but that had to be qualified to reflect the fact that what he saw was determined by his role in the PJHQ. In his view it was understandable if Ministers had been "trying to reserve their positions for as long as they could".[335]

618. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry:

> "All I know is that Mike [Boyce] and I went to meetings in September, where we argued the case and that we were both made very well aware of the attitude in Downing Street towards the requirement for minimising publicity and for avoiding the visibility of preparations. We were both there at these meetings. So there was no doubt of the fact that we could not go out, either of us, and overtly prepare, which is why we had to approach some of the UORs in a particular way …
> "I think the judgement that I had to make and he had to make was the extent to which we could go on with preparations without affecting that diplomatic process in the United Nations."[336]

619. The evidence given to the Inquiry demonstrates that senior military officers and officials in the MOD fully understood the limitations on the size and readiness of the forces available for deployment on expeditionary operations agreed in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review and set out in the Defence Planning Assumptions (DPAs).

620. Sir Kevin Tebbit stated that the scale of the deployment was consistent with the DPAs, and that: "It was the type of operation that we expected from time to time to be able to mount."[337]

621. Sir Kevin Tebbit was later asked what lessons had been learned from the earlier experience in Iraq.[338] One lesson he cited was:

> "… we assumed that we would have stocks for six months, and that when we came to a major operation we would have preparation time to conduct a large scale operation by building up stocks in that period.
>
> "… if we wanted to go for a large scale, we would need six months in order to acquire the necessary extra equipment, stores, personnel, clothing, ammunition, things like that."

622. On the SDR, Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry:

> "… when we said that the SDR did involve the ability to move up to large scale from time to time, we hadn't got a precise view, but we were looking at once every 10 years we could gravitate up to large scale.[339]

623. Gen Jackson told the Inquiry that:

> "… the Defence Planning Assumptions which had emerged from the Strategic Defence Review of 1997/98 allowed for, from time to time, a large commitment, which in land force terms was at the divisional level, this was not regarded as anything we could contemplate on an enduring basis, a one-off from time to time …
>
> "More germanely we would be able to maintain a medium-sized commitment, i.e. brigade level, indefinitely and we could on a one-off basis add a second medium scale commitment.
> "There was some small print about a small scale … but I think it is within the ability to produce a second brigade on a short-term basis."[340]

624. The MOD also understood that the deployment could not be sustained for more than six months.

625. The impact on the UK's ability to continue to conduct military operations after the conflict phase of operations was never fully considered.

626. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry:

> "The theoretical planning against the Defence Planning Assumptions is you don't do this sort of operation for an extended period longer than about six months. But it never seemed to me very likely that we would be out [of] there [Iraq] in six months."[341]

627. Sir Kevin later said: "Our assumptions never involve more than six months at that level."[342]

628. With regard to large scale deployments, Gen Jackson stated:

> "… the large scale concept, in land component terms we are talking around 30,000 or 25,000 certainly, the concept is you put in that large commitment on a one-off basis and then you must downsize, because the Army cannot sustain a deployment of 25,000 to 30,000 indefinitely."[343]

629. The Inquiry was offered different perspectives on the degree to which exceeding the Planning Assumptions had put a strain on the system that it was not able to meet.

630. Lt Gen Fry told the Inquiry that:

> "Over time the scale of ambition got larger and larger, so at the end of it we were looking at something which involved a full deployed joint force with … land, air and maritime forces, and in addition to that, special forces and logistic forces as well."[344]

631. Asked if he had thought there was sufficient time to prepare the force for battle, Lt Gen Fry stated that it was "a bit of a rush and there were inherent risks involved".[345]

632. Gen Reith told the Inquiry that he was "quite happy" in terms of readiness and training.[346] He said that 7 Armoured Brigade had been selected because it was "the most highly trained of all the armoured brigades". In addition, 3 Commando Brigade and 16 Air Assault Brigade were both part of the Joint Rapid Reaction Force and, therefore, "maintained a high standard of training and readiness on a permanent basis".

633. ACM Stirrup told the Inquiry:

> "… we simply did not have enough time … to do everything that we needed to before the operation started."[347]

634. Sir Kevin Tebbit stated that:

> "The timescale was slightly compressed, more than we would have wished, which we made very clear, so that we didn't have everything that we would have wanted at the right moment, but the shortfall was not operationally significant …"[348]

635. Sir Kevin Tebbit subsequently told the Inquiry that the switch to the South:

> " … was not as difficult as I thought it was going to be … I think it was a great achievement … which surprised me … [T]he quality of the military effort was tremendous … because it wasn't just a question of moving to a different host nation support arrangements, it's a question of a differently configured force …
>
> "I think the military had been running a slightly parallel option for a bit of time during December, actually."[349]

636. Sir Kevin Tebbit added:

> "I think that to the extent that there were pressures and problems with the operation itself … those were more about the amount of time available to do the planning of the actual build-up itself, warning time, the switch from one area to another, the difficulty of doing overt military preparations as early as they needed to be done because of the desire not to disrupt the UN track.
> "Those were the bigger problems in ensuring that we got the force structure ready when eventually the time came, and the fact that we would have preferred another month, in ideal circumstances, to do that build-up."[350]

637. Gen Jackson told the Inquiry that the "whole order of battle" had been "in a state of flux" until early 2003.[351] But he confirmed that he had been confident the UK could put a division into the field.

638. Gen Jackson subsequently described the forces deployed as "a very interesting divisional construct" which he did not think had been done before: "but it was the right construct for the task which confronted 1 (UK) Armoured Division."[352]

639. Asked when the UK started looking at the South as an alternative, Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that the process had started "at least in December 2002".[353] He acknowledged that December was "quite late in the day" to start looking at options in the South.

640. The Inquiry asked Lord Boyce whether, as a result of the late changes to the military package, British troops had the necessary equipment.[354] Lord Boyce replied that while it "left us with some very short timelines", he was "confident" that the "front of the front line" were properly equipped on 20 March.

641. When asked whether he would have ideally deployed the land force sooner to allow for more training and time to acclimatise, or to ensure it had the right equipment, Lord Boyce replied:

> "My advice was that they had had sufficient time to make themselves ready."[355]

642. In his later statement to the Inquiry, Lord Boyce wrote that the land forces for the South:

> "… were largely based on what were already being prepared for the northern option. However, because of the change in plan, the US agreed to assist with some enabling and logistics assets in the south. Maritime (including amphibious) and air force levels were much the same. The thinking about a possible southern option had started in late autumn 2002 and so the concept was already well developed by the time the northern option was abandoned."[356]

643. Lord Boyce added:

> "…the equipment being procured for the land forces previously designated for the northern option largely serviced them when they were re-roled south, although there was a need to recognise the more extensive desert environment."

644. Lord Boyce subsequently told the Inquiry:

> "Although the final switch did happen around mid-January, really our minds in terms of planning and thinking about it and looking at all the potential pitfalls or difficulties or whatever had started, as you say, probably as far back as October; but during the course of December we really thought that was possibly where we were going to finish up …

> "… we could afford to take the decision quite late. It wasn't starting with a fresh plan in the middle of January. The southern plan was pretty well developed, in fact almost entirely developed, by then."[357]

645. Asked about the impact of the reduction in preparation time, Lord Boyce stated:

> "… it meant everything was being done at a rush … some aspects of the full operational capability weren't achieved until literally the nth hour … I don't believe … that our capability at the end of the day was in any sense seriously degraded … but nonetheless it did make it a tight run thing."[358]

646. Describing the thinking which had led to the UK's original offer in Package 3 in October of a brigade and divisional headquarters, Lord Boyce stated that it was "not a huge move then … into a division minus, which is what we actually finished up with".[359]

647. Asked whether, when he had visited UK forces just before the start of operations, he had been given any indications that they were lacking equipment such as body armour and ammunition, Lord Boyce replied: "No". But he added that he had been concerned about the "ability to cope with any biological or chemical threat", and at the time of his visit, a "very small percentage" of the force had not had their gas masks checked.

Conclusions

648. The achievements of the MOD and the Armed Forces in preparing the forces deployed for combat operations in Iraq against tight deadlines were very considerable.

649. But the evidence set out in this Section of the Report demonstrates that significant risks were taken as a result of decisions made in mid-January to deploy a larger combat force in a very compressed timescale. The difficulties were exacerbated by the absence of systems which could accurately track and report the situation on the ground.

650. The provision of additional funding from the Reserve for UORs worked well and there is no evidence of any delay or obstruction on the part of the Treasury.

651. A number of witnesses to the Inquiry stated, or implied, that the serious shortfalls of some equipment could have been mitigated if permission to discuss procurement with industry had been given earlier.

652. That claim is impossible to determine. It is clear that the restrictions on discussions with industry before 15 October did hinder planning and preparations and cause anxiety.

[358] Public hearing, 27 January 2011, page 28.
[359] Public hearing, 27 January 2011, page 30.

653. However, the most senior military officers and officials understood the political and diplomatic reasons for that decision and Ministers were not advised that the restrictions would have a direct adverse impact on capabilities.

654. The problems encountered by the forces deployed to Iraq in early 2003 do not appear to have been directly attributable to the absence of discussions with industry before 15 October.

655. The evidence suggests that most of the difficulties arose from the decisions to deploy a force more quickly than the Defence Planning Assumptions (DPAs) envisaged.

656. The 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR) and Defence Strategic Plan had set clear guidelines about the military resources required for potential operations of different scale and duration. The DPAs also set out the time likely to be necessary to adequately prepare UK forces for operations, including the time needed to procure and deploy equipment and train personnel on its use.

657. The DPAs determined the equipment procured for the Armed Forces and that the stocks held should be sufficient only to meet the readiness requirements specified in the DPAs.

658. The 1998 SDR had also concluded that the UK needed a better expeditionary capability to reflect the nature of future threats and the environments, such as the Gulf, in which the UK should plan to operate.

659. By 2002, when military planning for potential operations in Iraq commenced, that capability had not been fully achieved.

660. The policy underpinning the DPAs of relying on sufficient preparation time to procure UORs and additional stocks to meet identified shortfalls before a large scale deployment was explicitly acknowledged by the MOD in spring 2002.

661. In the second half of 2002, however, the MOD was already supporting two simultaneous medium scale operations, in the Balkans and Operation FRESCO, and a number of small scale operations, including in Afghanistan. The Armed Forces were thus already stretched to the maximum level envisaged under the DPAs, beyond which time would be needed to acquire additional stocks and equipment.

662. The decisions between mid-December 2002 and mid-January 2003, to increase the force deployed for ground operations to three combat brigades and the decisions to commit 16 Air Assault Brigade and 7 Armoured Brigade to military operations in southern Iraq in late March, had a significant impact on the scale of some UORs and compressed the time available for the provision and delivery of equipment to front line units.

663. The force deployed in 2003 was larger than the UK contribution in the Gulf Conflict in 1991 and the time to prepare was significantly shorter than the six to nine months assumed in the DPAs.

664. Lt Gen Reith acknowledged in May 2003 that the military commitment was, "as often happens, at a scale beyond that envisaged in the DPAs and thus not fully resourced".

665. When decisions were made in mid-January, the inherent risks for equipping the force to be deployed and its readiness were neither properly identified nor considered.

666. The military advice in late January 2003 that there were "no showstoppers" disguised the fact that risks had been accepted which had not been fully exposed to Ministers.

667. Adm Boyce had assured Mr Blair on 13 March 2003 that the Armed Forces faced "no serious equipment problems".

668. The context suggests he was referring to the invasion phase. As Section 8 shows, the US and UK did not expect Iraqi forces to be able effectively to resist Coalition Forces.

669. There may be circumstances in the future when a Government will feel it necessary to take decisions to commit the Armed Forces to military operations which exceed the planning assumptions on which they have been equipped and prepared. But they should not do so without an explicit acceptance of the risks being taken.

670. In addition, a number of lessons from previous conflicts and exercises had not been addressed before the deployment to Iraq.

671. In particular, poor asset tracking systems meant that an already over-burdened system was put under even greater pressure, and equipment that had been deployed to the forces in Kuwait did not reach the front line before military operations began.

672. ACM Stirrup accurately summarised the position when he told the Inquiry that "the issue was it was all being done so rapidly at the last minute no one was quite sure who had what".

673. The MOD's asset tracking system was still in need of improvement when the UK left Iraq in 2009.

674. The MOD had given assurances before the 2003 invasion that the necessary lessons had been learned since 1991. This proved not to be the case. In any future eventuality, the MOD has a responsibility to ensure that past mistakes are not repeated, and that its systems for asset tracking are robust.

675. The emergence after the conflict of the scale and nature of the problems encountered illuminated the extent to which Ministers had been unaware of risks being taken for which they would have been accountable. The shortfalls in individual equipment, protection against chemical and biological attack, and ammunition did not have an impact on the overall success of the invasion.

676. But they did have an impact on individuals.

677. In the case of Sgt Steven Roberts, it was judged that his death could have been prevented if he had still had his body armour.

678. As the evidence in this Section shows, reports about equipment shortfalls from the media and from members of the Armed Forces also had a negative impact on the perceptions of the morale of troops on the ground and on how the campaign was seen by the public and Parliament.

679. In addition, analysis of the events in 2003 shows that, until May, neither PJHQ nor MOD had a proper understanding of the problems with equipment that units were experiencing on the ground.

680. Lord Bach was right to have suggested on 11 February 2003 that a direct and robust system accurately to report on readiness and equipment issues from theatre to Ministers was needed.

681. During military operations, reporting to the MOD will always be constrained by the limitations of military operations and the pressures on those involved, and military commanders need the freedom to take operational decisions.

682. In any future operations, however, the MOD should ensure that it has robust systems in place to accurately report the situation on the ground without usurping the responsibilities of the chain of command.

Introduction and key findings

1. Sections 6.4 and 6.5 consider the UK's planning and preparation for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq between late 2001 and March 2003.

2. Section 6.4 covers the period up to Mr Blair's decision on 17 January 2003 to deploy UK forces to support US military preparations.

3. Section 6.5 covers the 10 weeks between the decision to deploy UK forces and the first post-invasion meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush at Camp David on 26 and 27 March 2003.

4. The two parts address:

- the development of UK post-conflict strategy and objectives;
- planning and preparation to implement those objectives;
- UK civilian and military planning machinery;
- UK influence on US planning and preparation and the impact of US planning on the UK; and
- Parliamentary interest in post-conflict planning and preparation.

5. The two parts do not consider:

- military plans for the invasion, which are addressed in Sections 6.1 and 6.2;
- intelligence on weapons of mass destruction (WMD) or preparations for the post-invasion search for WMD, addressed in Section 4;
- the financial and human resources available for post-conflict administration and reconstruction, addressed in Sections 13 and 15; and
- the outcome in post-conflict Iraq, which is addressed in Sections 9 and 10.

6. Descriptions of US preparations for post-conflict Iraq in Sections 6.4 and 6.5 are mostly taken from Hard Lessons, Mr Stuart Bowen's account, as US Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, of the US experience of reconstruction between 2002 and 2008.

7. Key findings for Sections 6.4 and 6.5 are listed below.

8. The Inquiry's conclusions relating to Sections 6.4 and 6.5 are at the end of Section 6.5.

Key findings

- Before the invasion of Iraq, Ministers, senior officials and the UK military recognised that post-conflict civilian and military operations were likely to be the strategically decisive phase of the Coalition's engagement in Iraq.
- UK planning and preparation for the post-conflict phase of operations, which rested on the assumption that the UK would be able quickly to reduce its military presence in Iraq and deploy only a minimal number of civilians, were wholly inadequate.
- The information available to the Government before the invasion provided a clear indication of the potential scale of the post-conflict task and the significant risks associated with the UK's proposed approach.
- Foreseeable risks included post-conflict political disintegration and extremist violence in Iraq, the inadequacy of US plans, the UK's inability to exert significant influence on US planning and, in the absence of UN authorisation for the administration and reconstruction of post-conflict Iraq, the reluctance of potential international partners to contribute to the post-conflict effort.
- The Government, which lacked both clear Ministerial oversight of post-conflict strategy, planning and preparation, and effective co-ordination between government departments, failed to analyse or manage those risks adequately.
- Mr Blair, who recognised the significance of the post-conflict phase, did not press President Bush for definite assurances about US plans, did not consider or seek advice on whether the absence of a satisfactory plan called for reassessment of the terms of the UK's engagement and did not make agreement on such a plan a condition of UK participation in military action.

Pre-conflict management of information on Iraq

9. During 2002 and early 2003, a growing body of evidence on the state of Iraq under Saddam Hussein and on the potential impact of conflict was available to UK planners.

10. The evidence was fragmented and incomplete. Many of the sources were not reliable.

11. A number of departments shared responsibility for the gathering, analysis and dissemination of that information.

12. The principal sources of information potentially available to UK planners before March 2003 on social, political and economic conditions in Iraq included:

- the UN, including the UN-managed Oil-for-Food (OFF) programme;
- reports on visits to Iraq by diplomats at the British Embassy in Amman, Jordan;[1]

[1] Paper FCO, 17 November 2010, 'Note for the Iraq Inquiry on the FCO's diplomatic contacts in Baghdad, 1990-2003'.

- a humanitarian programme funded by the Department for International Development (DFID) focused on northern Iraq;[2]
- Assessments produced by the UK's Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC);
- the US State Department's Future of Iraq Project;[3] and
- other sources, including non-governmental organisations (NGOs), academics, journalists, Arabic media, Iraqi émigrés and allied countries with Embassies in Baghdad.[4]

13. The information available to the Government before the invasion on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) is addressed in Section 4. Information on Iraq's other military capabilities is in Sections 6.1 to 6.3.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office

14. In December 2003, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) presented a Strategy for the FCO to Parliament, in which it listed the department's "key contributions" to government.[5] They included:

- "co-ordination and leadership of the UK's international policies";
- "expert foreign policy advice for Ministers and the Prime Minister, feeding into the wider policy process"; and
- "rapid gathering, analysis and targeting of information for the Government and others".

15. Within the FCO between 2001and 2003, prime responsibility for information on other countries fell to the relevant regional department. For Iraq, that was the Middle East Department (MED), under the supervision of the Director Middle East and North Africa.

16. The FCO Directorate of Strategy and Innovation (DSI) reported to the Permanent Under Secretary (PUS)[6] and the FCO Board. Its role was to review policy in areas of high priority and to supplement or challenge advice from the relevant department within the FCO. DSI was a significant contributor of strategy papers on Iraq in the second half of 2002.

[6] In keeping with variations in use within departments, the Inquiry refers to the most senior civil servant in the FCO and the MOD as the Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), but in all other departments as the Permanent Secretary. The Permanent Under Secretaries and Permanent Secretaries are referred to collectively as Permanent Secretaries.

17. The FCO Research Analysts (RA) provided expert support and background for the policy recommendations made by MED and the Iraq Planning Unit (IPU), which was established in February 2003.[7] The FCO told the Inquiry that one analyst worked full-time on Iraq during 2001, increasing to two from mid-2002.[8] RA also acted as the contact point within government for the US State Department's Future of Iraq Project.[9]

18. After the closure of the British Embassy Baghdad on 12 January 1992, the UK had no diplomatic relations with Iraq.

19. In other cases where diplomatic relations have been interrupted, the UK has often maintained a British Interests Section within a friendly Embassy. The FCO told the Inquiry it did not consider opening an Interests Section in Iraq staffed with permanent UK diplomatic staff.[10] Instead, Russia acted as the UK's Protecting Power in Baghdad from November 1992 until the invasion, but did not provide the UK with political reporting from Iraq.

20. The FCO told the Inquiry that, from the late 1990s, junior UK diplomats based in Amman visited Baghdad about every six months to check on UK property, in particular the Embassy building, deal with locally-employed staff, call on resident diplomats from other countries and glean what information they could on the situation in Iraq.[11] On return to Amman, the UK diplomats produced reports containing political and economic information, some of which are described later in this Section.

21. Initially, the reports from Amman had an administrative focus. The FCO explicitly advised visiting diplomats from Amman not to travel to Basra, as such visits would not be consistent with that purpose and might suggest the UK was increasing contact with Iraq.[12] Visiting diplomats were instructed to "avoid all political contacts".

22. In July 1998, FCO Economic Advisers asked the British Embassy Amman for help in monitoring Iraq's economy, explaining that basic economic indicators were unavailable and that those with an interest in the issue had to rely on "snippets of information, on anecdote, and on speculation".[13] The Embassy was asked to make a "modest effort" to gather economic information during routine administrative visits to Iraq, focusing on:

- living standards;
- employment/unemployment and the structure of economic activity;

23. From early 2002, UK diplomats based in Amman began to visit Iraq more often. They produced reports on political and social developments, drawing on information gleaned from business and other travellers and monthly UN briefings in Baghdad.[14]

24. The FCO has not been able to provide the Inquiry with the complete series of reports between July 1998 and March 2003.

25. Dr Robert Wilson and Mr Mark Hetherington, the two research analysts working on Iraq before the invasion, explained to the Inquiry that the FCO drew on a range of sources for information about the social, economic and political situation in Iraq:

> "These included Iraqi politicians and exiles from both Iraqi Kurdistan and the rest of the country, contact with whom was one of the core tasks of Research Analysts during this period. Amongst those were individuals who visited either Saddam-controlled Iraq or Northern Iraq (where Saddam had withdrawn his administration and which was under de facto control of the two main Kurdish parties) and those who had links to family or contacts within the country. Though the majority of those with whom we were in contact were opposed to Saddam Hussein's regime, their analysis was far from homogenous – religious organisations and NGOs in particular offering more nuanced analysis. Of course we were aware that many of these individuals had their own particular agenda – especially when it came to the question of what level of political support their parties or ideologies had within Iraq, and this was hard to assess independently. In addition there were many Iraqis who shied away from contact with the British Government …"[15]

26. Dr Wilson told the Inquiry that RA had "no shortage of information on Iraq of varying degrees of reliability".[16] In addition to Iraqi exiles, the FCO's network of Embassies in the region (particularly in Jordan and Turkey) kept in touch with local Iraqi officials and opinion formers. Though most contacts were opposed to Saddam Hussein's regime, their analysis was far from homogeneous.[17] Researchers were aware their contacts had their own agendas and it was hard to assess independently what support specific parties or ideologies had in Iraq.

27. Dr Wilson told the Inquiry that academics, the UN and its agencies, NGOs and the Arabic media were also sources of information.

28. Lord Jay, the FCO PUS from 2002 to 2006, told the Inquiry that the FCO had only a "partial" picture of what was going on in Iraq.[18] He highlighted the critical role of an Embassy in understanding a country:

> "… we did not have first-hand knowledge of what was going on inside Iraq, of how Saddam Hussein and his government operated.
> "We had it second- or third-hand from other powers to whom we spoke … [W]hat we did not have was the … constant day-to-day contact between well-qualified, Arabic-speaking diplomats in Baghdad able to report back constantly on the ebb and flow of power and influence and what that meant for us.
> "… [Y]ou really do need people on the ground feeding stuff back. If you don't have that, you are going to make mistakes."

29. Lord Jay agreed that, in the absence of first-hand information, No.10 looked to the UK's intelligence services to provide advice on a broader range of issues than normal.[19]

30. Lord Jay added:

> "I don't think we had thought through as much as we should have done what the implications were going to be of an invasion of a country such as Iraq … I wished we had had a better understanding of what Iraq was like in the 1990s, early 2000s before a decision was taken to invade."[20]

31. Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa from 2002 to 2004, characterised UK knowledge of what happened inside Iraq as "patchy".[21] He told the Inquiry he could, nevertheless, draw on a number of useful sources of information: the British Embassy Amman, which held a "watching brief"; contacts with exiled Iraqi groups in London and Washington; contacts with close allies, like the French, who had long experience of, and still had representation in, Iraq; contacts in a number of academic institutions; and contacts with journalists.

32. Mr Chaplin commented:

> "... I don't think we lacked for sources of information, but I think one of the problems is that actually nobody outside Iraq, including Iraqi exiles, quite realised how broken Iraqi society had become … nobody really had that information."[22]

33. Mr Chaplin rejected the suggestion that he had made no attempt to fill gaps in the UK's knowledge base on Iraq, highlighting the multiple sources of information that were available.

34. Mr Simon Webb, Ministry of Defence (MOD) Policy Director from 2001 to 2004, told the Inquiry he felt he had a very good feel for Iraq's military capability, but not for what was happening within Saddam Hussein's administration, the state of Iraq's infrastructure, or the mood of the population in the South:

> "If we had thought that we were going to play a big role in reconstruction, and we'd been asked to gather that information, I suspect we could have had a better picture."[23]

35. Mr Webb agreed that the Government could have made more use of "open source" reporting and analysis, including from academia, think-tanks and NGOs.

The Iraq Planning Unit

36. In early February 2003, the Government established the Iraq Planning Unit (IPU) to focus on post-conflict Iraq. The IPU was an inter-departmental (FCO/MOD/DFID) unit, based in the FCO and headed by a former member of MED. In the FCO, the IPU reported to the Director Middle East and North Africa.

37. The origin and purpose of the IPU are addressed in more detail in Section 6.5.

38. Mr Dominick Chilcott, Head of the IPU from February to June 2003, told the Inquiry there was "a lot of expertise" he could draw on, in particular from FCO RA, Iraqi exiles and FCO posts in the region.[24]

The Joint Intelligence Committee

39. The JIC was (and continues to be) responsible for:

> "... providing Ministers and senior officials with co-ordinated intelligence assessments on a range of issues of immediate and long-range importance to national interests, primarily in the fields of security, defence and foreign affairs."[25]

40. The JIC is supported by Assessments Staff analysts seconded to the Cabinet Office from other departments. The Assessments Staff's draft assessments were (and still are) subject to formal inter-departmental scrutiny and challenge in Current Intelligence Groups (CIGs), which bring together working-level experts from a range of government departments and the intelligence agencies. In the case of Iraq between 2001and 2003, the CIG brought together the desk-level experts from the FCO (including MED and RA),

MOD (including the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS)), Cabinet Office and the intelligence agencies, and any other department with an interest in the issue being considered.

41. The JIC agrees most assessments before they are sent to Ministers and senior officials, although some papers, including urgent updates on developing issues, are issued under the authority of the Chief of the Assessments Staff.

42. The current JIC Terms of Reference make clear that it is expected to draw on "secret intelligence, diplomatic reporting and open source material".[26]

43. Iraq was regularly considered by the JIC in 2000 and 2001, with the focus on weapons of mass destruction (WMD), sanctions and the implications of the No-Fly Zones (NFZs).[27]

44. Sir John Scarlett, JIC Chairman from 2001 to 2004, considered that Iraq had been one of the top priorities for the JIC for most of his time as Chairman.[28]

45. Sir John told the Inquiry that, with the limited resources available to the Assessments Staff, the breakdown, decay and decrepitude of Iraq's civilian infrastructure was "not a natural intelligence target".[29] He added:

> "That kind of information and that kind of understanding of the fragility of the structures of the State … could have been … presented or understood from a whole range of sources, not necessarily from intelligence."

46. Sir John later told the Inquiry that the JIC had not been asked to look at Iraqi civilian infrastructure and institutions, other than Saddam Hussein's power structures:

> "If we had been, I think almost certainly my response would be: that's not for us. Why should that be an intelligence issue? I wouldn't quite be able to understand how intelligence would help. I would see it as fundamentally something which in the first instance advice would need to come from the Foreign Office … Of course, if we had been asked, we would have said can you identify or can we between us work out what would be particularly susceptible to an intelligence view or consideration? And I think it would have been quite narrow. I don't quite see how secret intelligence would have particularly helped."[30]

47. Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff from 2001 to 2003, told the Inquiry that intelligence available to the JIC gave some peripheral indications on issues such as Iraq's civilian infrastructure and the state of its institutions, but was not focused on those areas.[31] In retrospect, he believed that if the UK had wanted to find out more, it might have been possible for the JIC to ask the agencies to make an effort in that direction. He had no recollection of any such request.

48. Mr Miller added that departments had shown interest in the internal politics of Iraq and the relationship between the Shia and the Kurds, but only very limited intelligence had been available on those subjects.

49. The majority of JIC assessments relevant to Iraq between 2002 and the start of the invasion on 19 March 2003 dealt with Saddam Hussein's military and diplomatic options, WMD, or regional attitudes to Iraq.[32]

50. The weekly Intelligence Updates issued by the Assessments Staff from November 2002 and more frequently from February 2003, concentrated on the same three themes.

The Defence Intelligence Staff

51. The principal task of the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS)[33] was the provision of intelligence to inform MOD policy formulation and procurement decisions, and to support military operations.[34]

52. The DIS worked closely with other UK intelligence organisations and with overseas allies.[35] Its sources included human, signals and imagery intelligence, as well as open sources. The DIS produced a number of reports on the state of Iraq.

53. In late February 2003, the DIS established a Red Team to give key planners in Whitehall an independent view of intelligence assumptions and key judgements, to challenge those assumptions and judgements if appropriate and to identify areas where more work was needed (see Section 6.5).[36] Papers were copied to the Chiefs of Staff, the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ), the MOD, FCO, IPU and the JIC.

54. Mr Martin Howard, Deputy Chief of Defence Intelligence from February 2003 to May 2004, the senior civilian in the DIS, told the Inquiry:

> "… at the strategic level the lead agency was the JIC. They are the ones who produced, as it were, the capstone intelligence assessments.
> "What the DIS tried to do was do things at a level a little below that, to produce products which would be of interest to high level policy makers, but also extremely useful to planners, to commanders and so on and so forth. So I'm not sure we were necessarily the lead, but we probably did the bulk of the analytical work."[37]

55. Mr Howard stated that the DIS produced "a mass of material, even in the short time we had available, and I'm not sure that there would have been a fundamental improvement in what we could have provided if we had had another few months".[38]

56. Mr Howard did not recall the Red Team having a huge impact on work done by DIS. It raised "some interesting points", but "in the end, although it had a senior level distribution list … the practical impact would have been at the analytical level, rather than necessarily the policy making level".[39]

57. Mr Ian Lee, MOD Director General Operational Policy (DG OpPol) from September 2002 to May 2004, told the Inquiry that the MOD looked to the DIS for information about what the UK should expect to encounter in Iraq after a military campaign, including the state of the country, its sectarian, ethnic, political, and economic makeup.[40] There was not much detail available. Mr Lee described the written briefing as "a bit generalised".

58. Major General Michael Laurie, MOD Director General Intelligence Collection from 2000 to 2003, told the Inquiry he did not recall the DIS being tasked to look at the situation after the campaign, but did recall "a general feeling that we weren't paying as much attention to follow-on operations and what would happen as we should have done".[41] He agreed that it would have been within the DIS remit to consider the state of Iraq's infrastructure: the DIS had a number of teams working on infrastructure issues and had an established capability to collect open source information, including from the academic and scientific communities.

The Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat

59. The Cabinet Office contains the Cabinet Secretariats, which support the Cabinet and Cabinet committees, and draw staff from across government.[42] Between 2001 and 2003 the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec)[43] was responsible for foreign and defence policy issues, of which Iraq was one.[44]

60. The Head of OD Sec (Sir David Manning from September 2001) was also Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser.[45] In 2001 and 2002, of about a dozen staff in OD Sec, just two had any responsibility for Iraq.[46] In both cases, Iraq was only part of their job.

The Ad Hoc Group on Iraq

61. OD Sec chaired the cross-Whitehall Ad Hoc Group on Iraq (AHGI), which met for the first time on 20 September 2002.[47] The AHGI was the principal Whitehall co-ordination mechanism for non-military Iraq planning until the creation of the inter-departmental IPU in February 2003.

62. The origin and purpose of the AHGI are addressed in greater detail later in this Section.

63. The MOD participated in the AHGI but its own post-conflict military planning was not part of the AHGI process.
